TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorism Charge May Be Reinstated Against Padilla (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, November 22, 2006

MIAMI — Federal prosecutors have asked an appeals court to reinstate a key terrorism charge against an alleged Al Qaeda operative, Jose Padilla, contending a judge erred in finding that it duplicated other counts in the same indictment.

Padilla and two co-defendants are charged with being part of a North American support cell that provided money, supplies, and recruits to Islamic extremists worldwide. Padilla, an American citizen, was held for 3 1/2 years without charge as an "enemy combatant," originally accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in an American city.

The pleading filed with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals late Monday argues that the charge dismissed by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke is a distinct offense in the case.

Judge Cooke ruled in August that the first count of the indictment against Padilla and two others — charging a conspiracy to "murder, kidnap, and maim persons in a foreign country" — was essentially the same as two other terrorism support counts. The dismissed charge is the only one in the case that carries a potential life prison sentence.

Reno Joins Criticism Of Anti-Terror Strategy (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Former attorney general Janet Reno has taken the unusual step of openly criticizing the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy -- joining seven other former Justice Department officials in warning that the indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene.

In a friend-of-the-court brief filed in the case of alleged enemy combatant Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, the former prosecutors assert that criminal courts are well equipped to prosecute terrorism suspects while guaranteeing the constitutional rights of defendants arrested on U.S. soil.

Reno, reached at her Florida home yesterday, said she would let the brief "speak for itself. I've been following this, and it reflects my concerns about the detention and treatment of people who have been determined to be enemy combatants in a manner that is not clear how it is being done."

In their brief, Reno and the other former Justice Department officials said: "The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally -- perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons."

The filing in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit is a highly unusual move for Reno. She has generally maintained a low profile since leaving the helm of the Justice Department in 2001 and has said little publicly about the policies of her successors, John D. Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales.

The brief is also notable because its signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years -- W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas -- in addition to prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip A. Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor.

"It carries more weight because these are high-ranking officials in several administrations from both parties," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

Marri, a Qatari national, has been held as an enemy combatant in a military prison in South Carolina since he was accused of being an al Qaeda "sleeper agent" sent to the United States to carry out attacks. Unlike the hundreds of detainees being held in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Marri was apprehended on U.S. soil, in Peoria, Ill., and is the only remaining enemy combatant held inside the United States.

The Justice Department argues that an anti-terrorism law, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, allows the government to detain any foreign national as an enemy combatant, regardless of where they were arrested. The administration wants to place Marri into its military trial system, but he is challenging the legality of his detention.

"While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday.

Gonzales defended the administration's detention and surveillance policies in a weekend speech at the Air Force Academy, telling cadets that it is a "myth" that civil liberties have been hampered by anti-terrorism strategies.

Reno, Former U.S. Officials Challenge Military Trials (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jeff St.onge

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

Nov. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials challenged the Bush administration's bid to try suspected terrorist Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a foreign national living in the U.S. when he was arrested, before a military commission.

Reno and the others said the Bush administration is trying to set a dangerous precedent that would let the government indefinitely imprison any non-U.S. citizen considered an enemy. The former U.S. officials were joined by at least four human rights groups making similar arguments.

The administration is ``asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute them criminally," Reno, six former U.S. attorneys and a former deputy solicitor general said in a ``friend-of-the-court" brief.

Al-Marri, 41, was the first defendant removed from the U.S. criminal justice system and deemed an illegal enemy combatant. He was studying in the U.S. and living in Illinois when he was arrested in late 2001. The Justice Department unsealed the indictment in December 2002, and he was declared an enemy combatant about six months later. A citizen of Qatar, al-Marri has been held at a U.S. Navy Prison in South Carolina since June 2003.

The Justice Department said it stands by its decision to try al-Marri as a suspected terrorist outside the criminal court system.

Complex Issues

``These are complex and difficult legal issues," said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist in an e-mailed statement today. ``While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing."

The Justice Department said a new anti-terrorism law, the Military Commissions Act, gives terrorism suspects such as al-Marri no right to challenge their imprisonment.

Jonathan Hafetz, one of al-Marri's lawyers, said a hearing on the government's request to have al-Marri's challenge to his detention thrown out is scheduled for late January or early February in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond.

``This is an unprecedented, unlawful and un-American attempt to deprive an individual living in this country of basic constitutional rights," said Hafetz, from New York University's Brennan Center Justice, in a phone interview.

Reno was attorney general in President Bill Clinton's administration. The other officials who joined her on the legal brief served under Clinton and President Ronald Reagan, such as former U.S. Attorney Anton Valukas, who is now a partner at the Jenner & Block law firm in Chicago. Some represent detainees held at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, according to Hafetz.

The case is Al-Marri v. Wright, 06-7427 in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia.

Editorial: Terror Detainees Still Face Legal Limbo (DENP)

Justice for the 9/11 victims requires that high-level detainees be charged and prosecuted. And, Congress should restore the right of habeas corpus.

A few months back, when President Bush was pushing Congress for the authority to try suspected terrorists before military commissions, he made a surprise announcement confirming the existence of secret overseas prisons.

Among those behind bars were 14 al-Qaeda terror suspects who were relocated to the military prison at Guantanamo Bay.

President Bush said then that the legislation was necessary to bring these people and others to justice. Among them was Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, considered the mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

The president was asking Congress for powers the U.S. Supreme Court had ruled unconstitutional, and he cast it as a time-sensitive situation.

"As soon as Congress acts to authorize the military commissions I have proposed, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the deaths of nearly 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11, 2001, can face justice," Bush said in September. "To start the process for bringing them to trial, we must bring them out into the open."

But what seemed so urgent at the time is now taking on a different tenor.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The Denver Post editorial board Monday that the administration can hold Guantanamo Bay detainees indefinitely, without any judicial proceeding through the "period of hostilities." Which is to say, indefinitely.

The administration has categorized an untold number of detainees as "unlawful enemy combatants," saying they are members of a non-state terrorist group. It's a different class of detainee than POWs, typically uniformed combatants captured during battlefield-style warfare. The U.S. in previous wars has held enemy combatants. But the Military Commissions Act of 2006 broadened the definition of illegal enemy combatant to include those providing support to terrorists. As such, they have no right to a real day in court. "We have no obligation to bring people to justice," Gonzales said.

And even when military commission proceedings begin, Gonzales predicted slow going due to defendants' legal maneuverings.

"At every opportunity they're going to bring challenges," he said. But these opportunities have shrunk considerably.

In fact, Congress gave the president the authority to use military commissions in a bill that included one particularily controversial provision - denying the detainees a procedure known as habeas corpus, a right that obligates the government to justify imprisonment before a federal judge.

With the removal of habeas rights, the detainees have no way of challenging their status in federal court. That alone has spawned litigation that seems sure to make its way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, the wheels of makeshift justice are grinding slowly. Government officials told The New York Times earlier this month that the first military commission trials at Gitmo could begin this summer, but those will not involve any of the 14 senior al-Qaeda members recently moved to the prison in Cuba. Along with Shaikh Mohammed, they include Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be Sept. 11 hijacker, and Abu Zubaydah, who is said to have served as a link between al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and cells in his organization.

It could be well into 2008 before those high in the command structure of al-Qaeda would be tried, or never. We believe that egregious crimes should be prosecuted as quickly as practical, as the president suggested in his September remarks. Victims of Sept. 11 have already waited five years for justice.

As for those who are in detention at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, the denial of habeas corpus is unnecessary and un-American. While the U.S. Supreme Court almost certainly will get a crack at this questionable law, members of Congress shouldn't wait. They should review the military commissions act as an early order of business in 2007 and at the very least restore the right of habeas corpus to those imprisoned at Guantanamo.

It is a step that will bring the U.S. back into line with our own traditions and rights.

Gonzales Acknowledges Supermax Problems, Says They're Addressed (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0097098

DENVER — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged the federal government has made mistakes at the ultra-high-security Supermax prison in Colorado, including inadequate monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls, but he said steps are being taken to address the problem.

"Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility," Gonzales said Monday. "But we've taken steps to address them."

Supermax, in the town of Florence about 80 miles south of Denver, houses some of the nation's most dangerous inmates, including Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Local and federal officials have criticized the prison in recent weeks over staffing levels, security measures and fencing.

A Justice Department report in September criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications. Last month, a federal arbitrator found staff cuts had made the facility more dangerous. Both Colorado's senators, Republican Wayne Allard and Democrat Ken Salazar, and local officials have raised concerns about security and communications.

Gonzales said all inmate mail is now being read and a large portion of phone calls are monitored as they occur. The rest are recorded and reviewed by translators later, though a shortage of qualified Arabic translators has caused a delay.

He did not say how long the delay was.

Gonzales said he has asked the director of the Bureau of Prisons to look into potential technology improvements at Supermax and whether perimeter patrols should be stepped up.

Gonzales said 11 staff members have been added at Supermax in recent weeks and seven more will begin work soon. Those 18 would bring the facility to 208, still fewer than the 240 who were there when the prison opened in 1994.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rainier Valley Barbershop Owner Flees U.S. (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 22, 2006

Facing sentencing in plea deal, he phones FBI to say he's in Somalia

Ruben Shumpert, who federal agents allege made his Rainier Valley barber shop a kind of "anti-American training ground for Muslims" where children were taught "how to shoot and fight the Americans," has telephoned the FBI to say he won't be going to prison anytime soon.

Shumpert, who faces sentencing on federal counterfeiting and weapons charges, has fled to Somalia.

A warrant has been issued for the arrest of Shumpert, who is also known as Amir Abdul Muhaimin, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Redkey said. He was to be sentenced Tuesday.

Shumpert -- an African American convert to Islam -- was among more than a dozen, mostly African immigrants from Islamic countries arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force two years ago on a mix of charges, including immigration fraud and bank fraud.

Shumpert was never charged with any terrorism crimes, but court documents paint a picture of his barber shop at 7821 Rainier Ave. S. as a gathering place for adherents of radical Islam where he showed children videotapes of "fighting, shooting and killing with images on Shumpert's computer screen of al-Qaida and the Taliban."

Shumpert had been free on personal recognizance and was facing sentencing under a plea agreement when he fled the country, Redkey said. Shumpert called an FBI agent on the Joint Terrorism Task Force from Somalia, Redkey said.

But he noted that the United States has no extradition treaty with Somalia. Somalia is considered a fertile breeding ground for radical Islamic terrorists by U.S. intelligence agencies.

Redkey said Shumpert also likely is to be charged with failing to appear for his sentencing hearing, a separate felony.

A condition of Shumpert's release before sentencing was that he surrender his passport, said Redkey, who noted that in recent years, it has become more common for judges to allow defendants to turn in their passports after they are released from custody. Shumpert never surrendered his passport, Redkey said.

Seattle Convict Who Espoused Radical Views Flees To Somalia (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, November 22, 2006

SEATTLE -- A south Seattle barbershop worker who allegedly espoused radical Islamic views fled to Somalia rather than show up in federal court to be sentenced on gun and counterfeiting charges.

"He decided he liked his chances better elsewhere," Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey said after Tuesday's sentencing was put off. "It's always a concern when someone who has espoused radical ideas heads to a place like Somalia, of course."

Ruben Shumpert helped run Crescent Cuts barber shop in Seattle's Rainier Valley, according to documents filed in U.S. District Court. He was arrested two years ago and charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, following an FBI investigation into activities at the shop. He was accused of providing a gun to one person and giving $700 to another for the purpose of buying a gun.

Redkey said he isn't sure when Shumpert fled. He was last in court on Sept. 20, when he appeared on bond to plead guilty to the weapons charge and to transferring counterfeit currency. He entered the pleas in exchange for a recommended sentence of 24 to 30 months.

Shumpert's lawyer, James Vonasch, said the government told him only that his client had left the country. He didn't know until contacted by The Associated Press that Shumpert had gone to Somalia - a war-wracked East African country that's considerably less safe than federal prison.

"He hasn't been checking in with his lawyer," Vonasch said. "That is a horrible place to go to."

Vonasch also said that Shumpert claims to speak some Arabic, and that an FBI agent who worked the case got a call from him within the past two weeks.

"The agent implied it was an unpleasant conversation, but he didn't supply me with the details," Vonasch said.

Vonasch said Shumpert's wife and two young children are still in Seattle. The FBI questioned the wife about Shumpert's whereabouts, he said.

The FBI's investigation into the barbershop relied on paid informants who told agents that Shumpert and other men who would meet at the shop often spoke in bellicose anti-American terms. Eventually, agents determined that they were "unable or unwilling to engage in acts of terrorism," according to court documents.

Some - including Shumpert - were indicted on non-terrorism-related charges, such as document fraud and firearms violations.

Among the items removed from the barbershop were "jihad motivational DVDs," prosecutors wrote in a sentencing memorandum last July.

"If youngsters came in to play video games he would encourage them first to view the motivational DVDs," they wrote of Shumpert. "The subject matter of the DVDs included a glowing tribute to the '19 Martyrs,' referring to the 9/11 terrorists."

Shumpert, who has previous state convictions on weapons and assault charges, denied being a radical. In a 12-page, neatly handwritten letter to the judge this summer, he said he wanted to take responsibility for his crimes, and credited Islam with turning him from a life of theft and drug-dealing. But he also criticized the FBI's reliance on paid informants who first befriended him and then begged him to get them guns and counterfeit money.

"Has there ever been any (news) stories that show how these sort of FBI investigations have torn apart whole communities with false allegations and entrapment?" he wrote. "I ask you please, don't let them throw us away in the system so easily."

Vonasch said it appeared likely that the judge might give a longer sentence than the 24-30 month recommendation; she rejected a previous plea agreement that would have made that sentencing range binding on the court.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on each other. The current administration was formed with the help of the United Nations two years ago, but it has failed to assert any real control outside the southern town of Baidoa, where it is based.

New Plan Aims To Better Share Terrorism Data (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- More than five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, U.S. intelligence officials have unveiled the first comprehensive plan to help federal, state and local officials share information about terrorist threats. But whether the government will provide the money and commitment needed to make the plan work remains uncertain.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence, which is coordinating the new plan, known as the "Information Sharing Environment," said it aims to break down barriers by allowing federal and local agencies to send representatives to the National Counterterrorism Center, the government's main terrorism-information clearinghouse.

The plan also seeks to overhaul the way classified and sensitive data are handled so information can better reach the people who need to see it, like governors, mayors, police chiefs and, eventually, beat police on the street.

A senior U.S. intelligence official said President Bush asked the DNI to create a framework to allow the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to better coordinate their threat assessments and warnings to state and local authorities. The White House has grown increasingly concerned about the poor quality of information sharing between the federal government and the states.

State and local officials cautiously welcomed the plan, which was unveiled a week ago but details of which they have been learning in recent days. But many warned the effort wouldn't work without federal money and muscle to provide better technology and to put an end to traditional interagency turf battles.

Deputy Chief Mark Leap of the Los Angeles Police Department said the ISE is a promising first step but that local police need "almost instantaneous access" to information for decision-making purposes. "There is no system to support that kind of access right now," he said.

The office of the Director of National Intelligence is currently in talks with the White House about funding for the new technology and personnel costs outlined in the plan. Officials haven't decided how much this will cost or who should pay for it.

The Department of Homeland Security is in charge of communicating threat information to state and local governments. It has been helping states and regions set up "fusion" centers to coordinate information locally. These centers are a key part of the new information-sharing plan, although the information they handle isn't just terrorism-related.

Sens. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, and Joseph I. Lieberman, from Connecticut, wrote a letter, released yesterday, alleging that the department's information-sharing programs remain weak a year after Hurricane Katrina.

The Homeland Security Information Network, a program intended to link so-called first responders -- those on the front line in responding to a disaster or crisis, such as firemen -- and disseminate intelligence to local authorities, has largely failed, the letter said. It said only 6% of an estimated 18,000 first responders use the network on a regular basis. As a result, the Homeland Security Department can't reliably obtain "situational awareness," or knowledge of current information from the site of a disaster or terrorist attack, the letter said.

The need to share information collected by local police about suspicious activity has increased along with fears that homegrown radical groups pose perhaps a greater threat to the U.S. than foreign terrorists.

6 Imams Removed From Flight For Behavior Deemed Suspicious (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

Six Muslim religious leaders were taken off a US Airways flight in Minneapolis on Monday evening and detained for several hours after some passengers and crew members complained of behavior they deemed suspicious, including prayers at the gate.

DOJ_NMG_0097101

The incident prompted the Council on American-Islamic Relations and officials for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Washington to call Tuesday for Congressional hearings on racial profiling and an investigation by the Justice Department and the Transportation Security Administration.

Nihad Awad, executive director of the Islamic advocacy group, said this was hardly the first time Muslims had encountered problems with stereotyping by the airline. “We seem to have received more complaints against US Airways” than other carriers, Mr. Awad said in an interview. Those complaints have come from Muslim employees and passengers alike, he said.

Morgan Durrant, a US Airways spokesman, said the airline was investigating the episode. But he said the crew had acted in accordance with the company’s policy for removing passengers, though he declined to give specifics on the policy.

The six men detained, all imams, had attended a Minneapolis conference of the North American Imams Federation. They were handcuffed by the police and led off the flight, bound for Phoenix, after reports from passengers and crew members of “unsettling” behavior, according to a police report. One passenger had slipped a note to a flight attendant that began, “6 suspicious Arabic men on plane,” the report said.

After being detained for five hours and questioned separately by federal agents, all six men were released, said Patrick Hogan, a spokesman for Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport.

One of the six, Omar Ahmad Shahin of Phoenix, said he had been questioned for less than a half-hour. “This is the humiliation,” said Dr. Shahin, 45. “They found nothing. They found we had a good relation with everybody.”

A phone call to the Minneapolis office of the F.B.I. on Tuesday was not returned.

The men’s fare was refunded to them, but on Tuesday morning a US Airways ticket agent refused to book them on another flight to Phoenix. They returned instead on a Northwest Airlines flight.

Detailed accounts of the incident varied. Witnesses, including a number of passengers and US Airways employees, said they heard some of the men making anti-American remarks and chanting “Allah,” first as they boarded the plane and then when led off, Mr. Hogan said.

Others said the men behaved strangely once on board, with some asking for seat belt extensions, the police report said. “I did not see they actually needed them,” one flight attendant wrote in a statement given to the police. “They were not overweight.”

Dr. Shahin disagreed, saying the extensions were necessary for their “big bodies.”

In another statement, a gate agent said some of the imams had been praying in Arabic in the gate area. “I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud,” the agent said.

A second imam, Ahmad Tafish Shqeirat, said that three of the six had prayed in the gate area, in the ritual of evening prayers, but had not meant to be disruptive and indeed had taken pains not to disturb other passengers.

6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP)

By Martiga Lohn

The AP, November 21, 2006

Six Muslim clerics removed from a US Airways flight said Tuesday they were victims of discrimination and called for a boycott of the airline.

The imams were removed from the flight to Phoenix on Monday night after three of them said their normal evening prayers in the terminal in Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport before boarding, said Omar Shahin, president of the North American Imams Federation. They were among the 150 imams who attended a federation meeting in Minneapolis.

"The police came and take us off the plane in front of all the passengers in a very humiliated way," said Shahin. "I never felt bad in my life like yesterday. It was the worst moment in my life when I see six imams, six leaders in this community, humiliated."

The Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said in a letter Tuesday it had opened an investigation.

US Airways Group Inc. issued a statement saying it was interviewing crew members and ground workers to find out more about what happened.

"We are always concerned when passengers are inconvenienced and especially concerned when a situation occurs that causes customers to feel their dignity was compromised. We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind," the airline said.

An airport police report said the flight's captain had already decided he wanted the men off the plane after the passenger passed a flight attendant a note pointing out "Arabic men."

Witnesses said the men prayed in the terminal and made critical comments about the Iraq war, according to the police report, and a US Airways manager said three of the men had only one-way tickets and no checked baggage.

An airport police officer and a federal air marshal agreed that the combination of circumstances was suspicious, and eventually asked the men to leave the airplane, the police report said.

"There were a number of things that gave the flight crew pause," Airport spokesman Patrick Hogan said. It wasn't immediately possible to verify whether the passengers who reported suspicious activity witnessed it themselves.

But Shahin and Marwan Sadeddin, another of the imams, strongly denied doing anything out of the ordinary. They entered the aircraft individually, except for Sadeddin, who is blind and needed a guide, Shahin said. Once on the plane, the six did not sit together, he said.

Shahin said no one asked the six to leave until police arrived, when the group complied.

The other passengers on the flight, which was carrying 141 passengers and five crew members, were re-screened for boarding. The plane took off about three hours after the men were removed.

On Tuesday, US Airways refused to honor the group's tickets or allow them to buy new ones, saying their payment for Monday's flight had been refunded.

Shahin eventually booked flights on Northwest Airlines — to Phoenix for five of the imams from the Phoenix-Tempe area and to Los Angeles for the sixth, who is from Bakersfield, Calif.

Shahin said his days of praying in airports may be over. "It's terrible, unfortunately," he said. "In America we have no freedom to practice our faith, to do our faith."

Shahin expressed frustration that — despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — so many Americans know so little about Islam, which requires prayer five times a day.

Nihad Awad, executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said he hoped the incident would "raise awareness among the general public and the airline industry that praying as a Muslim and flying as a Muslim should not trigger any fear and any prejudice."

Muslim Scholar Calls For A Boycott Of US Airways (CCT)

By Bob Von Sternberg And Pamela Miller

The Contra Costa Times, November 22, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - From now on, Omar Shahin won't be praying at the airport while waiting for a flight.

"This was humiliating, the worst moment of my life," Shahin said Tuesday, a day after he and five fellow Muslim imams were escorted off a US Airways jet at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport. "To practice your faith and pray is a crime in America?" he said.

The incident set off a nationwide uproar, and the Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said it will review the incident.

Bloggers and talk radio buzzed about the need to be vigilant against potential terrorists, while civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders cried foul. The national Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) called for a congressional hearing about ethnic and religious profiling at airports.

Locally, the Jewish Community Relations Council of Minnesota and the Dakotas and the Somali Justice Advocacy Center questioned the detention.

Bushra Khan, spokeswoman for CAIR's Arizona chapter, said, "All these men did was pray, and it was misunderstood. The bottom line is that they were Middle Eastern-looking men . . . and that scares some people."

US Airways said that it would fully investigate the matter and that passenger safety is paramount.

The religious leaders were heading home to Phoenix after a three-day North American Imams Federation conference in Bloomington, Minn.

The pilot ordered the men off the flight after their praying, conversation and behavior alarmed several passengers and flight attendants.

The imams denied that they did or said anything that could be considered threatening. They were released without charges after being questioned for five hours by federal law enforcement officials.

Left behind by US Airways, Shahin, president of the imams' group, called for a boycott of US Airways after an agent and his supervisor, without giving a reason, refused to sell him replacement tickets Tuesday morning.

"I'm not going to stay silent," Shahin said. "I came to this country to enjoy justice and freedom."

The US Airways supervisor told Shahin that his tickets had been refunded and that he would have to go to another airline. The supervisor offered Shahin a customer service phone number.

"I want to go home. I don't want phone numbers," Shahin said. "They have no reason to refuse service to us just because of the way we look."

He bought six one-way tickets at the Northwest Airlines counter, and the men flew to Phoenix without incident.

In a statement to police, a US Airways gate agent wrote that three of the men prayed in Arabic at the gate. "I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud," the gate agent said.

Said Shahin: "We were never bothering anyone, not saying anything loudly. We were just prostrating ourselves, the normal way we pray."

Devout Muslims pray five times a day, but practices vary among cultural groups, said Owais Bayunus, a Twin Cities Muslim scholar.

"Those who pray in the airport would be more conservative Muslims who stop to pray at the designated times no matter where they are," he said. "Others accept the fatwa (an opinion by an Islamic legal scholar) that it is acceptable to combine the prayers during travel."

Before passengers boarded, one became alarmed by an overheard discussion. "They seemed angry," he wrote in a police statement. "Mentioned `U.S.' and `killing Saddam.' Two men then swore slightly under their breath/mumbled. They spoke Arabic again. The gate called boarding for the flight. The men then chanted `Allah, Allah, Allah.'"

Marwan Sadeddin, another of the imams, said, "What bothers me the most is these false statements and lies that we were shouting, `Allah, Allah.' This never happened."

Another, Ahmad Shqeirat, said, "That is a lie. We were not talking politics. And even if we did, so what? What is suspicious about that?"

Once the six were seated, two in front, two in the middle and two in back, and paid visits to each other to chat, some passengers became alarmed, the police report said. One passed a note to a flight attendant citing the alleged comments about Allah and Saddam.

Flight attendants alerted the pilot, who called airport police and asked them to remove the men from the plane. They left "cooperatively," according to the police report.

A bomb-sniffing dog examined the men, their luggage and the entire airplane and found nothing. The plane left for Phoenix about three hours late after the other 141 passengers reboarded.

After being questioned by agents of the U.S. Marshals Service, the FBI, the Secret Service and the Transportation Security Administration, the men were released.

Asad Zaman, communications director for the Muslim American Society of Minnesota, said an Arizona MAS chapter member called him for help about 11 p.m. Monday because the six imams had not arrived and one had called his wife to say police detained them.

Within 10 minutes of a Minnesota imam's call to police, the six were free, Zaman said.

"This event would be the equivalent of Roman Catholic bishops being arrested in China because they wore clerical robes and invoked Jesus Christ in prayers," Zaman said.

Muslims Escorted Off Minneapolis Flight (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

A half-dozen Muslims were removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis on Monday evening after nervous passengers alerted the flight crew about suspicious behavior.

The men, who officials later learned were Islamic religious leaders, refused to leave the plane and were escorted by security off Flight 300 from Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport to Phoenix at 6:30 p.m.

Conflicting reports say the men were praying in the concourse or on the plane, and a Minnesota television reported that the imams were chanting "Allah, Allah, Allah," as they left the plane.

Douglas Hagmann, director of the Northeast Intelligence Network, a private organization that investigates terrorist threats, said his contacts are reporting the men did begin the prayers in the concourse, then continued prayers and discussions once on board.

"One of the passengers who understands Arabic passed a note to the crew that what she heard, she did not like," Mr. Hagmann said.

Patrick Hogan, spokesman for the Minneapolis-St. Paul Metropolitan Airports Commission, said the men reportedly made anti-American statements relating to the Iraq war, asked to change seats once inside the cabin, and that one requested an extender to make his seat belt larger even though he did not appear to need it.

"There was some peculiar behavior," Mr. Hagmann said.

In a statement released by US Airways yesterday, the airline said they "are diligently conducting our own investigation" and working with law-enforcement officials and government agencies.

"We are always concerned when passengers are inconvenienced and especially concerned when a situation occurs that causes customers to feel their dignity was compromised. We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind and will continue to exhaust our internal investigation until we know the facts of this case and can provide answers for the employees and customers involved in this incident," the statement said.

The imams, along with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, Minnesota Democrat and the first Muslim elected to Congress, had attended a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation.

A call and e-mail for comment to Mr. Ellison's campaign office were not returned.

The imams and officials of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) say the men were victims of prejudice and ignorance.

"We are concerned that crew members, passengers and security personnel may have succumbed to fear and prejudice based on stereotyping of Muslims and Islam," said Nihad Awad, CAIR's director. "CAIR is receiving more reports of 'flying while Muslim' and racial profiling incidents from members of the Islamic community nationwide."

The group is calling for congressional hearings on racial, religious and ethnic profiling at airports, and investigations by the Justice and Homeland Security departments. The Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties at DHS has already opened an investigation.

Mr. Hagmann called the incident "ideological jihad" and a "test run" to undermine airport security through litigation.

"This is a watershed event in this country -- one week before Thanksgiving when tensions are high -- and they are looking for this to be litigated ad nauseam," Mr. Hagmann said.

Report Finds DHS Lax On Contracting Procedures (WP)

By Robert O'harrow Jr. And Scott Higham

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Private consultants hired by the Department of Homeland Security have found widespread problems with its contracting operation, including nearly three dozen contract files that could not be located.

Files that could be found often lacked basic documentation required under federal rules, such as evidence that the department negotiated the best prices for taxpayers, according to a copy of the consultants' report obtained by The Washington Post.

"The inability to locate files and inconsistent file organization puts the government at risk in ensuring the contractor is fulfilling its contractual obligations and the government is meeting its contract administration responsibilities," the consultants wrote in their report.

The assessment underscores complaints by department auditors and outside experts that procurement officials persistently neglected contracting responsibilities as they spent billions of dollars after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks -- much of it on security systems that do not work as planned.

"This strongly suggests that we're buying the wrong stuff, the wrong way, possibly from the wrong contractors, and failing to check before, during or after," said Charles Tiefer, an expert on government contracting who teaches at the University of Baltimore School of Law.

The confidential report, delivered to department officials in March, focused on spending in fiscal 2005 by the Office of Procurement Operations. During that period, nearly $17.5 billion was spent department-wide on contracts for a variety of goods and services, including security at airports and borders, radiation-detection monitors, and information technology consultants.

Department spokesman Larry Orluskie said procurement officials are following several recommendations made in the report.

"We've acted upon each one of their findings," Orluskie said. "It was an internal look. We are going to bring them in again to make sure we are following up."

Last year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson and others at the agency acknowledged having trouble with contracting and promised to do better. They said they had made progress by hiring scores of contracting officials and by tightening rules.

But the confidential report adds weight to critics' contentions that contracting problems persist. Last week, the agency's inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, told a House panel that "expediency, poorly defined requirements and inadequate oversight" are creating "a high risk of cost overruns, mismanagement or failure."

The firm hired to write the report, Acquisition Solutions, examined a sample of 72 contract files for DHS, which wanted to determine whether it was following federal contracting laws and internal policies.

At the outset, the team of acquisition specialists could not locate 33 of the 72 contract files it had selected for the review, so the consultants had to select 33 others.

"The files were extremely difficult to locate and were organized in an inconsistent manner," they wrote.

The consultants sharply criticized an array of contracting procedures. Of the 72 contract files reviewed, only 14 were deemed to be in "excellent" shape. Those files contained evidence that the contracts were awarded with adequate competition and represented the best deal for taxpayers.

Forty-seven files met only "minimum" standards and showed little evidence of fair and reasonable pricing or supervision by contracting officials.

Eleven files were deemed to be "seriously inadequate," with key documents missing or incomplete and little evidence that the contracts were competitively awarded or prices were justified.

The consultants said some information in the files "seems to be just enough to 'get by.' "

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who is in line to assume chairmanship of the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said he intends to hold hearings on DHS contracting next year.

"I expect the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to conduct vigorous oversight of this issue in the 110th Congress," he said.

Fliers Urged To Ease Logjam (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 22, 2006

Aviation officials are waging an unprecedented campaign to warn travelers about new restrictions on carry-on bags that they fear could bog down lines during the busiest Thanksgiving travel weekend ever.

DOJ_NMG_0097106

The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is staging events at 66 airports to alert passengers that they can carry only limited amounts of liquids, aerosols and gels on airplanes. Airports are warning of the restrictions with ads, billboards and workers who hand out plastic bags that travelers must use to pack carry-on liquids.

A record 25 million passengers — up from 21.6 million last Thanksgiving — are projected to take flights Nov. 17 through Nov. 28.

"We're kind of bracing," said Tara Hamilton of Washington's Dulles and Reagan National airports, where high school students have been paid to remind travelers about security rules.

Lines on Sunday and Monday were a minute or two longer than a year ago, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. At Orlando International Airport, local resident Todd Elliott said the security line was about 40 minutes Tuesday morning, but other travelers around the USA said lines were mostly routine.

"TSA is very focused on keeping waits down," Howe said.

Many Thanksgiving travelers have not flown since the TSA restricted the amount of liquids passengers may carry, which could lead to uncertainty about the rule, Howe said. The restrictions took effect after British authorities disrupted a plot to bomb U.S.-bound airliners using liquid explosives.

Passengers must pack all carry-on liquids in a single zip-top, quart-size plastic bag. The liquid containers can be no larger than 3 ounces. Larger quantities may be packed in checked luggage.

"Many people don't realize we want the stuff in a clear plastic bag so we can see it," said Cris Soulia, a screener at San Diego airport.

Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, predicted reasonable security lines at most airports. "It's going to be all hands on deck to avoid any embarrassment," Mitchell said.

Airports and the TSA typically beef up staff during travel crunches. In Los Angeles, LAX recently completed a year-long process of adding eight security lanes to ease some of the USA's longest lines.

Allison Harris of Washington tried to go through security Tuesday at Dulles airport with a half-filled 5-ounce bottle of hair gel. A screener told her the bottle was too big, so Harris returned to the terminal to buy 3-ounce bottles, poured the gel in and went back through security.

"It's very irritating," Harris said. "It's probably my own fault for not thinking about it beforehand."

Air Officials Get Set For Travel Trial (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Larry Copeland

USA Today, November 22, 2006

This Thanksgiving poses one of the biggest recent tests to the nation's aviation system — whether or not airport security lines will flow smoothly despite a record number of passengers and new security rules.

Many travelers and officials are nervously optimistic.

Some warn that a large number of inexperienced passengers facing unfamiliar carry-on restrictions will bring about fearsome backups.

The test comes at a crucial time for the struggling airline industry and the Transportation Security Administration.

Thanksgiving is one of the busiest travel periods — 25 million passengers are expected from Nov. 17-28 — and starts the crucial holiday travel season. The TSA, an oft-criticized agency created after 9/11, could face heightened scrutiny when Democrats take control of Congress in January. It could also face criticism if lines are delayed.

The weekend's significance is underscored by an awareness campaign by the TSA, airlines and airports to highlight new restrictions on the amount of liquids, aerosols and gels passengers can carry on airplane cabins. News stories, posters, ads and e-mails have inundated travelers in virtually every major city and smaller areas from Eau Claire, Wis., to Midland, Texas.

David and Sherry Lautares got the message. David saw a TV news story Monday about security rules. Sherry got an e-mail from Delta Air Lines on the subject that day.

By the time the Lautareses and their daughter, Molly, 9, got to Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International on Tuesday to fly to New York, they could recite the new security policy: “It's 3-1-1,” David Lautares said. “Three ounces of liquid or gel, 1-quart bag and one bag per passenger in the security bin.”

Lautares may be an exception. Stan Kotowski, a frequent flier from Princeton, N.J., saw “ungodly” lines two weeks ago at airports. Passengers didn't know about the liquid restrictions, or they didn't care.

“It's ignorance and arrogance,” Kotowski said. “Some people had absolutely no clue.”

That worries aviation consultant Michael Boyd. He fears a “lollapalooza” of security delays on what he calls “amateur” weekend when the ill-informed and impossible-to-educate amass at airports.

Ben DeCosta disagrees. The Atlanta airport manager pointed to garbage bins by security checkpoints to prove the success of a publicity campaign featuring ads and banner-size airport posters. On Tuesday, the bins mostly held empty water bottles and innocuous trash.

When the restrictions took effect in late summer, 6-ounce toothpaste tubes and 4-ounce shampoo bottles filled the bins — contraband taken from travelers unaware of the policy. Restrictions began after authorities said they foiled a plot in London to bomb U.S.-bound planes with liquid explosives.

“It's a campaign with the TSA to make the infrequent traveler, who's traveling a lot during the holiday period, aware of the rules,” DeCosta said.

Aviation consultant Robert Mann said the TSA's campaign was “far more comprehensive” than in its previous security changes, such as when small scissors and tools were allowed in cabins last December.

At Los Angeles International Airport on Tuesday, lines were smooth. “It's moving pretty fast,” Hawaii-bound Jamie Olivas said. “Last year, this year, they're about the same.”

FBI Struggles To Win Trust Of Muslim, Arab Communities (BVND)

By Marisa Taylor

The Belleville News Democrat, November 22, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. - When a local FBI agent wanted to make contacts in this city's tight-knit Muslim community, he started knocking on doors.

The agent didn't look, much less act, like a typical investigator. He spoke Arabic and he wore street clothes, not the suit and tie favored by many in the bureau.

"He seemed really friendly," said Muhammad Sahli, a U.S. citizen approached at his home last month by the agent. "So I invited him in."

But the agent's questions about international terrorist organizations unnerved Sahli. The agent wanted to know if Sahli knew anyone with ties to extremist groups. Sahli, a Muslim married to a Christian woman, said he didn't.

"You ask yourself, `Why me?'" said Sahli, a 71-year-old retired chemist. "When you've never had a visit from the FBI before in your life, you feel a certain amount of anxiety, even though you've done nothing wrong."

For many Muslim and Arab-Americans these days, meeting a FBI agent can be an unsettling, even terrifying experience.

Beginning almost immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the FBI began to root out suspected terrorists, and Arab and Muslim communities became the bureau's top targets. Agents rounded up hundreds of people for questioning. They raided Muslim charities, monitored mosques for radiation and held refugees for months because of security checks.

To regain the trust of Muslim and Arab-Americans, the FBI has embarked on an aggressive national outreach program. The bureau's efforts, which include mosque visits and one-on-one meetings, have become so pervasive in certain cities that some young Muslim-Americans refer to the agency as the "Friendly Brotherhood of Islam."

Yet across the country, many participants wonder what the interactions achieve when mistrust remains the biggest obstacle. Some community activists compare the tone of the current encounters to those during the Red Scare of the 1950s, when U.S. citizens were singled out as suspected communists and expected to prove their loyalty to the United States.

"You never hear the FBI say that part of the reason there has not been another terrorist attack in this country is because radical extremists have not found a home in American mosques," said Rebecca Abou-Chedid, the director of government relations for the Arab American Institute in Washington, D.C. "It's as if they believe that we know about terrorist cells and we're not telling them."

In Detroit, the home of an estimated 200,000 Arab-Americans and immigrants, agents and activists sometimes argue for hours over terrorism-related investigations. Many Muslim leaders think the bureau has targeted the wrong people in its effort to root out extremists.

"It is very difficult," said Daniel Roberts, the special agent in charge of the FBI's Detroit field office. "To be honest, I sometimes wonder why we do this when we so often are beaten up in a verbal sense."

Agents aren't apologizing for their tactics and respond that they have a duty to pursue any possible U.S. ties to terrorists. More than 260 defendants have been convicted of terrorism-related charges in the United States and trials are pending for 150 more, according to the Justice Department's latest estimates released in June.

But agents also recognize that the alienation that Muslims and Arabs feel could undermine the bureau's hunt for domestic terrorists. If the fear subsided, more citizens might come forward with tips, agents believe, at a time when the bureau is under mounting pressure to collect better intelligence.

Muslim and Arab-American leaders said they, too, are eager to improve their relations with the FBI. If that happened, many of them said, they would urge their children to join a federal law enforcement agency that's eager to recruit them. Now, most don't.

Muslims and Arabs also hold out a small but persistent hope that if FBI agents trusted them more, other Americans would, too.

But experts said the bureau's mission is made more difficult because of outreach techniques that often differ by region.

In Richmond, Muslim leaders have met with FBI agents several times over the years. So far, federal authorities haven't pursued any terrorism investigations against local Muslims.

When they heard an agent was knocking on doors during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, though, many community leaders couldn't help but feel alarmed.

FBI officials later confirmed that the agent wasn't investigating any of the men who were visited. Instead, he was assigned to make contacts with the Muslim community as part of the FBI's local outreach.

Community leaders said they wouldn't have objected to the interviews if they'd been warned about them.

"We need to be respected as law-abiding citizens," said Malik Khan, a board member of the Islamic Center of Virginia in Richmond.

Cliff Holly, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Richmond, said he didn't want to have to "ask permission" from community leaders to talk to people.

"I appreciate their perspective," he said. "But when you meet with large groups, it's difficult to develop any long-term relationships."

To improve relations with local Muslims, his office paid for the agent's Arabic classes and brought in an activist to talk to other agents about Muslim culture, Holly said.

"Nobody's picking on anybody," he said. "We're just going out and saying hello to people in the community."

FBI officials in other cities, however, said they inform local Muslim leaders first, to avoid alienating the entire community.

Michael Rolince, former head of the FBI's International Terrorism Operations Section, said the bureau remains divided over how to approach Muslims and Arabs when it's not in the context of a terrorism investigation.

Before he retired from the agency in 2005, Rolince asked FBI headquarters to fund a program that Northeastern University in Boston would host. The program required $1 million in start-up money to bring leaders, activists and agents together to talk.

But critics raised questions about some of the participating groups' alleged ties to the Muslim Brotherhood, a secretive international organization that some Arab, U.S. and Israeli officials blame for provoking violence in the Middle East. Rolince said he disagreed with the critics' assessments of the U.S.-based organizations.

"There's a right-wing contingent in town that believes we should not work with any of these groups," Rolince said.

DOJ_NMG_0097109

To Rolince's dismay, FBI Director Robert Mueller decided not to authorize funding for the program, citing budget constraints.

As a result, the FBI's 56 field offices don't have a uniform way of handling outreach, Rolince said. Some FBI agents work with the groups that sparked the funding controversy. Other agents don't.

"It's not in the best interest of the community or the FBI to deal with each organization in 56 different ways," he said. "It sends a mixed message to the community and to the agents."

According to a study released earlier this year by the Vera Institute of Justice, seven out of 16 U.S. cities with significant Arab and Muslim populations didn't have active FBI outreach programs. The institute, a nonprofit organization in New York, wasn't permitted to identify the cities as part of its agreement with the FBI.

In Raleigh, N.C., for example, where about 20,000 Muslims live, Muslim leaders say the FBI doesn't meet routinely with them. Instead, agents talk to individual activists, often to press them about potential terrorist activity.

In Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, New York and Detroit, agents meet regularly with groups of Muslims and Arabs. The larger community gatherings help the leaders feel less singled out, agents said.

Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the FBI's Washington, D.C., field office, compared the outreach effort to talking to Italian-Americans about organized crime in the mafia's heyday.

"How did we attack the problem? We got to know the community," he said. "Did that mean if you were Italian-American you were part of organized crime? Of course not."

But more contact isn't always better. Although the FBI met more often with community leaders than most local police departments did, Muslims and Arabs trusted them less, the Vera Institute of Justice concluded. Community leaders said local police officers were less likely than the FBI to assume they had links to terrorism.

Lacking a consistent program, FBI agents sometimes feud over what division within the bureau should take the lead in discussions, Muslim and Arab leaders say. In some cities, the FBI's counterterrorism units oversee the bureau's interaction with the community. In others, outreach officers oversee it.

"It's like dealing with Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," said Randy Hamud, a San Diego attorney who has participated in one of the outreach meetings. "It's as if we have to remind the FBI: `We're a community, we're not a cell.'"

A. Brett Hovington, the FBI's supervisory special agent in charge of the community relations unit, said the bureau has tried to change the perception that outreach and counterterrorism efforts are connected. However, he said local agents need the freedom to decide how to approach Muslims and Arabs.

"Was the message kind of blurred? I would say it probably was," Hovington said. "But I think we're becoming better at being clear about our intentions."

FBI officials said agents have become savvier about approaching Muslims and Arabs after meeting with them more often. Agents now contact leaders to clear up misunderstandings or to coordinate law-enforcement efforts. Minneapolis agents, for example, called leaders when they needed to interview members of the city's large Somali population. The witnesses were less afraid and more cooperative because they'd been reassured that the case had nothing to do with terrorism.

"I would expect there to be friction," said John Miller, the FBI assistant director who oversees the national outreach program. "I'd also expect that we'd be able to talk about it."

But Muslim and Arab leaders also differ on how they should respond to the FBI's outreach. Should they meet monthly with an agency that could turn its sights on them, their family or their friends? What should they do when an FBI agent appears at their door? Should they invite the agent in or call a lawyer?

Consensus can be difficult to reach because Muslim and Arab communities in the United States are diverse, ranging from Iraqi Christians to African-Americans to third-generation Lebanese-Americans.

Immigrants can be especially terrified of the federal agents because they recall abusive secret police practices of repressive regimes back home.

"This business of outreach is an oxymoron for many people," said Ali Galaydh, a former prime minister of Somalia and professor of public policy at the University of Minnesota. "Law enforcement wanting to reach you means they want to get you."

Despite their misgivings about the FBI, Muslim and Arab leaders said they're more than willing to provide any information if they thought it could prevent a terrorist attack.

After London authorities in August uncovered a plot to blow up planes, Miami Muslim leaders called the FBI to ask for a briefing. Since then, agents have been assigned as contacts for imams at almost 40 mosques.

"In a way, we're in this together," said Abou-Chedid of the Arab American Institute. "We all know that if there is ever another attack, our community and the FBI will be the first to be blamed."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Eats With GIs In Hawaii, Heads Home (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 22, 2006

President Bush circled the globe on his Asian journey but never strayed far from the subject of Iraq. He dined with U.S. troops in Hawaii before heading home Tuesday, telling them their efforts "will determine how your children and grandchildren live."

Bush, who was due back at the White House late Tuesday night, visited Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia during an eight-day trip aimed at assuring Asia of America's commitment to the region. He even found time to meet briefly with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow.

Still, Iraq and the war on terror kept the president's attention. In Vietnam, asked about lessons from that war, Bush answered that in Iraq, "we'll succeed unless we quit."

And he found himself in front of cameras on Tuesday at Hickam Air Force Base condemning the assassination earlier in the day of an anti-Syrian Lebanese leader.

Bush was briefed in Hawaii at the Oahu headquarters of the U.S. Pacific Command, whose territory spreads from the West Coast of the U.S. to the Indian Ocean.

Before that he ate and chatted with the troops, at an open-sided mess hall.

The president made his way through the food line, piling his plate with ham, eggs, a biscuit topped with gravy, and potatoes. He shook hands with troops in camouflage uniforms. Then, after eating, he thanked the military personnel for their service "on behalf of a grateful nation."

"You serve at a time when we witness an ideological struggle between those who love freedom and those who hate freedom," the president said. "I'm determined, like you are determined, that freedom prevails."

Though Bush was cheered by troops and others on Oahu — a contrast to the thousands of anti-war demonstrators a day before in Indonesia — his visit wasn't without incident for those around him.

Three police motorcycle officers were injured when they crashed on slick pavement while escorting his motorcade on Tuesday. Two were taken by ambulance to a local hospital, where one was described as in serious condition and another was described as stable.

Members of the White House medical team — including an ambulance — were cut loose from the motorcade to help, said Dr. Richard Tubb, Bush's doctor. Local ambulance and fire units were sent, too.

Also, acting White House Travel Office Director Gregg Pitts was beaten and robbed by at least two men while out in Honolulu Monday night. Pitts suffered head and other injuries in the attack. He was awake and alert but remained behind at a Honolulu hospital because of a possible concussion, White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Bush's Asia trip was shadowed by talk of wars past and present.

His visit to Vietnam inspired a fresh debate about whether today's increasingly difficult war in Iraq has dangerous parallels to the failed American war in Southeast Asia three decades ago. The president ended his Asian tour with the stop in Hawaii, where the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor launched the United States' entry into World War II.

The Iraq situation was complicated Monday when Iranian leaders invited the presidents of Iraq and Syria to a weekend summit in Tehran to discuss the war. The move, viewed as an attempt by Iran to counter U.S. influence in the region, was received with skepticism at the State Department in Washington.

Then, on Tuesday, came the assassination of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel, a foe of Syrian involvement in his country.

Bush denounced the killing, saying that Syria and Iran were trying to undermine the democratically elected government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

He stopped short of specifically blaming Iran or Syria, but called for a full investigation to identify "those people and those forces" behind the assassination.

Kramer's Tirade, Adding Insult to Inaccuracy

Hey, funnyman: You nailed the wrong guy.

That's what Darryl Pitts would like to tell Michael Richards, the "Seinfeld" star who spewed racist slurs at an African American man after his stand-up gig at a Los Angeles comedy club was interrupted last Friday.

The irony of the insult, according to audience member Pitts: It wasn't the black guy who interrupted him. The black man sat next to the alleged heckler. Pitts told our colleague Darryl Fears the two were in a group of roughly 10 people who ambled into the Laugh Factory during Richards's routine. The comic ordered them to shut up, then asked, " 'What are you talking about?' "

The black guy spoke up: "My friend doesn't think you're funny." The loud-talking friend "was maybe Arab or Hispanic but not black," said Pitts, who was not part of the group. "The way it's been portrayed is that a group of black guys came to the club and were disorderly . . . and that's inaccurate, absolutely."

What followed -- as captured on video and circulated on the Internet -- was shocking. Said Pitts, who himself is black: "It was like buckshot. It hit everyone. . . . I have a difficult time accepting his apology -- 72 hours later. What did he do? Read a black history book? Why the change?"The Bushes Hit a Few Bumps in the Road

A White House staffer was badly beaten and robbed during the president's stopover in Hawaii on the way back from Asia. Gregg Pitts, acting director of the White House Travel Office, suffered a broken nose in the Monday night mugging on a Honolulu street and was left behind in a hospital yesterday while the rest of the presidential entourage continued back to D.C.

Then, yesterday morning, as POTUS headed to Hickam Air Force Base on Oahu, three local police officers accompanying the motorcade crashed their motorcycles on a rain-slicked street. Two officers were hospitalized, White House officials said -- one with broken bones, the other with a neck injury.

And in another hemisphere altogether . . . ABC News reported yesterday that elder-by-seconds twin Barbara joined Panama-based sister Jenna on a trouble-scarred trip to Argentina. ABC, citing "law enforcement reports" it obtained, said someone stole a purse and cellphone from Barbara at a Buenos Aires restaurant -- right under the noses of her Secret Service agents. Also, an agent accompanying them was mugged during his off-hours. (Unclear when the reported two-week trip took place; Barbara was photographed at the Yale-Princeton game just 10 days ago.) White House Staffer Robbed, Beaten In Waikiki (KITV)

KITV-TV, November 22, 2006

HONOLULU -- The acting director of the White House Travel Office was robbed and beaten in Waikiki early on Tuesday morning outside a nightclub, according to Honolulu police.

"He was knocked down, punched, kicked -- his wallet and id were stolen," Honolulu Police Department Capt. Frank Fujii said.

Pitts' passport and international phone were also taken.

Pitts left the bar alone. He walked through International Marketplace, where he was confronted by three men beaten up and robbed, according to a source familiar with the case.

His friends went looking for him and found him lying in a pool of blood.

People familiar with Waikiki said muggings happen occasionally. Police said they have no evidence of an increase in violence against tourists.

Pitts accompanied President George W. Bush on a brief visit to Hawaii. The stop came after an eight-day trip to Asia.

While Bush stayed at Hickam Air Force Base, White House staff, crew from the airplane and reporters stayed at Hilton Hawaiian Village in Waikiki.

Paramedics treated Pitts and took him to Queen's Medical Center. He did not return with the president to Washington.

Iraq's Government Hampered By Suspicions (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

BAGHDAD — When the Ministry of Municipalities and Public Works dispatched crews to the Amil neighborhood last month to repair a sewer line that had been spewing raw human waste into the street for weeks, residents were encouraged.

But instead of repairing the pipe, the workers wound up rupturing the freshwater line. They left the entire mess for someone else.

Iraqis elected their leaders in December, hoping that a government by the people would do something for the people. Eleven months later, officials acknowledge that their efforts have been mostly a failure. And, as with the busted sewer line of Amil, government involvement often creates a bigger problem than it solves.

Despite U.S. pressure for results, Iraq's elected officials have been unable to overcome their mistrust of one another and improve security or tackle the major political and economic issues — from murderous cops to the sewage woes of Amil.

Fed up with ministers he says were foisted on him by political factions, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised a Cabinet reshuffle. He is scheduled to convene the body this week to address the deepening political divisions and a threatened walkout by the Sunni Arab bloc.

But his resolve may not be enough to overcome the government's inherent frailties and limitations.

Officials say Baghdad's authority has been undermined by the ubiquity of U.S. troops and by militias, neither of which answers to the government.

But above all, the sectarian balance on which the government was formed has made it impossible make big decisions or ferret out corruption or incompetence.

"If Maliki discovered that one of his ministers in one of the political parties was involved in corruption or brutality, he could not fire him, because [the minister is] backed up by another political party," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for Iraq's main Sunni party, which is part of the ruling coalition. "He'll be accused of going against [the] minister's party."

The government even backtracked on its controversial decision to issue an arrest warrant for the country's leading Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari, amid threats that the Sunni coalition would pull out of the government.

DOJ_NMG_0097113

Some blame U.S. policy, saying it puts too much faith on consensus and balance as a panacea for Iraq's ills.

Iraq's constitution — with its complex system of checks and balances and stripped-down executive authority — limits what any leader can do.

The government "has been created by political agreements giving every side a veto against the other side," said Abbas Bayati, a Shiite lawmaker.

At every crossroads, the government's large Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs huddle noisily to come up with internal agreement before heading to the negotiating table to squabble again with the other factions. Insiders say little gets discussed in Maliki's Cabinet without the approval of each party in the three sprawling blocs.

At the ministry level, a raft of corruption cases has struck fear in the hearts of administrators, who allow money to pile up rather than become entangled in a graft case. "There is an ambience where people are afraid of making decisions," an official said.

Even when decisions are made, there is no oversight to make sure follow-up action is taken, nor any coordination among ministries.

"The government plays like a football team," said Mustafa Hiti, a Sunni lawmaker. "Even if [Oil Minister Hussein] Shahristani is good, you need another ministry of transportation, interior and housing to do their job in order for him to be effective."

U.S. efforts to get institutions up and running have been hampered by the crudest of stumbling blocks. For example, American troops recently visited a west Baghdad courthouse, where the road leading to the decrepit four-story building was flooded with sewage and the court had run out of diesel to fuel its generator.

Based on his most recent remarks, including a frustrated speech to parliament this month, Maliki appears to have recognized the problems. But many say it may be too late, that even the finest government officials can't enforce good policy with a weak government.

Month after month, Maliki has promised to disarm and disband the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on the streets. Sunnis say the government has not done enough — failing, for example, to follow up on leads from those freed after men dressed in police uniforms brazenly kidnapped dozens of people from a Ministry of Higher Education building last week.

"The government hasn't moved a finger to investigate," Jabouri said. "The government is either weak or in collusion with the kidnappers or has lost control of the militias."

Maliki's credibility had already been faltering, officials said.

"I think the government is seen as representing one part of Iraqi society," said a Western analyst in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity for security reasons.

"When the Sunnis under Saddam [Hussein] dominated Iraq, they also represented one segment of the society, but they had an overwhelming force to back that up. These guys don't. There are other forces out there."

Bush Plans To Meet With Maliki (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

President Bush plans to fly to the Middle East next week to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, as the two leaders try to overcome recent tensions and revitalize the war effort, the White House announced last night.

The surprise trip underscored the accelerating efforts by Bush and his team to come up with a fresh approach to the war after a period of spiraling violence in Iraq and voter rejection in midterm elections at home. Bush recently ordered various agencies to consolidate an ongoing Iraq policy review in the hope of reaching a new consensus.

The White House has pressed Maliki to speed transition of security responsibility to Iraqi forces, and the two leaders will review conclusions of a joint panel they appointed to find ways to do that.

"We're not looking for a big, bold announcement," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One last night, as Bush returned from an unrelated eight-day overseas trip to Asia. "This is an opportunity for the president and Prime Minister Maliki to get together, to get a report from this commission they have adopted. This is obviously an important time for both Iraqis and Americans in developing a way ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0097114

Bush will meet with Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 29-30, after he attends a previously scheduled NATO summit in Riga, Latvia. Hadley said the administration's own Iraq review would not be finished before the meeting, nor would a separate report be completed by the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group. But the meeting will give Bush a chance to get Maliki's views, Hadley said.

Administration officials have at times expressed frustration with Maliki's government for not doing more to take over security in Iraq and rein in sectarian violence.

Bush, Al-Maliki Set To Confer In Jordan On Iraqi Security (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE (AP) -- President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will meet next week in Jordan to discuss the security situation in Iraq.

In a joint statement, the two leaders said: "We will meet in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 29-30 to continue our consultation on building security and stability in Iraq."

Press secretary Tony Snow distributed the statement to reporters returning home with Mr. Bush yesterday from an eight-day Asia trip. Mr. Bush will fly directly to Amman from next week's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia.

"We will focus our discussions on current developments in Iraq, progress made to date in the deliberations of a high-level joint committee on transferring security responsibilities and the role of the region in supporting Iraq," the statement said. "We reiterate our commitment to building the foundations of a peaceful, democratic and secure Iraq and to strengthening the partnership between our two nations."

Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki last met July 25 in Washington.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters that the idea for a meeting came up a week or more ago and that plans accelerated in the last few days.

"We're not looking for a big, bold announcement," he said.

On Monday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad asked the presidents of Iraq and Syria to attend a weekend summit in Tehran, a move seen as another effort by Iran to play a strong role in the Middle East.

Asked about what role Iran and Syria should be playing, Mr. Hadley said: "We think it is important that Iraq be speaking directly to these countries and making it clear to them that they need to play a positive role in seeking security, stability and democracy in Iraq. ... We are supportive of Iraqi government officials as they deliver that message."

Bush's Best Defense May Be His Father (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

ABU DHABI, UNITED ARAB EMIRATES — Former President George H.W. Bush took on Arab critics of his son, the current President Bush, during a testy exchange Tuesday at a leadership conference in the capital of this U.S. ally.

"My son is an honest man," Bush told members of the audience, who harshly criticized the younger Bush's foreign policy.

"We do not respect your son. We do not respect what he's doing all over the world," a woman in the audience bluntly told Bush after his speech.

Bush, 82, appeared stunned as others in the audience whooped and whistled.

The oil-rich Persian Gulf used to be safe territory for the former president, who brought Arab leaders together in a coalition that drove then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's troops from Kuwait in 1991.

But gratitude for the elder Bush was overshadowed at the conference by hostility toward his son, whose invasion of Iraq and support for Israel are deeply unpopular in the region.

The hostile comments came during a question-and-answer session after Bush finished a folksy address on leadership by telling the audience how deeply hurt he feels when his presidential son is criticized.

"This son is not going to back away," Bush said, his voice quavering. "He's not going to change his view because some poll says this or some poll says that, or some heartfelt comments from the lady who feels deeply in her heart about something. You can't be president of the United States and conduct yourself if you're going to cut and run. This is going to work out in Iraq."

Bush also told the audience its derisive hoots were mild compared with the reaction he got in Germany in the 1980s after persuading that country to deploy U.S. nuclear missiles.

He told the audience he was extremely proud of his sons, the current president and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

One audience member asked the former president what advice he gives his son on Iraq. Bush said the presence of reporters prevented an answer.

"If I did what you ask me to do — tell you what advice I give my son — that would then be flashed all over the world," he said.

"If it happened to deviate one iota, one little inch, from what the president's doing or thinks he ought to be doing, it would be terrible. It'd bring great anxiety not only to him but to his supporters."

Pentagon Cites Alternative To Baker Report (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Pentagon is drafting its own new options for winning in Iraq, in part, to give President Bush counterproposals to fall back on in case the Iraq Study Group comes up with ideas he does not like, defense officials say.

Meanwhile, study group co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, told The Washington Times yesterday that he and co-chairman James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, have nearly completed a first draft report.

Mr. Hamilton said the two men hope to complete it this weekend, give it to the eight other Iraq Study Group members in time for a meeting next week to review it. The report contains Mr. Hamilton's and Mr. Baker's assessment of the Iraq situation and recommendations to Mr. Bush.

The 10 members will then accept, reject or modify the ideas, and Mr. Hamilton cautioned that the panel has no deadline to produce a final report.

"The whole thing could be changed," Mr. Hamilton said. "We do feel like we should move ahead with due diligence."

Mr. Hamilton declined to discuss the options. Mr. Baker has said publicly he believes in talking to one's enemies, an indication that the study group will recommend opening dialogues with Syria and Iran, two U.S. adversaries that border Iraq and support the insurgents.

Mr. Hamilton said the group has heard from more than 250 people, both in and out of government.

"We are inundated with recommendations at this point," he said. "I literally can't go anywhere without people making recommendations to me. But that's good."

The Baker-Hamilton group will not be the only source of new ideas on Iraq for the president in a war that an increasing number of Americans say lacks progress. The Pentagon is also leading an extensive review.

The defense officials said they do not want the Iraq Study Group's options to go unchallenged in case it proposes items that Mr. Bush does not like, such as a timetable for removing troops.

"I don't think anyone is comfortable with one organization coming up with a list of recommendations," said a senior Pentagon official involved in the war review, adding that the Pentagon review could produce ideas that compete with or are counter to the Iraq Study Group's.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, began leading the Pentagon's review in September. The Joint Staff, the Joint Chiefs planning arm, is studying ideas -- from adding troops to reducing them as well as making new efforts to win the support of Sunni Muslims who lead the insurgency.

A likely option will be to find ways to accelerate the deployment of Iraqi brigades, defense officials say. This is a move advocated by House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican. In theory, some officials see it as the only promising option for reducing the American presence in Iraq and thus reducing casualties.

An adviser to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said, "If we had a silver bullet, we would have fired it a long time ago."

Defense officials say they doubt that Gen. Pace will recommend a major increase in troops. The Army today is hard-pressed to maintain the bulk of 147,000 troops in Iraq. Stateside brigades lack basic equipment on which to train because the Army puts deployed units at the top of the priority list for weapons and other equipment.

Mr. Rumsfeld is leaving the Pentagon next month after the expected Senate confirmation of Robert M. Gates as his successor. The bulk of the review work is falling on Gen. Pace, who under law is the top military adviser to the president.

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the region, has made a passionate case for keeping American troop levels where they are now, thus requiring Gen. Pace to overrule a combatant commander if he wants a troop increase.

"Our troops' posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Gen. Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command, last week told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "and then we need to assess whether or not we can bring major combat units out of there."

Interventionism's Realistic Future (WP)

By Robert D. Kaplan

Hard-core foreign policy realists (the kind who say this country should rarely intervene again, anywhere) are hoping that in the wake of our comeuppance in Iraq things will be going their way. That is to say, U.S. foreign policy will be defined by an obdurate caution, coupled with a ruthless, almost mathematical application of balance-of-power principles. You'd think -- to hear some of them talk -- that we're about to emulate China, which seeks only energy sources and advantageous trade agreements and cares nothing at all for the moral improvement of regimes in such places as Zimbabwe, Burma and Uzbekistan.

This is nonsense. Our foreign policy is about to experience an adjustment, not a flip-flop. Neither political party will support anything else if it really wants to elect a president in 2008. Just look at the dismay in this country over our failure to intervene in Darfur, even given the burden we already carry in Iraq. To be sure, the recent evidence that our democratic system cannot be violently exported will temper our Wilsonian principles, but it will not bury them. Pure realism -- without a hint of optimism or idealism -- would immobilize our mass immigrant democracy, which has always seen itself as an agent of change.

Iraq will merely close a post-Cold War chapter in American foreign policy, one that began with the Persian Gulf War -- and with Bosnia. After the collapse of communism in 1989, idealism, the export of democracy and humanitarian interventionism were all the rage among journalists and intellectuals -- much as realism, restraint and benign dictatorship are now. Ten years ago Liberia, Sierra Leone and other countries less institutionally developed than Iraq were considered prime candidates for liberal change. Back then, people such as Brent Scowcroft and James Baker were attacked not just by neoconservatives but by liberal internationalists, too. In those first, heady post-Cold War years, to be called a "realist" was practically an insult.

The Balkan interventions, because they paid strategic dividends, appeared to justify the idealistic missionary approach to foreign policy. The 1995 intervention in Bosnia changed the debate from "Should NATO Exist?" to "Should NATO Expand?" Our 1999 war in Kosovo, as much as the events of Sept. 11, 2001, allowed for the eventual expansion of NATO to the Black Sea. It also led to the toppling of Yugoslav strongman Slobodan Milosevic, without chaos ensuing. Neoconservatives and others who had supported our actions in Bosnia and Kosovo then carried the spirit of this policy to its limits in Iraq.

And so what began in 1995 with a limited air and land campaign in the western, most-developed part of the former Ottoman Empire ended with a mass infantry invasion eight years later in its eastern, least-developed part. Not only was this last intervention far more ambitious than the first, it was also far less competently executed in its occupation phase. Thus it failed.

The lesson is not that we won't intervene again. We will, and often. But we will do so with the caution and hesitation shown in the 1990s and only as part of an authentic coalition. To wit, just as NATO's war in Kosovo had a British face and voice -- that of its spokesman, Jamie Shea -- any intervention in North Korea (should it ever come to that) will put the South Korean military front and center and will have the implicit cooperation of the Chinese army. Otherwise, we won't do it.

The expansion of our military deployments in Africa, as well as the emergence of NATO as a global constabulary force, points to an activist military presence overseas. From Senegal on the Atlantic to Djibouti on the Gulf of Aden -- across the entire Sahara -- Marines and Army Special Forces have been conducting training missions -- not only to field indigenous forces in the hunt for Islamic terrorists but also to professionalize the militaries of fledgling democracies and develop the backbone of an American-advised, pan-African intervention force to handle future Darfurs. The drawdown of our forces in Iraq, no matter how humiliating the circumstances, will eventually free up equipment and manpower for such smaller and less controversial deployments, which will always have a civil affairs element.

NATO is moving on a parallel track. What started after 1989 with train-and-equip missions to reform former Warsaw Pact military forces in Eastern Europe has expanded to the Caucasus and Central Asia under the Partnership for Peace program. NATO's current mission in Afghanistan and its restructuring under Marine Gen. James Jones to a more sea-based, expeditionary force signifies how it will be able to deploy faster and more often to deal with out-of-area emergencies.

Our military and civilian agencies will be expected to deal with many emergencies as we enter an era when more people than ever before will be killed or made homeless by natural disasters as populations rise in environmentally fragile zones. The tsunami rescue effort of 2004-05, led by U.S. Pacific Command, was a curtain raiser for deployments to come.

The debacle in Iraq has reinforced the realist dictum, disparaged by idealists in the 1990s, that the legacies of geography, history and culture really do set limits on what can be accomplished in any given place. But the experience in the Balkans reinforced an idealist dictum that is equally true: One should always work near the limits of what is possible rather than cynically give up on any place. In this decade idealists went too far; in the previous one, it was realists who did not go far enough.

Iraq has relegitimized realism, which is a good thing. But without an idealistic component to our foreign policy, there would be nothing to distinguish us from our competitors. And that, in and of itself, would lead to the decline of American power.

Lessons From The Saudis (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

While the nation debates what to do about the disaster in Iraq, I have been pondering a disaster that hasn't happened -- in Saudi Arabia. There are some lessons in the Saudi story that may help clarify the Bush administration's choices as it nears crunch time in the region.

First, some background: Ten years ago Osama bin Laden declared war on the United States to "expel the infidels from the Arab peninsula." One theme of his Aug. 23, 1996, fatwa was that for all its military power, America was weak. It had fled from terrorist attacks in Beirut and Somalia, and it would flee Saudi Arabia as well. Bin Laden said of his terrorist cadres: "These youths love death even as you love life."

The truth of those words became clear on Sept. 11, 2001, when 15 Saudi-born terrorists led a suicide attack on the symbols of American power. And in some ways, al-Qaeda's game plan has worked: America's botched occupation of Iraq triggered a ferocious reaction there, and now the American public is losing patience with the war, just as bin Laden would have predicted.

Given these setbacks for America, it's easy to forget that bin Laden has failed utterly in his strategic goal in the Sept. 11 attacks, which was to topple the ruling monarchy in his home country of Saudi Arabia. The oil kingdom, the real prize in the region, is stronger and more secure than it was five years ago.

Saudi Arabia is, to be sure, not exactly a rock of stability, but its gains are highlighted in a recent study by Nawaf Obaid, a clear-headed Saudi analyst who advises his government. He noted that since May 2003, Saudi security forces have foiled more than 25 major terrorist attacks; they have captured or killed 264 al-Qaeda operatives and arrested 845 other people with links to al-Qaeda. Of the 26 terrorists on the Saudi most-wanted list, all but one have been captured or killed.

Perhaps more important, the Saudis have begun to crack the network of religious extremists that gave al-Qaeda a platform. The Saudi Interior Ministry, once a hidden source of support for the jihadists, now oversees what Obaid calls an "ideological reeducation program" supervised by religious scholars and university professors. More than 400 people have been released from this program, Obaid says.

The House of Saud, the mysterious clan that rules the oil kingdom, is also steering a steadier course under King Abdullah. Almost unnoticed last month, the Saudis announced a new council to oversee the transition to the next generation of leadership. As with many aspects of Saudi governance, the details are murky, but the plan appears to provide a stable legal framework for selecting a successor to the king and crown prince -- easing the danger of a future political crisis.

What are the lessons in Saudi Arabia's move back from the brink of potential disaster? The most important is that the Saudis decided to take charge of their own security rather than relying on an America that many in the kingdom resented. After

2003 the Saudis realized that they faced a deadly terrorist threat and began to fight it aggressively: They focused on national solutions; they reduced the visible, humiliating presence of American troops; they pursued political reforms; they increased oil production.

How does this apply to Iraq? Like the Saudis, the Iraqis will have to save themselves, working within the authentic political framework of their culture, religion and region. The more we try to substitute our will for theirs, with more American troops or exhortation, the more we enfeeble them. As in Saudi Arabia, we must move slowly but deliberately out of the spotlight and into the shadows, with a sustainable mission of training and advising Iraqi troops.

What will contain the Iraqi civil war, in the end, is that none of the regional powers can tolerate a shattered Iraq -- not Iran, not Syria, not Saudi Arabia, not Jordan, not Turkey. Nor do most Iraqis want a dissolution of their unitary state. The Iraqis will restabilize their nation when the "nationalist forces" -- including ones we don't like, such as Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Sunni insurgency -- make common cause under a regional mandate.

Only the United States can broker the regional conference that will allow a political transition in Iraq. That's our leverage now -- diplomatic clout, more than military power. If the neighboring powers can help apply a tourniquet to stop the bleeding in Iraq, America can begin to step away.

Lost In The Desert (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON

Iraq now evokes that old Jimmy Durante song that goes, “Did you ever have the feeling that you wanted to go and still have the feeling that you wanted to stay?”

It’s hard to remember when America has been so stuck. We can’t win and we can’t leave.

The good news is that the election finished what Katrina started. It dismantled the president’s fake reality about Iraq, causing opinions to come gushing forth from all quarters about where to go from here.

The bad news is that no one, and I mean no one, really knows where to go from here. The White House and the Pentagon are ready to shift to Plan B. But Plan B is their empty term for miraculous salvation.

Even Henry Kissinger has defected from the Plan A gang. Once he thought the war could work, but now he thinks military victory is out of the question. When he turns against a war, you know the war’s in trouble. He also believes leaving quickly would risk a civil war so big it could destabilize the Middle East.

Kofi Annan, who thought the war was crazy, now says that the United States is “trapped in Iraq” and can’t leave until the Iraqis can create a “secure environment” — even though the Iraqis evince not the slightest interest in a secure environment. (The death squads even assassinated a popular comedian this week.)

The retired Gen. Anthony Zinni, who thought Mr. Bush’s crusade to depose Saddam was foolish and did not want to send in any troops, now thinks we may have to send in more troops so we can eventually get out.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, whose soldiers pulled Saddam out of his spider hole and who is returning to Iraq to take charge of the day-to-day fight, has given up talking about a Jeffersonian democracy and now wishes only for a government in Iraq that’s viewed as legitimate. He has gone from “can do” to “don’t know.” He talked to The Times’s Thom Shanker about his curtailed goals of reducing sectarian violence and restoring civil authority, acknowledging: “Will we attain those? I don’t know.”

At a Senate hearing last week, Gen. John Abizaid sounded like Goldilocks meets Guernica, asserting two propositions about the war that are logically at war with each other. He said we can’t have fewer troops because the Iraqis need us, but we can’t have more because we don’t want the Iraqis to become dependent on us.

He contended that increasing the number of our troops would make the Iraqi government mad, but also asserted that decreasing the number would intensify sectarian violence.

This a poor menu of options.

As Peter Beinart wrote in The New Republic this week, "In a particularly cruel twist, the events of recent months have demolished the best arguments both for staying and for leaving." Noting in the same magazine that "we are approaching a Saddam-like magnitude for the murder of innocents," Leon Wieseltier worried that the problem may be deeper than the number of our troops; it may be Iraq itself. "After we invaded Iraq, Iraq invaded itself. ... We are at the mercy of Iraq, where there is no mercy."

Kirk Semple, The Times's Baghdad correspondent, wrote about Capt. Stephanie Bagley, the daughter and granddaughter of military policemen who was enthusiastic a year ago about her job of building a new Iraqi police force. But that was before the militia so inexorably began to infiltrate the police, presumably with the support of some leaders in Iraq's dysfunctional government. Now, with the police begging the Americans not to make them patrol Baghdad's mean streets and showing her their shrapnel wounds, she just wants to get her unit home safely, without losing another soldier. She said her orders were to train a local force to deal with crimes like theft and murder, not to teach them how to fight a counterinsurgency.

Aside from telling Israel to be nicer to the Palestinians, as if there lies Iraq salvation, James Baker will mostly try to suggest that the U.S. talk to Iran and Syria. Yesterday, after the Lebanese Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, an opponent of Syria, was assassinated in Beirut, President Bush said he suspected that Iran and Syria were behind the murder.

Maybe Mr. Baker had better find Plan C.

The Pentagon is trying to decide whether we should Go Big, Go Long or Go Home.

Go figure.

An Ideologue For Hire Gets New Alliance (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman announced Tuesday that he had hired a new spokesman, which is not in itself that noteworthy, except that the said spokesman, Marshall Wittmann, is one of the great career vagabonds, ideological contortionists and political pontificators ever to inflict himself on a city full of them.

To say that Mr. Wittmann defies classification is like saying Paris Hilton defies modesty. But in his peripatetic soul, he is a Washington Original, a man without a political country going to work for a senator without a political party.

Mr. Lieberman, a longtime Democrat of Connecticut who was re-elected as an independent and calls himself an "Independent Democrat," has not ruled out becoming a Republican.

Mr. Wittmann, meanwhile, is a Trotskyite turned Zionist turned Reaganite turned bipartisan irritant turned pretty much everything in between — including chief lobbyist for the Christian Coalition, the only Jew who has ever held that position.

"Jewish mothers do not raise their Jewish sons to work for the Christian Coalition," said Mr. Wittmann, offering one of many explanations for why that job was not an ideal fit.

"I think I'm the only person who has worked for both Cesar Chavez and Linda Chavez," Mr. Wittmann said of the union pioneer who inspired him in the 1970s and the conservative Republican whose Senate campaign in Maryland he joined in the 1980s.

"I think I'm the only person who's worked for both Ralph Reed and Bruce Reed," Mr. Wittmann added, referring to the former executive director of the Christian Coalition and the top lieutenant to former President Bill Clinton.

There are of course plenty of political people who have undergone philosophical evolutions over the years. But Mr. Wittmann, 53, has zigzagged in the extreme, from stints in left-leaning unions to right-wing policy shops. He describes his career as "eclectic," saying he has always been drawn to independent thinkers. "The good lord has made me a contrarian," Mr. Wittmann said.

The good lord has also blessed him with the gift of speaking in punchy and irresistible sound bites.

He has been quoted thousands of times in newspapers, magazines, newsletters and journals, according to Lexis-Nexis. And this does not count the at least 939 times his name has appeared misspelled as “Marshall Wittman.”

He suffered through a two-year dry patch from 2002 to 2004 when he was a spokesman for Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, a job that largely required him to suppress his inner quotemeister for his boss’s even-more-impressive knack for drawing attention.

When that became unbearable, Mr. Wittmann returned to his roots as a Democrat in Waco, Tex., where he had volunteered at age 15 for the antiwar presidential campaign of Eugene McCarthy.

After leaving Mr. McCain’s office, he joined the moderate Democratic Leadership Council as a senior fellow, a position whose mandate was not exactly clear but allowed him to once again be quoted. (Think Michael Jordan returning to the basketball court after his fish-out-of-water career as a baseball player.)

Liberated from the on-message shackles of a Senate office, Mr. Wittmann soared into the blogosphere. He immersed himself in his popular online diary, Bull Moose, named for the party of his political hero, Teddy Roosevelt. It became a virtual megaphone through which Mr. Wittmann could ridicule both the Bush administration and the liberal bloggers, or “netroots” (or, in Mr. Wittmann’s words, the “nutroots”) that attacked Mr. Lieberman relentlessly during his re-election campaign.

Now Mr. Wittmann will once again have to stifle his pundit proclivities to the greater good of Mr. Lieberman. “I’ve gone through this before,” he said of withdrawal from talking freely to the press. “Luckily my wife is a psychologist,” he said of his spouse of 29 years, Karen, one of the few enduring allegiances he has held faithfully.

He will also be forced to suspend the Bull Moose. “The Moose is now in hibernation,” Mr. Wittmann said, adding that he is not certain if moose in fact hibernate. (They do not.)

In announcing Mr. Wittmann’s appointment, Mr. Lieberman hailed his “independent and diverse background” in a statement (or understatement).

Even though he has a new boss, Mr. Wittmann still swears deep and abiding affection for Mr. McCain. And the feeling is apparently mutual: Mr. McCain said through an aide that Mr. Wittmann was “a dear friend.”

All of which raises the question of what happens if Mr. McCain runs for president and invites Mr. Wittmann to join his campaign.

Would he abandon Mr. Lieberman?

Mr. Wittmann invokes one of the first rules of flackdom and a glimpse of the drudgery to come. “One thing I’ve learned in the press world,” he said, “is that I don’t answer hypothetical questions.”

Al Qaeda Welcomes Democratic Victory (WT)

By Walid Phares

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The latest audio by al Qaeda's Iraq commander -- posted 48 hours after the midterm elections -- sends a clear signal to the readers of the jihadi strategic mind: Al Qaeda and its advisers around the world want to provoke an "American Madrid." Portraying the United States as a bleeding bull in disarray, the war room projects its wish to see America's will crippled. The video attempts to do the following:

1. Convince the jihadists that the United States is now defeated in Iraq and beyond. While no reversal of the balance of power has taken place on the ground, the jihadi propaganda machine is linking the shift in domestic politics to a withdrawal from Iraq. It projects the change in Washington as a crumbling of the political process in Baghdad and America's foreign policy. Interestingly, others in the region are also "announcing" the upcoming defeat of America in the war on terror. Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah declared: "The Americans are leaving, and their allies will pay the price."

2. Spread political chaos at home. Jihadists portray the Democratic takeover of Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld (and maybe others) as signs of American weakening in the resolve to fight jihadism. The video had a potential to frustrate U.S. citizens if it is not accurately interpreted by experts. Americans may end up believing that the message reflects the situation in the Middle East and that it is a logical outcome of a faulty U.S. policy. If the Bush administration and the new congressional leaders do not respond adequately to the video, some "chaos" of this sort may ensue.

3. The terminology used in the videotape is a powerful indicator that al Qaeda's political network relies on Western-educated minds, familiar with political processes in the United States and serving as advisers to the jihadists. A regular al Qaeda emir does not use the term "lame duck." It is more likely that a U.S.-based cadre, who understands the impact of political jargon on domestic audiences, had suggested the use of this word. Abu Hamza al Muhajir's use of the term batta arjaaa (lame duck) is striking to any native speaker of Arabic. This term does not exist in Arab culture, let alone in jihadi rhetoric. Its use is yet another proof of the Americanization jihad has undergone. Thus, Iraq's al Qaeda is using the term as a weapon -- something most likely requested by the jihadi brains operating on the other side of the Atlantic.

So what do the speechwriters want to achieve with these kinds of tapes? They aim at sapping American public morale during a time when reorganization is taking place in the U.S. government. Reading from the jihadi wishful thinking, the audio tape of al Muhajir and the statements made by other radical Islamists send the following message: Americans are being thanked for removing Mr. Bush's party from the leadership of Congress, which the jihadists attribute to the war on terror rather than U.S. domestic problems. Al Qaeda's audio tells citizens in the United States that they were wise for having responded positively to the previous messages by Osama bin Laden. Al Masri's words aim at convincing the American public to pressure their newly elected legislators to pull U.S. forces hastily from Iraq.

In short, al Qaeda wants an American Madrid: it wishes that a change of power in January would be accompanied by a change of national determination, not just a change of course within Iraq.

In the Salafis chat rooms, the commissaries explained to their audiences, that the Democratic Party victory in Congress means that America is now divided and al Qaeda can push to create more cracks in the system -- as it has successfully done in Spain. The masters of the forum, emulating al Masri's audiotape, said not only that "we got their soldiers on the run in Iraq," but "we got their citizens on the run on their own soil" referring to the November electoral outcome. They promised that with more killings in Iraq, they will break the will of Americans at home; and that the new Congress, seeking to fulfill one of its electoral promises will force the Bush administration to pack up and leave the Middle East.

In Washington, both the administration and the new congressional leaders failed to seriously respond to the al Qaeda message. Grave mistake; for ignoring the speech would help convincing the jihadists that America is divided and crumbling and would embolden them to strike further, not only in Iraq but also inside the United States. The silent treatment works in favor of the Salafi combatants: It only leads them to believe that they are right and that their strategy is working; just as Allah had crushed the Soviets in Afghanistan, he has divided the Americans. It is, therefore, imperative that Washington strikes back in a unified manner at every opportunity that arises. It must tell the dreamers of a terror caliphate that American democracy will not serve as a weapon to defeat freedom worldwide.

Elected As A War Critic, He Was Part Of Prewar Errors (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Of all the Democrats who rode a wave of public anger over Iraq to election victories this month, Chris Carney had the most unlikely credentials as a war critic.

Before winning the race for Pennsylvania's 10th Congressional District, Carney was part of a controversial intelligence unit at the Pentagon that was responsible for some of the most alarming — and, it turned out, unfounded — prewar claims about Iraq.

Assigned to search for links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, the unit reached a series of conclusions, including that a Sept. 11 hijacker had met with an Iraqi agent in Prague, Czech Republic, that have since been widely discredited. The Pentagon unit was created and run by one of the Iraq war's principal architects, then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith.

Carney took part in briefings at the White House and the Pentagon that disparaged the CIA for underestimating the relationship between Baghdad and the terrorist network. Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials frequently touted the findings to bolster the case for war.

Despite his background, Carney campaigned as an antiwar Democrat and said he got a "very warm reception" when he arrived at Capitol Hill this week to take part in orientation activities for incoming members. Carney is a lifelong Democrat, according to his press secretary.

"They are intrigued," Carney said of his fellow freshmen. "But I'm not sure all of them know about this."

Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton) said she was disturbed by the work that came out of Feith's office, but doubted that members would hold that against Carney.

"I think that in retrospect that what happened there is deeply troubling and we're paying a price for it," Eshoo said. "But I don't want to cast judgment on him."

Carney, 47, is not apologetic about his work at the Pentagon.

"I certainly stand by the fact that I believe there was some sort of relationship," he said in an interview. "On a scale from zero to 10, with zero being no relationship and 10 perfect operational coordination," Carney said, the Iraq-Al Qaeda link was "somewhere in the 2.5 range."

That appears to be a more qualified assessment than the so-called Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group presented to policymakers during a series of briefings in 2002. In one briefing slide, the group asserted that there were "more than a decade of numerous contacts" between Iraq and Al Qaeda and that there were "multiple areas of cooperation," possibly including the Sept. 11 attacks.

Carney, a reserve officer in the Navy and political science professor at Penn State University, wasn't expected to win his conservative-leaning district in eastern Pennsylvania. But his chances improved when the Republican incumbent, Don Sherwood, admitted he'd had a five-year extramarital affair and was forced to deny accusations that he had choked his mistress.

Carney said he initially was a supporter of the invasion of Iraq but has been dismayed by the handling of the postwar insurgency. His stance hardened, he said, when one of his college students returned from Iraq and complained of how ill-equipped U.S. fighting units were.

"They had to scrounge Iraqi scrap yards for junk metal to weld onto their trucks," Carney said.

Carney ended up working for Feith after being called up for duty as an analyst at the Defense Intelligence Agency in the aftermath of Sept. 11. Carney was detailed to Feith's office in 2002 after the noted neoconservative asked the DIA to provide two analysts for a special project.

Carney and another DIA analyst, Christina Shelton, spent months poring over thousands of raw intelligence reports. They quickly concluded that the CIA, which had been skeptical of any serious relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda, was getting it wrong.

"I found it kind of curious the way they were so equivocal in the analysis," Carney said of the CIA reports. "It was frustrating to me and others with all the caveating that was going on."

So the Feith team assembled a competing report called "Assessing the Relationship Between Iraq and Al Qaeda." The document cited "fundamental problems" with the CIA's analysis and offered conclusions without caveats. It said Baghdad was providing training to "non-Iraqi terrorists" and had "provided safe haven" for terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi. Under the heading "Known Iraq-Al Qaeda Contacts," the document listed the alleged 2001 meeting of Sept. 11 hijacker Mohammed Atta with an Iraqi agent in Prague as if there were no doubt the meeting had occurred.

When the group's findings were leaked to a conservative publication, Cheney described the report as the "best source" for understanding ties between Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden.

Like much of the prewar intelligence on Iraq, the allegations of ties between Baghdad and Al Qaeda have crumbled under postwar scrutiny. A recent investigation by the Senate Intelligence Committee concluded that Atta never met with an Iraqi agent in Prague, that Baghdad did not give safe haven to Zarqawi, and that Hussein was so wary of Al Qaeda he had issued an edict barring anyone in his government from having any dealings with the terrorist network.

Carney defends his work by saying that many of the postwar conclusions are based on information that wasn't available to analysts in 2002.

Polls show a significant minority of Americans still believe Iraq was somehow involved in the Sept. 11 attacks, but Carney disputes that his work contributed to that misperception or pushed the U.S. into war.

"I was one voice among hundreds talking about this," Carney said. "Ultimately, the decision to go to war rests with the president, and I am certain that the president had lots of information other than what I had."

Carney said that much of his focus in Congress would be on domestic issues, including healthcare and job security. Still, he said that he believed U.S. intelligence agencies suffered from a lack of creative thinking, and that he had ideas about how to fix some of the community's problems.

"There are a number of things I'm looking at as committee assignments, and the intelligence committee is certainly one of them," he said. If selected, he added, "I think I would apply the same kind of rigor to those issues that we did in the Pentagon."

Iraq And Syria Agree To Restore Relations (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Syria and Iraq on Tuesday announced the formal restoration of diplomatic ties, nearly a quarter of a century after they were suspended.

The move comes as the US and other western powers are exploring the option of enlisting Syrian and Iranian help in stabilising Iraq.

But there are no signs yet that Damascus is preparing to change its policies on the ground in Iraq, where it has been accused of supporting the insurgency.

Walid Moalem, Syria's foreign minister, at a press conference in Baghdad with his Iraqi colleague, Hoshair Zebari, said that Syria now hoped to turn a new page in its relations with the US.

"I do not want to go back to the former accusations. We seek future co-operation in all fields," he said.

Syria has invited Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, to Damascus.

The restoration of ties was welcomed by Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary-general, as well as by the Arab League. The US administration also expressed cautious approval.

"We've always encouraged Iraq's neighbours to take a role in supporting and assisting the unity government in Iraq," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House's national security council.

But he added that "one of the first steps Syria could take was to strengthen its border with Iraq and stop the flow of foreign fighters into that country."

In Damascus, some officials said that this was unlikely to be the case, at least for now.

"Syria is waiting for an incentive," said Samer Ladkani, of the Al-Sharq think-tank which has close ties to the government. He cautioned that "there may be just diplomatic ties without any results on the ground."

News of the restoration of ties with Iraq was greeted with indifference by many Syrians. They did not expect a change in Iraq as long as US troops remained.

Syria is seeking a "package deal" with the US that would see its demands in the region met, said analysts and diplomats in Damascus. These are said to include a US withdrawal from Iraq; a restoration of Syrian influence in Lebanon and a halt to the UN investigation into the murder of Rafiq Hariri; the complete return of the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights; the establishment of a Palestinian state; and a general recognition of Syria's status as a regional power.

The Syrian government considers itself to be in a position of strength after Hizbollah's "victory" against Israel in Lebanon in the summer. Some in the leadership are said to credit Syrian support for the insurgency in Iraq with what they see as the defeat of President George W. Bush in the recent mid-term elections in the US, when the Democrats wrested control of Congress from the the Republican party.

American Foes Step Into The Iraq Fray (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 22, 2006

CAIRO

This week, Iraq has drawn decisively closer to the two countries the US alleges are the greatest threats to peace and stability in the Middle East.

Tuesday, Syria restored diplomatic ties with Iraq that were broken by Saddam Hussein in 1980 back when Iraq was fighting Iran. Also Tuesday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's office said he would travel to Tehran this weekend to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to talk about restoring order to Iraq.

The US has repeatedly accused Iran and Syria of stirring up violence inside Iraq, but recently the notion of isolating them as punishment has lost favor in Washington. A growing number President Bush's advisers are urging direct dialogue with both nations. They argue that engagement could convince Syria to do more to prevent foreign fighters from entering Iraq; Iran could exert more influence on Iraq's dominant Shiite political parties (and their militias) to compromise more.

"It could make a difference, but not a critical difference," says Anthony Cordesman, former director of intelligence assessment to the US Secretary of Defense and now a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Iran has been accused of being deeply involved in training, funding, and arming the two major Shiite militias in Iraq, where Tehran has historic ties to the current Shiite political leadership. Many Iraqi Shiites spent years in Iranian exile during Mr. Hussein's decades in power in Baghdad. One militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained in Iran by the Revolutionary Guard.

"While of course it's worth talking to them, even if they complied with all our wishes, what they could do probably would not be decisive," says Wayne White, former head of the Middle East desk at the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

"The situation is so bad now in Iraq," he says, "you can't expect any magic over there. And even if you could get the Iranians and Syrians to accomplish things you wanted, what would you have to cough up in return?"

Former US Secretary of State James Baker, who served under President Bush's father and is now the leader of the Iraq Study Group (ISG) advising the president on new directions for his Iraq policy, has been quietly meeting with Syrian officials in the US, according to an interview with the Syrian ambassador to the US reported by The New York Times. He also met with Iran's ambassador to the United Nations.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has publicly called for more direct engagement, and members of the ISG have been quietly urging more direct ties with Iran, as well.

Outgoing US Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, a hard-liner on Syria and Iran, was ousted this month in favor of former CIA chief Robert Gates, who as a member of the ISG had also been urging direct engagement with Iran over the problems in Iraq.

Though Mr. Blair praised the Syrian visit to Iraq, saying it may see that "Syria becomes of help to Iraq in its process of progress ... rather than a hindrance," the closer ties between Iraq and Syria could quickly become a strain on the US and Iraqi relationship.

Meanwhile, Iran's meeting with the Iraqi president this weekend is seen by some analysts as evidence of its increasingly muscular role in the Middle East, where it already has established deep influence in Syria and Lebanon.

Lebanon is yet another nation where various internal and external political forces are vying for power. On Tuesday, a leading anti-Syrian Lebanese politician, Pierre Gemayel, was assassinated in Beirut. An ally of his, parliament leader Saad Hariri, immediately claimed that Syria was behind the murder.

Mr. Hariri's father, Rafik, a former prime minister, was assassinated last February, and the US and anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians have blamed Syria for that murder as well, which they allege was designed to bolster the pro-Syrian, Iran-backed Hizbullah inside the country.

Mr. Cordesman says events like the Gemayel assassination in Lebanon underscore the likelihood that neither Iran nor Syria will become very cooperative on issues that the US cares about - withdrawing support from Hizbullah in Syria's case, or abandoning its nuclear program in Iran's case - any time soon.

"What everyone needs to understand is that cooperation from Syria and Iran is likely to be very limited, particularly in the short-term," he says.

"Syria is certainly backing the Hizbullah in its efforts to achieve a new level of political influence in Lebanon and it has the feeling that it's less vulnerable to any kind of US action now, ... and when Iran goes out and carries out the most provocative military exercise in recent history, this may not be a symbol of compromise." He was referring to recent Iranian military exercises in the Gulf.

The State Department reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq to decide whether to attend. "It's their call; it's their decision," deputy spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington.

Bomb Blasts Speaker's Car In Green Zone (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 21 — A bomb exploded in an armored car belonging to the speaker of Parliament, wounding the American security guard who was driving it out of a parking area in the government Green Zone and disrupting a meeting of lawmakers nearby, a parliamentary aide said.

Though the speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, was not in the vehicle and was unscathed, the assassination attempt was one of the most serious breaches of security yet within the Green Zone, the heavily fortified government district on the west bank of the Tigris River.

The bomb, which exploded in midafternoon, was planted inside a decoy armored car that was part of the speaker's regular convoy and resembled the one he usually used, said the parliamentary aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly about the attack.

Only part of the bomb exploded, the aide said. A police official said investigators believe that the bomb was planted inside the Green Zone and detonated by cellphone.

Mr. Mashhadani, a hard-line Sunni Arab nationalist reviled by many Shiites, was attending a Parliament meeting inside the Green Zone convention center at the time of the explosion. He and other legislators were forced to stay inside for hours afterward while the American military secured the area.

In the summer, senior Shiite and Kurdish leaders, backed by some American officials, called for his ouster because of inflammatory comments he had made about various groups in Iraq and about the American presence.

The most serious breach of security inside the Green Zone occurred in October 2004, when insurgents set off two bombs in crowded areas that killed at least five people, including three Americans. Individuals have also been attacked there: at least one foreign jogger was reportedly stabbed, and another intentionally hit by a vehicle.

While Parliament members stewed inside the convention center, a senior Kurdish legislator said in a telephone interview that the president, Jalal Talabani, had accepted an invitation from the president of Syria, Bashar al-Assad, to meet in Damascus. Such a meeting would be the highest-level diplomatic discussion between the two countries in decades, and would seal a reconciliation that took place this week with the visit of the Syrian foreign minister here.

No date has been set for Mr. Talabani's visit, said the legislator, Mahmoud Othman, a member of the Kurdistan Alliance. The invitation was delivered to Mr. Talabani by the Syrian foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, who came to Iraq to re-establish diplomatic ties that were severed in 1982, after Syria sided with Iran in the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Talabani is scheduled to visit Iran this weekend, months after Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki made his first trip there. Mr. Othman said there were rumors that the Iranian government had also invited Mr. Assad to the meeting, but there was no definite sign that any senior Syrian officials would attend.

Meanwhile, the White House announced that President Bush would meet with Mr. Maliki in Jordan next week to discuss the security situation in Iraq.

Early Tuesday, American and Iraqi forces raided the Shiite district of Sadr City in eastern Baghdad and detained a man the American military identified as the leader of a kidnapping ring in connection with the abduction last month of an American soldier, Specialist Ahmed al-Taie. Soldiers detained six other Iraqis.

The raid sparked a battle that involved fire from American aircraft. A Shiite official in the district, Sheik Abdul Zahra al-Suaidi, said in a telephone interview that five civilians had been killed in the fighting, including a woman and a child, and 15 others were wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0097126

A spokeswoman for the American military, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said in an e-mail message that “there may have been civilian casualties.”

Across Baghdad, at least 29 bodies were discovered Tuesday, an Interior Ministry official said. In Diyala Province, at least 13 people were killed in scattered violence.

Iraqi Parliament Speaker Escapes Car Bombing (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

BAGHDAD, Nov. 21 -- A car bomb exploded inside the heavily protected Green Zone on Tuesday in an apparent attempt to kill Iraq's controversial speaker of parliament.

About 2 p.m., a small bomb exploded in one of the armored cars in Mahmoud al-Mashhadani's motorcade as it approached the convention center where parliament meets, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq. Mashhadani was not in the car, and the driver survived, Garver said.

Bomb-sniffing dogs then detected explosives in another vehicle, Garver said. Bomb specialists detonated that car, which set off a series of blasts that caused a fire but injured no one and caused no major damage to nearby structures.

Members of parliament were forced to stay inside the convention center for about four hours until the fire was extinguished and the area deemed safe, Garver said. "They were told to remain inside for their safety," he said.

Garver said he was not sure how the explosives made it so far into the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government, the U.S. and British embassies and thousands of foreign troops and private contractors. Anyone trying to enter the zone must pass through several checkpoints -- first to get into the complex, then to enter individual buildings.

The Green Zone has been a frequent target of mortar and rocket attacks, but although bombs have exploded at checkpoints at entrances to the zone, they rarely infiltrate the fortresslike compound. "Obviously, there is an investigation going on," Garver said.

Mashhadani is the fifth high-ranking Iraqi government official to be targeted in recent days. An outspoken Sunni Arab, Mashhadani last summer called the U.S. occupation "the work of butchers." Shiite and Kurdish groups called for his ouster after that and other provocative comments.

On Tuesday, his supporters reacted angrily to news that he had been targeted for assassination.

"We condemn and denounce this act, and we consider this as a criminal act, for Dr. Mashhadani is valuable to us," said Ammar Wajih, director of the media office at the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni Arab group.

As Tuesday's assassination attempt and infiltration of the Green Zone highlighted Iraq's deteriorating security situation, the government moved to stabilize relations with a long-hostile neighbor. By signing an accord to restore diplomatic ties with Syria, ending a quarter-century of enmity, Iraqi leaders said they hoped to stem the flow of foreign insurgents across their common border.

"The flag of Iraq will be raised in the sky of Damascus and the flag of Syria will be raised in the sky of Baghdad, and ambassadors will be named," Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said at a news conference in Baghdad with his Syrian counterpart, Walid al-Muallem.

The two countries had been at odds since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq. Most recently, U.S. and Iraqi leaders have accused Syria of doing too little to stop foreign fighters from crossing into Iraq.

In signing the agreement, Muallem abandoned his demand that the United States set a timetable for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. Instead, he agreed that the troops should stay until no longer needed.

The agreement came as Iraqi President Jalal Talabani prepared to leave Friday for a weekend meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran. Ahmadinejad had hoped to include Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in the summit, but Ali al-Dabbagh, the official spokesman for the Iraqi government, said there were no plans for Assad to join them.

He did, however, say that the Syrian leader has invited Talabani and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to Damascus to talk about regional solutions to the sectarian violence within Iraq. "The invitation is there, and then we'll work it out to find a convenient time," he said.

Also Tuesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces raided Sadr City, Baghdad's vast Shiite slum, and captured seven members of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. One of the men was believed to know the whereabouts of Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a U.S. soldier who was kidnapped a month ago while visiting his Iraqi wife in Baghdad, officials said.

In Ramadi, there were reports by witnesses and a hospital physician that Abu Zaid al-Tunisi, a senior aide to al-Qaeda in Iraq's former leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. airstrike Monday night. Garver, the military spokesman, said Tuesday that he could not confirm the reports.

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi and Naseer Mehdawi in Baghdad and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Perfect Killing Method, But Clear Targets Are Few (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

KARMA, Iraq, Nov. 16 — The sniper team left friendly lines hours ahead of the sun. They were a group of marines walking through the chill, hoping to be in hiding before the mullahs' predawn call to prayer would urge this city awake.

They reached an abandoned building. Two marines stepped inside, swept the ground floor and signaled to the others to follow them to the flat roof, where they crawled to spots along its walls in which they had previously chiseled out small viewing holes.

Out came their gear: a map, spotting scopes, binoculars, two-way radios and stools. The snipers took their places, peering through the holes, watching an Iraqi neighborhood from which insurgents often fire. They were hoping an insurgent would try to fire on this day. The waiting began.

If the recent pattern was any indication, the waiting could last a long time. This was this sniper team's 30th mission in Anbar Province since early August. They had yet to fire a shot.

More than three years after the insurgency erupted across much of Iraq, sniping — one of the methods that the military thought would be essential in its counterinsurgency operations — is proving less successful in many areas of Iraq than had been hoped, Marine officers, trainers and snipers say.

In theory, Western snipers are a nearly perfect method of killing Iraq's insurgents and thwarting their attacks, all with little risk of damaging property or endangering passers-by. But in practice, the snipers say, they are seeing fewer clear targets than previously, and are shooting fewer insurgents than expected.

In 2003, one Marine sniper killed 32 combatants in 12 days, the snipers say, and many others had double-digit kill totals during tours in Iraq. By this summer, sniper platoons with several teams had typically been killing about a dozen insurgents in seven-month tours, with totals per platoon ranging from 3 to as high as 26.

The gap between the expectations and the results has many causes, but is in part a reflection of the insurgency's duration. With the war in its fourth year, many of the best sniping positions are already well known to the insurgents, and veteran insurgents have become more savvy and harder to kill.

In some areas of Iraq, where the insurgents are less experienced or still fight frontally, snipers have had better rates of success, including the platoon with 26 kills. But many areas, the snipers say, have become maddening places in which to hide and hunt.

"A lot of Marine battalions have rotated through these same areas for six or seven months at a time," said Staff Sgt. Christopher D. Jones, the platoon sergeant of the Scout Sniper Platoon in the Second Battalion, Eighth Marines. "But the insurgents live here. They know almost all the best places that have been used. Before we even get here, they know where we are going to go."

Moreover, the insurgents have developed safeguards, using shepherds and children to look for snipers in buildings and heavily overgrown areas, and networks of informants to spread the word when a sniper team has taken up a new position. "These days we're lucky if we can go 12 hours without getting compromised," he said.

In the Marine Corps, snipers have long been a culture within the culture, a group of quiet, highly competent infantrymen selected for their field skills, self-discipline and shooting expertise.

Picked from the ranks, they are trained at a 10-week school that develops their skills in hiding, stalking and long-range marksmanship. Each infantry battalion has a platoon of snipers, who typically work in small teams apart from the rifle companies. They are considered elite.

But some snipers now worry that the difficulties they face have been compounded by rules and conditions placed on them by senior military leaders.

Marine snipers have customarily trained to work in two-man teams who hide and stalk for days, seeking targets a half-mile or more away. Often an area might be saturated with snipers, so they can support and protect one another while confusing an enemy force with different angles of fire.

This way, according to their thinking, they can kill more enemy combatants, and sow more fear.

Those two-man teams are not allowed in Iraq, in part because of the killings of two groups of snipers earlier in the war.

In the first episode, in 2004 in Ramadi, four Marine snipers were killed without firing a shot, apparently after being surprised in a shooting position in an urban area, known in sniper jargon as a hide. An investigation suggested that they had been overwhelmed and executed.

In 2005, a six-man sniper team from a Marine reserve unit was killed in Haditha. The insurgents videotaped a display of the slain team's equipment, including a marine's dog tags, and circulated the spectacle on the Internet.

The losses have made commanders hesitant to send out small teams, Marine officers said, a decision that many snipers said inhibits their work.

Snipers argue a counterintuitive point, saying that even though two-man teams have less firepower and fewer men, they are safer because they can hide more effectively.

Sgt. Joseph W. Chamblin, the leader of the battalion's First Sniper Team, said the sniper community was suffering from an overreaction. "It's sad that they got killed, but when you think about it, we've been here three years, going on four, and we've only had two teams killed," he said. "That's not that dramatic."

Sergeant Chamblin killed for the first time on Nov. 10, shooting an insurgent who was putting a makeshift bomb beside a bridge near Saqlawiya, near Falluja, a spot where a similar bomb killed three marines and a translator this summer.

He said snipers were willing to assume the risk of traveling in pairs. "It's a war," he said. "People are going to die, and the American public needs to get over that. They need to get over that and let us do our job."

Snipers also say that other force-protection issues are limiting their operations, including requirements to wear helmets and flak jackets, which slow snipers down and make hiding more difficult.

"You go to a 10-week sniper course and never in that course are you in Kevlar and a helmet," Sergeant Jones said. "Then you come to Iraq and immediately you're in your flak jacket and helmet, and you've got a huge pack of gear."

Sergeant Chamblin agreed. "We are carrying way more stuff than we can be tactically sound with," he said. "My arms are numb because my pack is so heavy. Sometimes, on my missions, my pack has weighed more than I have, and I weigh 150 pounds."

The military has also tightened rules of engagement as the war has progressed, toughening the requirements before a sniper may shoot an Iraqi. Potential targets must be engaged in a hostile act, or show clear hostile intent.

The marines say insurgents know the rules, and now rarely carry weapons in the open. Instead, they pose as civilians and keep their weapons concealed in cars or buildings until just before they need them. Later, when they are done shooting, they put them swiftly out of sight and mingle with civilians.

With almost no Iraqi police officers available in Anbar Province to check loiterers and suspicious cars, the snipers said, the insurgents have moved freely, making it difficult to tell from afar which people are dangerous, even when they have been violating the law.

Although the teams are frustrated, Lt. Col. Kenneth M. DeTreux, the battalion's commander, said they still influenced the insurgents, who tend to avoid areas that are watched. The presence of snipers can keep a road free of bombs, he said.

"Our scout sniper teams have a deterrent effect," he said. "That's not wishful thinking. The insurgents fear our snipers."

Still, the snipers want to thin the insurgents' ranks, not just deter them. Some of their difficulties were evident on the roof on a recent day, when the battalion's Fourth Sniper Team sat, watching through holes in the wall.

DOJ_NMG_0097129

Karma is a scene of frequent violence, and below them was a favored insurgent area. Once during the day they thought they had been spotted, and three marines swept the building below to make sure they were safe. They were.

They returned to peering through the holes. Other holes could be seen in buildings nearby — previous sniper positions, and a sign that insurgents probably knew the area is often watched.

"I've got a shady-looking guy," Lance Cpl. Nathan D. Leach, the assistant team leader, said as he observed a suspicious man. "He's got his hand behind him. Looks like he's got something under his shirt."

Lance Cpl. Keeghan O'Brien, the radio operator, interjected, "You see where that guy went?"

Cpl. Jason A. Dufault, the team leader, responded, "No, he walked behind a building and disappeared." A few hours later, several shots were heard from the neighborhood, and rifle-launched grenades sailed through the air. They landed behind the snipers, near a platoon-sized Marine position, exploding with a series of thunderous cracks.

The snipers peered around, seeking a shot. Another sniper team was also in the area, watching over the Marine position, too. No one saw a thing.

The insurgents were within a few hundred yards, but had found a seam. Several hours later, in the blackness again, the team picked up and moved, still waiting for a target after more than three months in Iraq.

New Suits Protect Troops Under Fire (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

FALLUJAH, Iraq — Marine commanders are outfitting their troops with flame-resistant flight suits in Iraq to ward off burns from the No. 1 killer here: roadside bombs.

It's another sign of how troops in the field have adapted to the deadly insurgency. Earlier in the war, troops added their own armor to vehicles and devised their own makeshift electronic jamming devices to foil the growing power and sophistication of the bombs they encountered.

Marine commanders in Iraq took the initiative to issue flame- and heat-resistant clothing made from a DuPont-manufactured fiber called Nomex, said Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a spokesman for Multi-National Force West. That group commands about 33,000 troops in western Iraq, the heart of the Sunni-based insurgency.

The intense heat from the bombs, called improvised explosive devices or IEDs, led Marine commanders to get the protective apparel, Salas said.

Troops who ride in tanks, trucks and armored personnel carriers received most of the first suits.

Explosives kill or wound more troops than any other weapon in Iraq, according to Pentagon records. Through Tuesday, roadside bombs have killed more than 1,200 U.S. servicemembers and wounded more than 11,000 others.

So far, the Marines have issued more than 12,000 fire-resistant suits, said Capt. Jeff Landis, spokesman for the Marine Corps Systems Command.

Only those Marines who leave forward operating bases receive the suits, Landis said, so there's been enough to go around.

In February, the Marines started a research and development program to develop clothing — including shirt, gloves and suit — to help troops survive a fiery blast.

Marines stationed in restive Anbar province in western Iraq say they like the flame-resistant suits.

"The Marine Corps made a great decision with the issuing of flight suits to Marines in vehicles," said Marine Capt. Eric Dominijanni, 34.

He sends his Marines from the 5th Regimental Combat Team on patrol every day over roads pockmarked and scorched by bomb blasts. "Remember, all vehicles have fuel tanks," Dominijanni said. "If they explode, the suits protect us from burns"

Members of the 5,000-strong combat team received their first suits in February, said Lt. Joseph King, a Marine spokesman. Troops received more of the dun-colored suits, dubbed "Poop Suits" by the Marines, in the spring, King said.

The Army also has begun to issue fire-resistant flight suits to tank and truck drivers in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon.

Next year, the Army plans to issue fire-resistant pullovers, boots and socks, records show.

Family Stands By A Marine Under Investigation (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

Darryl Sharratt often breaks into tears when trying to start sentences that include the word "Haditha." A stoic foreman from Pennsylvania, he struggles with painful concepts such as betrayal and helplessness. His wife, Theresa, puts her hand on his shoulder and tries to talk through the anguish.

"I love my son. He's my hero," Theresa Sharratt says calmly. "He's not what they're portraying him as. I can't believe that this is happening to us. To him."

Their dining room table is covered with photographs, scrapbooks, letters and trinkets belonging to their son, Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, a 22-year-old Marine who had dreamed his entire life of joining the military. Now, the Sharratts are fighting to preserve his reputation, as he is one of a handful of Marines who are being investigated over the slayings of two dozen Iraqi civilians on Nov. 19, 2005.

The Sharratts have remained silent until now because they did not know what to say. They have avoided learning details of their son's possible involvement in the shootings while they have struggled to understand what might have happened in a war zone thousands of miles away. They have privately fumed about politicians -- such as Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) -- who have publicly stated that their son was part of a brutal, vengeful slaughter. And they are livid that no one in the Marine Corps has stepped forward to defend their son.

"He's very confident he did nothing wrong, and we believe him," Theresa Sharratt said in a recent interview in the family home in Canonsburg, Pa., which is south of Pittsburgh. Her husband wiped his eyes and added: "He felt he was doing his job. And, now, the Marine Corps has betrayed these guys. All of them."

The incident in Haditha was not widely known until the past spring, when Time magazine wrote an account of the civilian deaths in a small group of homes in the insurgent hotbed. Early reports alleged that Marines with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marines, snapped after a member of their unit was killed by a roadside bomb, sending them on a rampage through nearby homes. There were also allegations of a coverup.

Attorneys for the Marines -- including Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the most senior noncommissioned officer at the scene of the shootings -- have said repeatedly that their clients followed the appropriate rules of engagement and killed the civilians as they were hunting insurgents responsible both for the roadside bombing and for a volley of shots from what the Marines believed were AK-47 assault rifles.

"They responded the way they were trained," said Jack B. Zimmerman, an attorney for Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, who officials believe was one of the Marines who fired shots. "Anytime you're involved in house-to-house urban warfare in an inhabited area, there's going to be the risk that civilians will be in harm's way. It's very unfortunate that women and children died, but the issue here is what was going through these guys' minds when they were taking fire, and did they respond the way they were trained to?"

Marine Corps officials have declined to comment about the case, as a nine-month investigation rests in the hands of prosecutors who have not yet decided on charges. A high-level review of whether commanders did not appropriately investigate the Haditha incident was completed in Iraq in July and the results are with commanders there, though Pentagon officials have so far declined to release the findings.

Wuterich, through his attorneys, has outlined a scenario that portrays the Marines reacting in a clinical way, noting that the squad was taking fire from the houses and attacked them, "clearing" rooms with grenades and gunfire.

In a separate account, recently obtained by The Washington Post, other Marines in the squad reported seeing, hearing and feeling gunshots flying over their heads in short bursts immediately before they entered the houses. The scenes inside, according to the account, were chaotic, as Marines threw fragmentation grenades and then fired shots through the dust and smoke.

One Marine who was in the convoy that day said that no one overreacted to the death of their friend, Cpl. Miguel "TJ" Terrazas, and that the troops focused on the mission. Answering written questions under the condition of anonymity, the Marine said no one seemed to be out for revenge. Instead, he said, the men wanted to make sure comrades came out from the ambush alive.

"If they were going to charge us, then you may as well charge every Marine and soldier in Iraq," the Marine said. He added that members of his squad "did not realize that civilians had been killed until they went back through the houses to assess collateral damage."

Military officials familiar with the investigation said there is some evidence that could show wrongdoing, including images, taken by an unmanned aircraft, that appear to show that a group of civilians shot near their car -- which had approached the Marine convoy after the bomb went off -- were executed. At least one Marine has told officials that he saw another Marine standing over the bodies and emptying his rifle's clip into them, according to two people closely familiar with the case.

Others have said that the shots that killed women and children inside the houses appeared to be "well-aimed," though defense attorneys have challenged that assessment as speculation because there is so little physical evidence to support it. The official investigation did not begin until months after the shootings, and some critical evidence was lost.

It is unclear what, if any, charges the Marines will face. Officials said this week that criminal charges could be announced in the next few weeks against as many as half a dozen men.

"My client did not engage in any conduct that we believe is criminal," said Gary Myers, an attorney for Sharratt. "Our position is that anything he did engaging the enemy was consistent with rules of engagement at the time."

Sharratt enlisted in the Marines just before his 18th birthday -- a decision his family supported -- and deployed to Iraq in 2004. He spent time in Fallujah, where he took part in the major offensive to take the city and used close-combat "clearing" tactics on enemy houses. He was deployed to Haditha the next year.

The Sharratts used to worry about their son's safety and how he dealt with the loss of friends -- "Don't worry about me, I can handle it," he had said to his mother. Now they worry that he is caught up in a political storm.

"Somebody's going to pay, and we're so afraid it's going to be the young guys," Theresa Sharratt said. "He believes he didn't do anything wrong."

But Darryl Sharratt says America has already convicted his son and the other Marines, and he feels helpless, lost, as he awaits a decision on possible charges.

"For 18 years, I protected him. And now I can't do anything about it," he said. "I just want the Marine Corps to stand up and say the Marines couldn't have done this and didn't do it. I blame them for letting it go on for this long."

Officials: Afghanistan Needs More Troops (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, November 22, 2006

More troops and sophisticated equipment are needed to bolster Afghanistan's security forces, but it is not clear whether more U.S. troops will be deployed there, U.S. and Afghan defense officials said Tuesday.

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry told Pentagon reporters that U.S. officials will wait until after next week's NATO summit in Latvia to see how many troops other countries plan to provide before deciding if more U.S. forces must be sent to Afghanistan.

"I think it will be best at this point to wait and see what NATO is able to provide," Eikenberry said. "There's more meetings that are taking place on the military staff. And this is very high on their agenda."

U.S. military leaders have been pushing NATO members to meet their commitments and provide more troops in Afghanistan. For months, officials have said that NATO nations have provided only 85 percent of the support they promised. There is a NATO-led force of about 30,000 in Afghanistan, including some 12,000 U.S. troops. An additional 11,000 American troops are there under U.S. control, conducting counterterrorism operations and other training and reconstruction duties.

The Afghan minister of defense, Gen. Abdul Rahim Wardak, who met Tuesday with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said his country needs more firepower, transport planes and armored vehicles. The Afghans have asked for additional helicopters and aircraft that can move troops and supplies through the mountainous regions.

Eikenberry said some body armor, helmets and other equipment are already being provided to the Afghan National Army. He added that there have been no final decisions on what other weapons and aircraft would be provided, and therefore he could not provide any cost estimate.

He said now is an appropriate time to give the Afghans more sophisticated equipment because they are better able to operate and maintain the equipment. It will be less expensive to equip the Afghans than continue to use U.S. troops and equipment in the war there, he said.

Wardak said Afghanistan is accelerating its training program for the army, and hopes to have about 70,000 troops by October 2008 — several years ahead of schedule. He said officials are hoping that NATO "will take a more effective role in equipping and training the Afghan national security forces."

"Once we are well-trained and well-equipped, we will be able to repay some of our debt to the international community by participating in peacekeeping operations," said Wardak, adding that Afghanistan would also be able to be "a permanent part of the war against terrorism."

In other comments, Eikenberry said the ongoing hunt for Osama bin Laden continues, and it "remains as much of a priority as it has since the United States of America was struck on 9/11."

Afghanistan Could Again Be Engulfed By Civil War (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Here in this extraordinary piece of desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out.

Speaking those words on Monday at Camp Bastion, the British military base in Afghanistan's southern Helmand province, Tony Blair made clear to the 800 troops lined up to meet him that the UK and its allies would "stand up and defeat" the resurgent Taliban.

It was a commitment the visiting prime minister later repeated to President Hamid Karzai in the leafy grounds of the Afghan leader's palace in Kabul. Mr Blair's concern was the battle against Taliban supporters and their al-Qaeda and drug gang allies in the bitterly contested south of the country, where violence has risen to heights not seen since the toppling five years ago of their authoritarian regime.

The 5,200 British troops stationed in Helmand – part of a 32,800-strong Nato-led force in the country – have faced almost daily fighting that has been as fierce as many engagements in Iraq. More than 3,700 people have been killed this year, most of them in the south and east, where Taliban's Pashtun fighters remain the biggest threat to Afghanistan's fragile democracy.

On Nato maps, Afghanistan's southern provinces and eastern areas along the border with Pakistan are shaded a fiery red, reflecting the hot spots of a persistent insurgency. By contrast, the northern and western provinces are shown in green, dotted with yellow to indicate pockets of instability.

But the colour-coding is deceptive. The government and its international backers can no longer take the relative peace of the north and west for granted. It is becoming clear that warlords and commanders from other ethnic groups are increasingly a menace.

The Northern Alliance warlords – who, backed by a US air campaign, swept the Taliban from power in 2001 and in Bonn that December set out a five-year blueprint for democracy – have been marginalised by Mr Karzai's government. Many are angry about being pushed aside and hostile to anything that will erode their power at a local level – from counter-narcotics efforts to police reform.

"In the south the Taliban is an armed opposition but in the north there is growing political opposition. The government is being pushed from both sides," says Saleh Registani, a member of parliament from the fortress valley of Panjshir, just north of the capital, which held out against Taliban fighters in the 1990s. "The security crisis is spreading like an oil slick across the country."

Afghanistan is a nation riven by ethnic and factional divisions, which flared into a bloody civil war that left thousands dead before the Taliban militia swept to power in 1996. "The insurgency in the south has the potential to open up fissures along ethnic and factional lines which have so far been contained," says Joanna Nathan, senior South Asia analyst with the International Crisis Group.

Moreover, the war in the south is draining attention and resources from the north and west and stoking public anger towards the government in those regions, western officials in Kabul warn. "We do have a serious problem in the south, but the north is a ticking time-bomb. There is not a single unifying leader and there is the potential for chaos," says a diplomat in Kabul. "We are moving back to the days of the civil war where all the neighbouring countries were worried, concerned and involved in Afghanistan."

The issue will be at the centre of a two-day Nato summit that starts in the Latvian capital, Riga, next Tuesday. That follows the transfer of peacekeeping command to the alliance from the original coalition forces in eastern Afghanistan, the final phase of the nationwide deployment of its International Security Assistance Force.

The north is not immune from attacks by the Taliban and other disruptive forces, with incidents in Herat city in the west and the northern city of Kunduz, where German troops are based and which saw its first suicide attack in June. Islamic militants linked with the Hezb-e-Islami group headed by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, who appears on US most-wanted terror lists, have been active in the north this summer, as have others linked to Afghanistan's large and rapidly growing drugs trade.

"What you have is a thinly spread gloss of governance over an area that is not under any power broker's control. It is fragmenting," says a senior US official in Kabul, adding that any attempt to force a government presence further into the north and west could kick off violent power struggles.

Local militia commanders are rethinking their backing of the central government and Islamic militants are moving to mobilise support outside their southern strongholds by exploiting the factional fault-lines in the north and the west. As the fighting has raged in the south, the instability has begun to infect previously secure areas.

"The north has become very unstable. A lot of weapons have been distributed and stockpiled. The warlords of all ethnic groups have come together with the drug mafias," says Mohamadullah Shoiab Shamkar, deputy director of tribal affairs for Fedayeen-e-Sol, a group of tribal elders from around Afghanistan who are looking at ways to stem the growing insecurity. "None of these people wants the constitution or the rule of law to succeed."

Since July in Faryab province, which borders Turkmenistan, there has been a spate of factional battles between forces loyal to Gen Abdul Rashid Dostum, an Uzbek warlord, and a rival commander. Their brief clashes have killed tens rather than the hundreds who have died in battles between the Taliban and Nato troops in the south but could herald more trouble to come. "The tensions between warring factions are now being exploited by insurgents and we have reports of militant activity in the south of Faryab," says one person involved with the Nato-led force in the country.

The bulk of the 2,700 troops in the north are German and are constrained by caveats that would not allow them to leave their bases to intervene in a big clash in the region. Italian, Spanish and Lithuanian troops in the west are similarly hidebound.

Last month, gun battles between rival factions in Shindand, near Herat, left about 30 dead. The main factor holding the west of Afghanistan together is the positive influence of neighbouring Iran, which "is pumping a lot of money into the reconstruction of the west", says a senior US administration official in Washington.

True, the standing armies of the leading warlords who ousted the Taliban – such as Abdul Rashid Dostum, Ismael Khan and Mohammed Atta – have been disbanded. Their factions remain splintered, even in parliament, where they are unable to present a solid block against the Afghan government. But the fault lines between the groups are exposed and ready for insurgents linked with the Taliban to exploit.

Riots that swept Kabul six months ago, leaving more than 20 dead, emboldened factional leaders across the north and west. The May violence in the capital sent a signal about the weakness of the central government around the country, says Nader Nadery, head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission. "Commanders in the north saw the riots in Kabul just 5km away from Karzai's palace and asked themselves, 'Why should we be afraid of these guys sitting in the capital and give up our guns?' "

Weapons prices in northern Afghanistan more than doubled over the summer as commanders again began stockpiling arms. Consequently a UN-backed programme to disarm illegal militias has ground to a halt countrywide.

As local commanders seek to strengthen their hands against the central government, aid and reconstruction workers are increasingly being caught in the crossfire. Since the beginning of the year, more aid workers have been killed in the north and west of Afghanistan than the south.

Nine staff with aid agencies or the UN were killed in the north, 13 in the west and four in and around Kabul, compared with two in the south, according to the Afghanistan NGO Security Network. Although there are fewer aid workers in the restive south and east, the numbers also reflect the remobilisation of Islamic militant groups such as Hezb-e-Islami in the north and west as well as growing lawlessness linked to drugs and crime.

As the traditional ethnic enemies of the Pashtun Taliban who hail from the south and east, the Tajik, Uzbek and Hazara militia in the north and west are against the Taliban's return – but this may have lulled western governments into a false sense of security.

Michael Shaikh, a researcher with New York-based Human Rights Watch, says that Northern Alliance leaders – who battled each other and then the Taliban during the civil war of the early 1990s before coming to power in 2001 – need the Karzai government as a bulwark against the violence in the south. But he adds: "That doesn't mean they won't try to weaken the government and try to gain autonomy in their own areas. There are factors up there that could enable an insurgency."

With leading members of the Northern Alliance sidelined by Mr Karzai, their support for the government is waning, western officials and Afghan legislators say. "We agreed to work together in Bonn. We had an unofficial agreement. It was a promise but it was our mistake to trust Karzai. He called all the Northern Alliance leaders warlords and none of them are in positions of power now," says Mr Registani.

Younus Qanooni, parliamentary speaker and one of the architects of the Bonn agreement for the Northern Alliance, says the government is losing support and could face a crisis of public confidence. "We have seen that people who laid the foundations of the government have been pushed to the side," he says.

Although many of the marginalised still support the government, that could easily change.

39 Suspected Taliban Jailed In Pakistan (AP-Y)

By Abdul Sattar

AP, November 22, 2006

Police arrested 39 Afghans suspected of being Taliban fighters in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta, an official said Tuesday, though an Islamist group insisted the detainees were only students.

The arrests late Monday and early Tuesday came in separate raids on rented houses in areas with large Afghan refugee populations, said Chaudhry Mohammed Yaqoob, chief of police in Baluchistan province, whose capital is Quetta.

Pakistan is under pressure from the U.S. and neighboring Afghanistan to do more to detain Taliban militants or extremists allied with the toppled Afghan regime. The Pakistani government denies turning a blind eye to such activities, saying it is doing its best to crack down on militants.

Police are interrogating the suspects to learn if any senior Taliban figures were among them, Yaqoob said. Afghan officials have alleged Taliban leader Mullah Omar is in Quetta, but Pakistan has rejected the claim.

A spokesman for a pro-Taliban Islamic group protested the arrests, claiming the men were Islamic students and not fighters.

"They came here to study. They have no link with fighting," said Abdul Sattar Chisti of Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam party, a key member of a six-party Islamic political coalition.

Dozens of Taliban suspects have been arrested in the city in recent months, with many handed over to Afghan authorities, Yaqoob said. Among them are militants being treated at Quetta hospitals after being wounded in clashes with NATO and U.S. forces in Afghanistan, he said.

Pakistan had supported the Taliban before severing ties with the militia and backing the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Max Boot: Cutting And Running On Our Allies (LAT)

Max Boot

Washington's history of abandoning friends doesn't give Iraqis much confidence.

MANY AMERICANS have been wondering why so many Iraqis are willing to fight for militias and terrorist groups but not for the American-backed government. Look at it from their perspective. Would you stake your life on a regime whose existence depends on Washington's continuing support? Given our long, shameful record of leaving allies in the lurch, that has never seemed to be a smart bet.

We have been betraying friends since our first overseas conflict, against the Barbary pirates who captured ships off the African coast and enslaved their crews. To defeat the pasha of Tripoli, the U.S. made common cause with his brother, Hamet Karamanli. In 1804, American envoy William Eaton led a motley force of mercenaries and Marines across North Africa to install Karamanli on the throne. The offensive was called off prematurely when President Jefferson's envoy reached a deal with the pasha to free his American captives in return for $60,000. Karamanli was evacuated to the U.S., but his family members were left as hostages. Eaton raged: "Our too credulous ally is sacrificed to a policy, at the recollection of which, honor recoils, and humanity bleeds."

Something similar could have been said about U.S. conduct after World War I. President Wilson was the leading champion of "national self-determination" at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919, yet the U.S. did nothing to safeguard the states he helped midwife. We stood by, for instance, when Czechoslovakia and Poland were occupied by the Nazis. This callous indifference was repeated after World War II when we did too little to save the Eastern Europeans from Russian occupation.

Postwar U.S. administrations compounded this duplicity when they urged the "captive" peoples behind the Iron Curtain to seek their freedom and yet did nothing to help the East Germans in their 1953 uprising, the Hungarians in 1956 or the Czechs in 1968. No one is suggesting that Washington should have risked World War III, but we might have put more diplomatic and economic pressure on the Soviet Union to mitigate the worst of their crackdowns. If we weren't willing to do even that, we shouldn't have instigated the uprisings in the first place.

Cuban anti-communists fared just as poorly at American hands. On April 17, 1961, 1,500 exiles organized by the CIA landed at the Bay of Pigs. The Cuban army counterattacked, and the rebels were killed or captured. The outcome might have been different if the U.S. had been willing to provide air cover, but President Kennedy refused to do so because he wanted to hide U.S. complicity.

In the following years, the U.S. waged a massive war to stop a communist takeover of South Vietnam. By 1973, we had tired of the conflict, and the South Vietnamese were left to fend for themselves. Thousands were killed. Many others wound up in brutal reeducation camps or took to the seas in leaky boats.

The U.S. was equally inconstant in its support of the rebels battling the Sandinista government in Nicaragua in the 1980s. We went from backing the Contras to cutting them off, heedless of the cost to fighters who were risking their necks to fight an oppressive regime. And then there was the shah of Iran, installed by the CIA and Britain's MI6 in 1953 and then abandoned by the United States in 1979 — and, unlike Hamet Karamanli, not even given refuge on our shores.

But that was nothing compared to the betrayal of the Iraqi Kurds and Shiites in 1991. President George H.W. Bush urged Iraqis to "take matters into their own hands" and overthrow Saddam Hussein, yet stood by as Hussein's henchmen brutally put down the uprisings. The U.S. did not even shoot down Iraqi gunships, which could have been done at little risk to American forces.

This long trail of American treachery has grave consequences for our foreign policy. It emboldens our enemies (the Bay of Pigs led to the Cuban missile crisis, for example), dispirits our friends and makes it harder to achieve our objectives. Knowing our history, few Iraqi leaders are counting on American support in the future. They're making their deals with the devil, whether neighboring states or sectarian militias. And if we do scuttle out of Iraq prematurely, Afghans and others whose support we seek will get the message again: Don't trust Uncle Sam.

The least we can do is to assure those Iraqis who have worked closely with American forces — whether as janitors, translators, soldiers or bureaucrats — that, if we do leave, they and their families will receive asylum in the United States. We should not sacrifice another "too credulous ally" on the altar of a dishonorable and inhumane policy.

Army Debuts New Slogan In Recruiting Commercials (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson,

DOJ_NMG_0097136

The Army, facing another tough recruiting season, launched a $200 million-a-year advertising campaign this month and unveiled a new slogan: "Army Strong."

The campaign's core message is that the Army builds not only physical but also mental and emotional strength in recruits, bonding them into a powerful, close-knit team.

"There's strong, and then there's Army strong," a deep male voice intones as martial music rises from a brass band in the background.

The television ads, launched nationwide for Veterans Day along with Internet placements and other outreach, omit all but the most fleeting images related to the all-volunteer Army's biggest endeavor ever: the war in Iraq.

The main 30- and 60-second ads show soldiers jogging in formation, scaling a rope obstacle course and leaping out of a helicopter -- all take place in what appear to be familiar, grassy, domestic settings. The only brief glimpse of what could possibly be Iraq is of a group of soldiers hastily raising a tent -- although, unlike others in the ad, these soldiers wear no helmets or body armor.

There are obvious reasons the Army might not want to underscore to potential recruits, and their parents, that signing up these days almost inevitably means deployment to combat zones in Afghanistan or Iraq, where the majority of the more than 2,850 killed and 21,000 wounded have been soldiers.

The Army missed its fiscal 2005 recruiting target by more than 6,000 soldiers but rebounded last year with the aid of thousands of added recruiters, a doubling of the maximum enlistment bonus to $40,000 and some eased standards. The Army begins fiscal 2007 with another hefty target of 80,000 recruits and only about 15 percent already in the pipeline -- compared with a goal of 25 to 30 percent.

Army officials acknowledge that parents and other influential adults are less likely to recommend military service today because of the ongoing conflicts, and surveys have shown that the wars have made some young people more wary of enlisting.

To address these concerns, two of the ads feature the parents of soldiers -- a farming couple and a mechanic and his wife -- whose worries about Army service evolve into pride. "I was pretty nervous, apprehensive," says the father, wearing a 1st Infantry Division cap and standing beside a cornfield.

"If your son or daughter wants to talk with you about joining the Army, listen. You made them strong, we'll make them Army strong," the announcer says in the English and Spanish ads launched on MTV, the History Channel, the Discovery Channel and other stations.

The television ads are coupled with Internet recruiting initiatives aimed at helping youths do their own research, including a presence on YouTube, Google, Yahoo and MySpace. Last Friday, the campaign expanded to offer potential recruits an "Ask a Soldier" discussion forum at GoArmy.com.

New York advertising firm McCann Erickson designed the campaign after winning the two-year Army contract, which can be renewed for three additional years.

The ads were tested on hundreds of soldiers, although studies show that it is difficult for the military to gain an accurate measure of the effectiveness of advertising, which is relatively expensive compared with other recruiting tools such as educational benefits and bonuses.

Asked how they felt about the "Army Strong" pitch, soldiers at the Pentagon had mixed reactions. "I like it because it gives a better picture of what the Army is," said Lt. Col. Wayne Cherry, a liaison officer for the Army's chief of staff. " 'Army Strong' is like a football team, a baseball team."

Sgt. 1st Class Mark Johnson was less enthusiastic. " 'Army Strong' is not telling me anything. It doesn't touch any emotional string," he said. "I don't think it will inspire people."

While soldiers were still formulating opinions on the new slogan, several held strong views about past ditties such as the nebulous "Army of One," which survived only five years until being replaced by "Army Strong."

"The 'Army of One' got lost in translation," quipped Col. David Reese, director for ministry initiatives of the Army's chief of chaplains. "I like 'Army Strong' because it symbolizes cohesiveness."

By far the most popular recent slogan, according to soldiers interviewed, was "Be All You Can Be," which lasted 20 years until a recruiting downturn saw it changed in 2001.

"To me, 'Army Strong' is kind of faddish. I've always liked 'Be All You Can Be' -- I missed that," said Lt. Col. Stephen Durham, a logistician.

" 'Be All You Can Be' could have gone on forever. It's such an evergreen thing," another Army official said wistfully.

DOJ:

GAO: DOJ Needs To Fix Classification Problems (GCN)

By Kerri Hostetler, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department needs a standard classification system and needs to address its staffing shortage, according to a report issued by the Government Accountability Office.

DOJ and its bureaus, specifically the FBI, were under review to determine if the department implemented the National Archives and Records Administration's Information Security Oversight Office (ISOO) recommendations to correct problems in their document classification systems.

ISOO is responsible for oversight of national security classification programs for Executive Branch agencies. GAO conducted the study because of the important role information protection and sharing plays in preventing terrorist attacks, the report said.

DOJ ranks third in the number of documents classified in the executive branch, behind the Defense Department and the CIA. Within DOJ, the FBI handles 98 percent of that work.

In any DOJ entity, a document can be classified in one of five ways: Limited Office Use Only, For Office Use Only, Law Enforcement Sensitive, Propriety Information or DEA-sensitive (specific to DEA). Each of these designations have "unique definitions and safeguard requirements," but they do not have "specific guidance on the types of information that merit each designation," the report said.

Without specific guidelines, employees do not know if the information warrants a sensitive but classified distinction. The components of DOJ do not train their employees to make these decisions nor do they oversee the process by which employees label the information.

Coordinating the classification process within DOJ will not take place until the end of December. Officials are waiting on results from an interagency work group that is standardizing classification procedures throughout the government. The agency said once these standards are available, they will make additional changes to their component's current practices.

Once the work group's standards are available, auditors recommend the attorney general make DOJ:

Establish specific guidance for applying the designations they will use;

Ensure that all employees authorized to make the designations have the necessary training before they can designate documents; and

Set internal controls for overseeing sensitive but unclassified designations to help ensure that they are properly applied. DOJ has taken action on five of the 10 ISOO recommendations, GAO found. The department has addressed its need to update and make its training more relevant and to fix its component monitoring problems. But Justice needs more people to do this and the department has failed to address its staff shortage issues, which GAO cited as ISOO's most important recommendation.

By not addressing the issue they do not have the resources to fix problems, such as insufficient training and oversight, the report said. Also, the department doesn't know how many people they will need to sufficiently perform its tasks nor does it know which recommendations take priority once the resource void is corrected.

The report said the staff shortage puts the classification program at risk because they are the people who set policy, provide training and oversee classification departmentwide.

ISOO also recommends an increase in DOJ security office clearance, but the agency disagrees with the notion because the program managers of the security office already have access to senior members of the department. Other recommendations not addressed by DOJ include: briefing exiting employees about the need to keep classified information secret, addressing already existing inspection problems and monitoring classification practices.

In all, the FBI implemented or taken action on 11 of the 12 recommendations issued by ISOO.

GAO Sees Risk In Classification (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department's classification program, which determines what information could reasonably be expected to damage the country's national security if disclosed publicly, is at risk because of a lack of adequate staffing, according to a government report.

In a 50-page report yesterday, the Government Accountability Office said the department's classification-management program needs to assess its "optimum" manpower requirements, develop a strategy to meet them, and then implement internal controls "to ensure proper use of sensitive but unclassified designations."

"The September 11 attacks showed that agencies must balance the need to protect and share sensitive information to prevent future attacks," the report says. "Agencies classify this information or designate it sensitive but unclassified to protect and limit access to it."

But, according to the GAO, the department is at risk because it has not addressed the problem of insufficient staffing to effectively manage and oversee the program, noting it has one staff member to cover departmentwide training issues and three staffers to oversee 3,500 locations under the program.

"According to the program manager, with these resources, the security office was reacting to classification issues that arose rather than being proactive to prevent them," the GAO said.

Staffing increases for the Justice Department program were recommended by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was asked this year to see how well the department and the FBI had responded to the request.

The GAO said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales should determine what staffing he needs to carry out the responsibilities of the department's classification-management program and devise a strategy to make those resources available and use them effectively.

Justice Department officials, according to the GAO report, said it "is trying to address its resources constraints, a long-standing problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007."

The GAO noted that all records of a permanent historical value older than 25 years that contain classified national security information automatically will be declassified on Dec. 31, and each year thereafter, and "may be available for public disclosure, unless an agency head or senior agency official determines that these records fall within an exemption that permits continued classification."

It said the documents that could be released without proper classification could "seriously impair relations between the United States and a foreign government; undermine diplomatic activities of the United States; identify a human intelligence source; or violate a statute, treaty or international agreement."

But, it said, the problem continues because the department's security office did not receive additional resources, as requested, nor has Justice reallocated resources from other activities to that office.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Drops Bid To Reinstate Lay's Convictions For Enron Fraud (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

The U.S. government dropped an attempt to restore the convictions of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay, who died six weeks after being found guilty of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the company.

Lay died of a heart attack in July after being convicted in May of 10 fraud and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake threw out the verdicts under a legal principle that erases convictions of defendants who die before they can appeal.

The government moved yesterday to withdraw a Nov. 16 notice of an appeal of Lake's decision. Steven Tyrrell, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, said in the document the government made the move after a bill to change the law was introduced in Congress. He didn't elaborate.

``Now, from a criminal standpoint, Ken Lay is forever exonerated," said Ed Tomko, a former federal prosecutor who defended another Enron executive against fraud charges.

Tomko said efforts to change the law are ``largely meaningless" to Lay's criminal case, because lawmakers can't apply punishments retroactively.

``It might mean something to the next case," Tomko said. ``But the government is already chasing Ken Lay's money in a civil case."

U.S. authorities last month filed a civil forfeiture case against Lay's estate, seeking $12.5 million for victims of Enron's collapse. The government asked for a jury trial to re- establish Lay's responsibility for the fraud.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch and Samuel Buffone, Lay's appellate lawyer, declined to comment on the government's decision not to appeal.

More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee retirement funds vanished virtually overnight when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001, following revelations of widespread accounting fraud at the Houston-based energy company.

Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion in stock market losses.

A total of 24 people besides Lay were convicted or pleaded guilty in Enron cases. Four of the 24 had convictions reversed on appeal, and more appeals are pending. Another six people are awaiting trial.

Jeffrey Skilling, former Enron chief executive officer, was convicted with Lay and was sentenced to 24 years in prison. He is to start serving his sentence Dec. 12 in Minnesota.

The case is U.S. v. Lay, H-04-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Department Declines To Pursue Porter Accusation (LVRJ)

By Steve Tetreault, STEPHENS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Las Vegas Review-Journal, November 22, 2006

Ex-staffer alleged illegal fundraising calls made

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department has decided not to pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, a practice that would be illegal if proved, officials confirmed Monday.

The charge was leveled by a former Porter staffer who offered e-mails in support of his charge against the Nevada Republican. Coming during the election season in October, it roiled the U.S. House campaign that pitted Porter, the incumbent and eventual winner, against Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen.

Officials from the Nevada Democratic Party, which pressed the Justice Department to pursue the allegation, were told late last week by the FBI that an investigation was not moving forward, state party chairman Tom Collins said Monday.

Porter said he was notified of the same on Nov. 9, two days after the election, by Steve Martinez, FBI special agent in charge of the Las Vegas office.

"I take it the fact the FBI is not moving forward is that they are confident and they didn't sense the need," Porter said. "Anyway, it was not true."

Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, said, "The FBI looked at it and the matter was declined." Sierra said he could not provide further information as to the review and the decision process.

Collins said no reason was given to him. He said there were no signs to Democrats in Las Vegas that the FBI pursued the matter.

"You have to look at who hires these guys in the Justice Department," Collins said. "This is just the typical Bush-Cheney cover-up stuff. Jon Porter has done nothing to clear his name."

Porter said he took the news as vindication "by the highest law enforcement in the land," and that the accusation was suspect from the start.

"This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee," he said.

Jim Shepard, the former employee who lives in Virginia, could not be reached by telephone and by e-mail on Monday.

Shepard, who worked from March to the end of June as Porter's scheduler and executive assistant, alleged that Porter on five dates made calls to potential campaign donors from his Washington office and his district office in Henderson.

Federal law makes it illegal to solicit or receive a donation of any kind in any official building. In Washington, lawmakers customarily walk to Republican or Democratic party headquarters on Capitol Hill to utilize small rooms for fundraising calls.

Shepard said he sat across for Porter in his Washington office while the congressman sought campaign funds. In Nevada, he said, Porter eschewed driving from Henderson to his campaign consultant's office in Summerlin, and made calls from his official office on three occasions in advance of President Bush's visit to Las Vegas in April.

Shepard made available e-mails in which he warned top Porter staffers against the practice. In response, Porter produced phone records and copies of his daily schedule that challenged some of the charges made by Shepard.

FBI Won't Probe Rep. Porter Fundraising Calls, Officials Say (AP)

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The Justice Department will not pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, officials said in Washington, D.C.

The charge, involving a practice that would be illegal if proved, was made in October by a former Porter staffer during Porter's re-election campaign against Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen. The staffer offered e-mails as evidence of his claim.

"The FBI looked at it and the matter was declined," Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, told the Las Vegas Review-Journal for a Tuesday report. Sierra said he could not provide further information.

Porter said Steve Martinez, FBI special agent in charge of the Las Vegas office, told him the same thing two days after the Nov. 7 election.

"I take it the fact the FBI is not moving forward is that they are confident and they didn't sense the need," Porter said. "Anyway, it was not true. This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee."

Nevada state Democratic Party chairman Tom Collins said Justice Department officials said late last week that the FBI probe was not moving forward. Collins said no reason was provided.

He alleged that Porter on five dates made calls to potential campaign donors from his Washington office and his district office in Henderson.

In response, Porter produced phone records and copies of his daily schedule that challenged some of the charges made by Shepard.

Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life In Prison (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0097141

SANTA ANA – A federal judge sentenced three suspected leaders of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang to life terms Tuesday, saying the sentences were the only just response to three decades of orchestrated murders and attempted murders in some of the nation's toughest penitentiaries.

Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, was sentenced to four consecutive life terms without possibility of parole, a sentence automatically imposed after a jury deadlocked earlier this year on the death penalty. Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham , 59, also escaped the death penalty but received three consecutive life terms without possibility of parole.

A third defendant, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle, was sentenced to three consecutive life terms and will likely die in prison. He had not been eligible for the death penalty.

The men showed no reaction as the verdicts were announced, but they hugged their attorneys and shook the hands of other defense attorneys before being escorted out by federal marshals.

Carter said the sentences were appropriate for crimes "spanning well over 30 years of murder and organizational murder."

"It's almost inconceivable and the duration of time is almost inconceivable," Carter said of the string of murders, attempted murders and other crimes before handing down the sentence.

The defendants have 10 days to file appeals with the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

Defense attorneys said they were disappointed, but not surprised, with the sentences.

"This was inevitable," said Bernard Rosen, Hevle's co-counsel. "We've got some excellent legal arguments on appeal, so it ain't over yet."

Among other things, the jury convicted Mills and Bingham for inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., in 1997 that resulted in the deaths of black inmates Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the rival DC Blacks prison gang. Those killings made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty under the statute of Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering.

Hevle, 55, and a fourth defendant, Christopher Overton Gibson, were convicted of conspiring to murder the black inmates. Gibson, 47, is recuperating from back surgery and was not sentenced Tuesday. He faces a sentence of 20 years to life in prison.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989. Gibson was not charged with that count.

Prosecutors spent six years building their case against suspected members of the Aryan Brotherhood in an effort to dismantle the violent white supremacist organization accused of ordering hits and running drug rings, gambling rings and protection rackets from behind bars.

On Friday, prosecutors dropped a bid to place severe lifestyle restrictions on the men. They had originally asked Carter to prohibit visits, letters and phone calls to the convicts from anyone but their attorneys and keep writing tools, paper and previously viewed reading material out of their cells.

Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts.

Instead, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe said in court papers that the government would likely pursue the restrictions "administratively," meaning they would be imposed by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales without a court hearing or judge's order.

On Tuesday, Carter said he was worried that Gonzales would impose the restrictions without ensuring that the Bureau of Prisons could enforce them. He read an Associated Press article aloud in court citing the shortage of guards and deteriorating conditions at the maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., where the men will likely serve their sentences.

"I can only pray that the attorney general will provide the resources to carry out these conditions," Carter said, adding that it was the only way to prevent "further inmates and members of the Bureau of Prisons staff (from being) hurt and, God forbid, killed."

Carter said he would have imposed the restrictions against Mills and cited testimony about threats Mills made to prison staff and an attempt to smuggle cyanide into a federal prison in Marion, Ill., to poison the guards.

Rosen, Hevle's attorney, said having Gonzales order the restrictions instead of a judge will make it harder to appeal them.

Inmates, unaided by their attorneys, must exhaust a series of appeals to prison officials before applying for a hearing before the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver. That hearing is not guaranteed, he said.

3 Hispanics Sentenced To Life In Killing Of Blacks (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

Three Los Angeles-area Hispanic gang members have been sentenced to life in prison in what federal prosecutors called hate-crime attacks that randomly targeted black non-gang members, including women and children.

Gilbert Saldana, 27, Alejandro Martinez, 28, and Fernando Cazares, 25, were sentenced Monday to consecutive life terms without the possibility of parole by U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson in Los Angeles for their roles in the slaying of two black men in 1999 and 2000.

Judge Anderson said the men, members of the Avenues gang, maintained a "reign of terror" over the Highland Park area northeast of Los Angeles that had "far-reaching consequences." Under federal sentencing guidelines, the judge could have imposed lesser sentences but declined to do so.

Prosecutors said the men tried to drive blacks out of the neighborhood in a six-year conspiracy of violence and threats.

Law-enforcement authorities said the prosecution was one of the first prominent cases in which the Justice Department targeted street gang members with hate-crime laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups.

In October, Robert B. Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division at the FBI's Los Angeles office, told a House subcommittee that gangs and other criminal enterprises pose increasing concerns for the international law-enforcement and intelligence communities.

Calling gangs "more violent, more organized and more widespread than ever before," Mr. Loosle estimated that there are 30,000 gangs nationwide with 800,000 members affecting 2,500 communities.

Porfirio Avila, 31, a fourth man convicted in the Highland Park case, is scheduled for sentencing by Judge Anderson Dec. 18. Avila is in prison on separate state murder charges. A fifth man, Merced Cambero, was indicted but has fled and is listed as a fugitive.

Saldana, Martinez and Cazares were found guilty this summer of violating the civil rights of blacks in the gang's neighborhood by attacking and sometimes killing them. Christopher Bowser was fatally shot while waiting at a bus stop on Dec. 11, 2000, and Kenneth Wilson, 38, was killed while looking for a parking place on April 18, 1999.

Saldana was convicted of being the triggerman in the Wilson murder and is serving a life sentence in state prison for another murder. Martinez was convicted of instigating the Wilson slaying and encouraging his fellow gang members to kill Mr. Wilson. Cazares was convicted of serving as a lookout during that murder.

During the June trial, prosecutors documented several attacks by gang members on blacks, including the shooting of a 15-year-old boy on a bicycle; the attack on a jogger, who was hit in the head with a pistol; and the assault of a woman, who was knocked off her bike, and her husband, who was threatened with a box cutter.

Assistant FBI Director J. Stephen Tidwell, who heads the bureau's Los Angeles office, said the case represented "the successful and unprecedented result of a lengthy investigation into civil rights violations, including multiple violent assaults and murder, committed by this violent gang."

He said the FBI has offered a $20,000 reward for information on Cambero's whereabouts "to bring closure to the family of the victim who was murdered based on the color of his skin."

Brokers Not Guilty Of Bribing BWC Exec (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, November 22, 2006

AKRON — After about three hours of deliberation, a jury today acquitted two Cleveland-area brokers accused of conspiring to bribe the former chief financial officer at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with use of a Florida condominium.

The six-man, six-woman jury returned not-guilty verdicts on all charges against Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil after closing arguments in which their attorneys argued that the government's key witness was not credible.

"The length of the deliberations speaks to the strength of the government's case," Lewis attorney Roger Synenberg said after the verdict, which followed the two-week trial.

Lewis and O'Neil and their family members hugged and celebrated after the verdict, with an emotional Lewis saying the trial ordeal was worse than serving in Korea.

"Korea was easier, even when everyone was shooting at me," said Lewis, 72, of Willoughby Hills. He added that he never doubted the outcome of the trial because he trusted God and his defense team.

O'Neil, 55, of Chesterland, thanked his friends and clients, including U.S. Sen. George V. Voinovich, for standing behind him. O'Neil handles Voinovich's personal finances.

"There was a lot of political pressure on him," O'Neil said of Voinovich.

The verdict is a setback for the state and federal task force investigating allegations of corruption at the bureau. The investigation has produced convictions for 10 public figures so far, including Gov. Bob Taft and coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, who was sentenced Monday to 18 years in state prison. Noe is to serve that time after a 27-month stay in federal prison.

U.S. Attorney Greg White, of Cleveland, said he would not second-guess the jury's verdict and that the investigations will continue with the same intensity.

"We have to dissect the verdict and decide whether we need to adjust our direction," White said. "There'll be some disappointment, but we are determined to see this through to the end."

He declined to discuss specifics, but other authorities have said that ethics charges are expected soon against two or three individuals and that other matters are under investigation.

Lewis and O'Neil were charged with two counts of conspiring to bribe the bureau's Terrence W. Gasper and one count each of lying to an FBI agent about Gasper's role in purchasing the Florida condo in 1998.

Gasper testified that after a clandestine meeting with the brokers in the fall of 1996 at Mohican State Park near Perrysville, he and his former girlfriend picked out the $345,000 condo in Islamorada, Fla., for their personal use and that the brokers paid for it.

In return, Gasper said he ensured that the brokers received the maximum amount of commissions for stock trades, as well as fees from solicitation agreements that the brokers had with outside money managers who received bureau funding.

Prosecutors said Lewis and O'Neil split 50-50 nearly $6.8 million from the bureau from 1996-2004; it was a majority of their income during those years.

The defense maintained that the brokers' dealings with the bureau were all legitimate — making money for the agency in the process — and that the condo was an investment that they allowed Gasper and other friends and family members to use.

Synenberg and O'Neil attorney William Beyer used nearly their entire closing arguments yesterday to question the credibility of Gasper, who they say was lying to reduce his prison sentence after pleading guilty to corruption charges and agreeing to cooperate with authorities.

"So here you've got the rat in the corner," Synenberg told the jury. "A man who we now know was a habitual criminal, a man who we now know was a habitual liar, and he's cornered, and they've got him and he's smart enough to know it."

Beyer told the jury: "I submit to you that the government's case is only as strong as the foundation on which it is laid. It is a house of cards because it has to be based upon whether or not you believe Terry Gasper."

The defense called a parade of witnesses who vouched for the brokers' honesty and said that Lewis or O'Neil had offered them use of the condo. The brokers did not testify.

In her final presentation to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Benita Y. Pearson said that evidence beyond Gasper's testimony supported the charges.

She pointed to the testimony of a real-estate agent in Florida who said that Gasper picked out the condo and put down the initial $500 deposit for it — money that later was returned.

"We didn't choose Mr. Gasper," Pearson said. "Had we our choice, we'd have nuns and priests as our witnesses. Unfortunately, that wasn't an opportunity that was provided to us here. However, the defendants did choose Mr. Gasper."

Gasper, who pleaded guilty to both state and federal charges in June for trading bureau business for thousands of dollars in gifts and favors, has yet to be sentenced.

Ex-driver's License Examiner Sentenced (MURFP)

DOJ_NMG_0097144

By Lisa Marchesoni

Murfreesboro Post, November 22, 2006

One former driver's license examiner in Rutherford County was sentenced Monday to 19 months in prison and two years of supervised probation after his release, a federal prosecutor said.

Ex-examiner Bruce Conklin of Murfreesboro pleaded guilty in July to accepting more than $30,000 in bribes in connection with his job. He pleaded guilty to one conspiracy count that included allegations of providing driver licenses illegally in exchange for bribes and one count of accepting bribes.

Conklin accepted bribes from Winchester Driving School located next to the driver's testing center on Samsonite Boulevard.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Brad Hester, who prosecuted the case with assistant U.S. Attorney Hilliard Hester, said Conklin will enter the federal prison system. There are no federal prisons in Tennessee.

Conklin and five other people were charged in January in a six-count federal indictment as part of the 18-month Operation Crooked Highway probe.

Driving school employees paid the examiners to obtain driver's licenses and one-year driving certificates of driving for immigrants at the school who didn't complete the required 36 hours of training or had questionable documents about citizenship.

Conklin began working as an examiner June 16, 1999. Co-defendant Teresa Jones worked from Aug. 16, 2004 to March 16, 2005.

A federal jury convicted Jones Nov. 2 on charges of bribery, conspiracy to commit bribery and making false statements to the FBI. She faces 20 years in prison when sentenced Jan. 12.

Bryan Guess, owner and operator of the Winchester Driving School, pleaded guilty previously to three counts of public corruption by paying bribes to driver's license examiners.

He was sentenced last week to six years in prison.

Sheila Robertson, a driving school employee from July 2003 to March 2005, was convicted of paying the bribes along with Guess. She was sentenced to three years probation and 12 months of home detention as part of her probation.

The FBI, Internal Revenue Service, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and the Department of Safety investigated the case.

Authorities Charge Man With 1989 Slaying (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA -- Authorities have charged a white man with murder and ethnic intimidation in the shooting of a black man 17 years ago.

Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident before dawn Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Tuesday. Gibison is also charged with conspiracy and a firearms violation in the killing of 34-year-old Aaron Wood of Philadelphia on April 16, 1989.

Wood was found about a half-mile from his home in North Philadelphia, Williams said.

She would not disclose details on what led to authorities to Gibison, but said a warrant for his arrest was issued Nov. 3. He was arrested by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents and members of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Del. Man Is Arrested In 1989 Hate-crime Slaying (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 22, 2006

A joint task force of local and federal investigators arrested a white man they believe is responsible for the shooting death of a black man in a hate crime in North Philadelphia 17 years ago, the FBI announced yesterday.

Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident around 5 a.m. Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams.

In addition to murder, Gibison is charged with conspiracy, firearms violations and ethnic intimidation.

The charges, Williams said, were the result of an intense investigation into the death of Aaron Wood, a 34-year-old man who was shot to death in the 1300 block of Stillman Street shortly before 1 a.m. April 16, 1989.

Law enforcement officials said they could not disclose specific details related to the killing or the exact details of what led authorities to Gibison.

Sgt. William Britt, of the Philadelphia Police Department's Special Investigations Division of the Homicide Unit, said: "It is most certainly a racially motivated crime," but he did not elaborate.

Britt said also that information had become known in the last year that led the District Attorney's Office to convene a grand jury.

An arrest warrant was issued for Gibison on Nov. 3. He was captured by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents, and members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Britt said Wood's family had been notified.

Gibison, who was being held in Philadelphia, has a status hearing scheduled for next Wednesday, Williams said.

Gibison's public defender could not immediately be located.

Gibison, according to court records, has a long list of offenses dating back several years.

As a minor, according to the records, Gibison was charged with burglary, criminal mischief, assault and unlawful imprisonment.

In January 1996, according to court documents, Gibison pleaded guilty to firearms violations, including being in possession of 15 firearms, one of them a 12-gauge "street sweeper" shotgun.

The records also indicated that a prosecutor in a case involving Gibison had introduced evidence that he was a skinhead.

SEC Wins Asset Freeze Vs. Hedge Fund (HC/AP)

The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, November 22, 2006

TOOLS

WASHINGTON — The Securities and Exchange Commission said on Tuesday that a federal judge has agreed to freeze the assets of a New York hedge fund manager accused of bilking investors out of millions of dollars.

Spiro Germenis, the hedge fund manager, has been accused of diverting money from Oracle Services Inc. and Oracle Evolution LLC for his own use. He has fled to Greece, according to the SEC.

His attorney couldn't immediately be located for comment.

"We're aware that an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI is ongoing in addition to the SEC action that was just filed," said Zachary Margulis-Ohnuma, an attorney for Germenis's wife, Maria Germenis. He said that Mrs. Germenis was "doing everything she can to cooperate with the authorities."

Two Men Face Charges In Theft Of Laptops (MH)

By Larry Lebowitz

The Miami Herald, November 22, 2006

Authorities investigating the July theft of a federal agent's laptop containing the sensitive personal information of 133,000 Floridians, believe they have broken up a ring of computer thieves who may be responsible for its disappearance.

Two men are facing charges related to the theft of other laptops from vehicles near the Latin American Grill in Doral, where the agent's laptop was stolen from his parked sport-utility vehicle on July 27.

The laptop, which has not been recovered, contained investigative files including the Social Security numbers, addresses and birthdates of more than 133,000 Florida commercial truckers, pilots and drivers license holders.

The U.S. Department of Transportation Office of Inspector General, which employed the agent whose laptop disappeared, said it has found no evidence of credit fraud or identity theft since the laptop's disappearance.

The agent, who was never identified, subsequently resigned.

DOJ_NMG_0097146

Suspects Juan Esteban Calle, 25, and Carlos Andres Leon, 26, were arrested during an extensive surveillance operation by DOT inspector general, the FBI and Miami-Dade police at Doral area restaurant parking lots -- including the same restaurant where the agent's laptop disappeared.

With video cameras rolling, Calle used a lock-punching device similar to the one used in the DOT theft to open a passenger-side door and steal a decoy laptop with a tracking device attached.

Based on those arrests, officials said they uncovered a theft ring that specialized in stealing laptops, loading new operating systems onto them and then selling them on the used-computer market, mainly to high school students.

Adding the new systems essentially masked the data previously on the computer hard drives, the DOT inspector general's office said.

"The ring did not target the data and did not even attempt to access the data on the laptops they stole," according to the DOT inspector general's statement.

Calle faces trial Dec. 4 on federal charges of stealing U.S. property. He has pleaded not guilty and is being held without bail.

Leon has pleaded not guilty to state charges of attempted burglary and criminal mischief. He is free on $6,000 bail pending trial next week.

A second DOT inspector general's laptop that disappeared from an Orlando hotel conference room in April is still missing. That computer, belonging to former supervisor Barbara L. Barnet, contained personal information on 9,500 Floridians.

DOT Says Suspects In Custody, No ID Theft From Stolen Laptops (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

Two suspects have been arrested in the July theft of a U.S. government laptop computer containing sensitive information about more than 130,000 people and authorities said Tuesday it appears that no data breaches have occurred.

The U.S. Department of Transportation's Office of Inspector General said the suspects were arrested during a surveillance operation with the FBI and local police of a Miami-area Latin American Grill restaurant parking lot where the original DOT laptop was stolen from a government agent's vehicle on July 27.

Based on those arrests, officials said they uncovered a computer theft ring operating in the area that specialized in stealing laptops, loading new operating systems onto them and then selling them on the used-computer market mainly to high school students. Adding the new systems essentially masked the data previously on the computer hard drives.

"The ring did not target the data and did not even attempt to access the data on the laptops they stole," the DOT inspector general's office said in a statement.

The statement said that during the surveillance operation, one of the suspects used a device similar to that used in the DOT theft to "punch" open a lock on a passenger side door and steal a decoy laptop. The theft was caught on video.

Juan Esteban Calle, 25, faces trial Dec. 4 on federal charges of stealing U.S. property. Calle has pleaded not guilty and is being held without bail. The other suspect, 26-year-old Carlos Andres Leon, has pleaded not guilty to state charges of attempted burglary and criminal mischief. Leon is free on $6,000 bail pending trial.

The original stolen laptop has not been recovered. It contained information such as names, Social Security numbers and birthdates for about 133,000 Florida drivers license holders, pilots and commercial truck drivers.

The inspector general's statement said no evidence of credit fraud had occurred since the laptop went missing. But the agency also has contracted with a data breach analysis firm, ID Analytics Inc. of San Diego, to determine whether identity theft is occurring and how any data might be used.

A second DOT inspector general's office laptop was also stolen during a hotel conference in Orlando in April. It contained sensitive information on about 9,500 individuals, all of whom were on the stolen Miami laptop as well.

The Orlando investigation has made less headway and is continuing, the inspector general's office said. A final report on both thefts is expected by the end of this year.

Key Witness In Polygamist's Trial Describes ‘darkest Time' (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner

USA Today, November 22, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah — In tearful testimony, the lead prosecution witness against polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs said Tuesday that she was threatened with banishment if she did not marry her cousin at age 14.

The woman, now 20 and married to a different man, described being coerced by Jeffs and other leaders of the religious sect during a preliminary hearing. "This was the darkest time in my entire life."

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging the marriage between the witness and her 19-year-old cousin. A judge must decide whether there is probable cause for a trial.

Jeffs, who sat nearly motionless at the hearing, is leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (FLDS), which allows polygamy. The fundamentalist church was founded more than a century ago in defiance of the mainstream Mormon church's ban on polygamy.

The woman said she pleaded with Jeffs and others, weeping as she was fitted for the wedding dress and refusing to say the marriage vow until her mother joined those pressuring her.

"I felt totally powerless, trapped," she said. "I was scared. I didn't have anywhere to go."

Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband.

During cross-examination, defense attorney Tara Isaacson sought to portray the woman as a willing participant in the wedding and argued that Jeffs did not know the couple had sex.

Isaacson introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from the girl's journal, in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage.

The woman testified that the entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner.

Isaacson also noted that the witness has filed a civil suit against Jeffs, suggesting that the criminal case was initiated for monetary gain. The woman denied that, saying she turned to authorities so other FLDS children would not be victimized. "It is my worst nightmare that my sisters will go through what I went through," she said.

The Nevada marriage in 2001 was a "spiritual" bond not sanctioned by the state. The woman said she repeatedly tried to reject sexual overtures, to no avail. The couple separated in the fall of 2004.

USA TODAY does not identify alleged victims of sexual assault.

The woman, no longer with the church, married a man who she said rescued her from the FLDS. She is pregnant with his child.

Utah and Arizona prosecutors began a legal assault on the FLDS and Jeffs two years ago amid reports of child marriages, the banishment of teenage boys and financial abuses. Jeff's became a fugitive after his indictments in Arizona and Utah. He was arrested in August by a Nevada state trooper during a routine traffic stop.

Bride Felt 'Trapped And Defeated' In Arranged Marriage (SDUT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner And Paul Foy, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 22, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah – A woman who claims she was forced at 14 to marry a cousin called it the "darkest time of my entire life," telling a judge Tuesday that she agreed to a quick "peck" of a kiss before locking herself in a bathroom.

The ceremony at a Nevada motel in 2001 was "one of the most painful things I've ever been through. I just want to move on with my life and forget it happened," the woman, now 20, testified.

She is the key witness in the case against Warren Jeffs, leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging the marriage between her and a 19-year-old man. A judge must decide whether there is probable cause to send Jeffs to trial.

Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and 5th District Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband.

On Tuesday, one of Jeffs' lawyers introduced photographs of a smiling, laughing couple and got the woman to acknowledge Jeffs never explicitly ordered her to have sex with her new husband.

The lawyer, Tara L. Isaacson, also introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from girl's journal in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage. The woman testified that the journal entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner.

"Was every day with (the husband) miserable?" Isaacson asked.

"Many of them were," the woman said.

Faithful church members revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to obey his every command, including marriage instructions, she testified.

"This was the darkest time of my entire life," she said.

She said she refused to say "I do," take her groom's hand or kiss him. Finally, she relented, submitting to a peck and then locking herself in the bathroom.

"I felt completely trapped and defeated," said the woman, who has left the FLDS church. The Associated Press does not identify victims of sexual assault.

Jeffs' defense team has said he is being persecuted for his religious beliefs.

Looking gaunt and pale in a dark gray suit, Jeffs smiled slightly throughout most of the hearing, which included testimony from two of the woman's sisters.

The FLDS church practices polygamy and represents itself as an offshoot of the mainstream Mormon church, based in Salt Lake City. The Mormons, however, disavow any connection and renounced polygamy in 1890 as a condition of statehood.

Prosecutors allege Jeffs forced the woman into the marriage despite her repeated objections. They say he told her it was her religious duty to submit to the marriage and to produce children.

Raised in the faith since birth, Jeffs' accuser said she felt a heavy responsibility to "the entire community" in the days leading to the marriage ceremony.

"I was scared. I didn't have any place to go," said the woman, who is married to a different man now and due to deliver a baby in two weeks. "I felt that if I didn't do what I was told, I would forever pay the consequences."

Based in the small border communities of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz., the FLDS practices arranged marriage for young girls and believes plural marriage secures exaltation in heaven. There are an estimated 10,000 members.

Security at the Washington County courthouse was extraordinary Tuesday, with police sharpshooters posted on the red rock hills that ring the building. No vehicles were allowed to park on the street.

FLDS Marriage A 'misery' (SLT)

By Brooke Adams, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, November 22, 2006

Women testify Jeffs compelled teens to wed older men

ST. GEORGE - For more than four hours Tuesday, Jane Doe IV testified about her unwanted marriage to a cousin and her attempts to get polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs to release her from the union.

But Doe also admitted she never explicitly accused her husband of rape in those conversations with Jeffs.

"I said to Warren he was touching me and doing things I didn't like," said Doe, now 20. "I didn't tell anybody I was being raped."

Testimony by Doe and two of her sisters Tuesday provided the most detailed account yet of what allegedly happened in 2001 when she was married at 14 to a 19-year-old cousin - but also raised questions about her motives, character and her claims of rape.

Fifth District Judge James L. Shumate continued the hearing until Dec. 14, when he will decide whether there is sufficient evidence to order Jeffs to trial on two first-degree felony charges of being an accomplice to rape.

The charges, punishable by up to life in prison, stem from counsel Jeffs gave Doe to proceed with the assigned marriage and subsequently officiating over it and advising her to remain in the union.

Jeffs was arrested Aug. 28 during a traffic stop on Interstate 15 outside Las Vegas, ending his 15 months as a fugitive. He has been in the Purgatory Correctional Facility since Sept. 5.

He appeared more gaunt, his suit hanging on his tall frame and his face drawn. As he entered the courtroom in the morning, he exchanged smiles with 10 FLDS members - among them Hildale City Councilman Lamar Johnson, Sam Roundy Sr. and his half-brother Joseph Jeffs - who attended the hearing.

Jeffs sat motionless, flanked by attorneys Wally Bugden and Tara Isaacson of Salt Lake and Richard Wright of Las Vegas, calmly watching as Doe and her two sisters testified.

Doe said she learned from her stepfather, Fred Jessop, she was to be married, an assignment her sister Rebecca Musser said Jessop had pushed.

Her shock at the news deepened, Doe said, when she learned she was to be married to a cousin she described as a name-calling bully.

Her pleas to stop or put off the marriage were ignored by Jessop, her mother and Jeffs, she said. Doe acquiesced in the end because she considered the union a revelation passed by God to Rulon Jeffs, the aging president and prophet of the FLDS church.

Rebecca Musser, Doe's older sister, said she was 19 when she became a plural wife of Rulon T. Jeffs in 1995; Rulon Jeffs, then leader of the FLDS church, was 83.

Musser said Rulon Jeffs was incapacitated by a stroke in 1997 and, by the time of her sister's wedding, Warren was making decisions for his father.

The wedding took place in a motel in Caliente, Nev., with Warren Jeffs officiating, Doe said, adding that she wept for hours before and was all but speechless during the ceremony.

Weeping again on the stand, Doe said, "This was the darkest time of my entire life, one of the most painful things I've ever been through."

The marriage was consummated about a month later, said Doe, much to her shock.

She described herself as miserable throughout the 3 1/2 -year union, and unhappiness drove her to meet with or phone Jeffs five times seeking release.

At one meeting, Jeffs gave her a book called In Truth and Light, a compilation of biblical, Mormon and FLDS teachings about marriage and child-rearing.

Theresa Blackmore, a sister, said Doe looked like a "body with no soul" in the months after the wedding and "there was never a time she was happy about the marriage, ever."

Prosecutors focused on Doe's understanding of FLDS teachings about dutiful wives who are obedient and told to "keep sweet."

Bugden and Isaacson countered that with passages from Jeffs' lessons and sermons in which he counsels FLDS faithful to be loving, kind and respectful - even advising them, in the words of a another religious leader, to treat their wives like "angels of God."

"This is something that was taught, but actions are different," Doe said.

Isaacson took most of the afternoon to carefully challenge Doe's reluctance to marry, her description of her husband's actions and her efforts to get out of the union.

She said Doe described her marriage as "all misery," but appeared to be smiling beside her husband in numerous photos taken during their marriage. Doe replied that she was faking it.

Isaacson also noted an entry in the young Doe's journal in which the girl, about a week before her marriage, pleaded with God for a husband.

Isaacson recounted statements Doe made to investigators about her poor treatment of her husband and asked her about love notes he had written to her.

Doe said she "sugared it up" at times, initiating and participating in sex with her husband to gain his favor during portions of their 3 1/2 -year union.

But, Doe said Tuesday, "I never wanted it."

Doe acknowledged Jeffs never explicitly told her to engage in sexual intercourse with her husband and said she used vague language to describe intimate acts she found unappealing.

Even when her mother-in-law questioned whether she was being treated well and advised her she could "say no," Doe never spoke out, Isaacson said.

Doe said her husband never forced her to have sexual relations but that "things happened between [them] that I didn't agree with."

Doe admitted that despite her unhappiness, she never sought help with leaving from sisters or her biological father or brothers who had left the faith and lived in Salt Lake City, where she also lived until moving to Hildale at age 13.

"That was never an option for me," Doe said.

Doe said she tried to make the marriage work but by 2003 had taken to living in her truck to avoid her husband.

That fall, she had also met "a gentleman I had decided to spend my life with," the man who is now her husband. Her first marriage collapsed, she acknowledged, after her husband found a receipt for condoms and a photograph of a trip she had taken with the boyfriend to Las Vegas.

"This all happened while you said you were trapped in Hildale," Isaacson told Doe.

In November 2004, Doe and her husband were called to a meeting with FLDS leaders; Jeffs, participating by telephone, expelled Doe from the faith.

Isaacson also questioned Doe's motives in filing criminal charges against Jeffs, saying the allegations came only after she sued him.

Doe said she decided to participate in the criminal case because "I wanted to help other girls who were in the same situation."

Preliminary Hearing Starts In Case Against Polygamist (NYT)

By John Dougherty

ST. GEORGE, Utah, Nov. 21 — Appearing frail and gaunt, Warren S. Jeffs, the fundamentalist Mormon polygamist leader, appeared in court on Tuesday and heard testimony from a prosecution witness who said he had “spiritually” married her when she was 14 to her first cousin, who was then 19.

The witness, now 20, testified in a preliminary hearing that Mr. Jeffs, other religious leaders and her mother coerced her into marrying her cousin in a secret wedding ceremony conducted by Mr. Jeffs in Caliente, Nev., on April 14, 2001. She said she had never been wed to the man in a civil ceremony and had never received a state marriage license.

Mr. Jeffs is charged with two felony counts of rape as an accomplice in connection with performing the religious marriage and directing the couple to have sexual intercourse against the will of the teenage girl. If convicted, Mr. Jeffs could be sentenced to life in prison.

The witness said she had been given less than a week’s notice that she had been selected for marriage by leaders of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

That group broke from the mainstream Mormon Church more than 110 years ago over the issue of polygamy. The Mormon Church, based in Salt Lake City, which embraced polygamy in the 19th century, now excommunicates any member who practices plural marriage.

The witness testified she had learned only a few days before the wedding the identity of her prospective husband.

“I was horrified when I finally realized who I was to marry,” she said. “I was devastated.”

Mr. Jeffs, 50, has been held in the Purgatory Jail in Washington County since his arrest on Aug. 28 after a traffic stop by the Nevada police northeast of Las Vegas.

He sat erect and stone-faced throughout the daylong proceeding, showing little reaction to testimony by the witness and two of her sisters.

The woman testified that she was first told she had been selected for marriage by a bishop of the group, Fred M. Jessop. She added that she had immediately called Mr. Jeffs and asked for a meeting with him and Mr. Jeffs's father, Rulon T. Jeffs. Both Fred Jessop and Rulon Jeffs have since died.

The woman testified that she had told Warren Jeffs that she did not want to be married. At the time of the conversation, Rulon Jeffs had suffered a series of strokes and his son was handling most of the church affairs.

The witness said she had told Mr. Jeffs: "I need some time to grow up. I'm not prepared for this responsibility, and I'm not ready to marry my cousin."

She said Mr. Jeffs had told her that her marriage to her cousin "was a revelation from God" and ordered her to prepare for the wedding.

She also testified that she had been afraid to disobey the orders of religious leaders because she believed her "salvation" was at stake. She testified that even if she had wanted to flee, she had had no means to escape.

Mr. Jeffs's lawyer, Walter F. Bugden Jr., told the news media after the hearing that the state was conducting "religious persecution" and predicted that Mr. Jeffs would be acquitted.

"There is no rape in this case," Mr. Bugden said. "Officiating at a wedding ceremony does not make Mr. Jeffs an accomplice to rape."

Judge James L. Shumate of the Fifth District Court said the hearing would continue Dec. 14.

Religion Key Witness Testifies In Case Against Polygamist (NPR)

By Michele Norris And Howard Berkes

NPR's All Things Considered, November 22, 2006

A young woman who says polygamist leader Warren Jeffs forced her to marry -- and have sex -- at age 14 offered dramatic testimony Tuesday in a courtroom in St. George, Utah.

Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, or FLDS Church. He's charged in Utah with two counts of "rape as an accomplice."

Tuesday's hearing was to determine whether the case will go to trial. It was the first time that Jeffs faced his accuser, the young woman who is the primary witness against him. NPR does not name alleged victims of sexual assaults.

She was 14, she told the court, when Jeffs ordered her into a "spiritual marriage" with her first cousin, a 19-year-old at the time, and then forced her to have sex with him. Such marriages are not legally recognized. Jeffs allegedly told the woman her salvation depended on her compliance.

In court, the young woman sobbed, cried and dabbed at tears as Jess watched her dispassionately. She described learning of her spiritual marriage, and said she was horrified and resisted. She also described the horror of her husband trying to consummate their marriage, which eventually he did.

The defense cross-examined Jess' accuser, showing photos of the couple smiling together. Defense lawyers also read from love notes her husband is said to have sent to the accuser. They also said that Jeffs gave the young woman religious advice and direction consistent with the tenets of his faith.

The hearing took place about 40 miles from the twin communities Jeffs and his group dominate. About 6,000 followers live in the border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. Jeffs and some of his followers also face charges in Arizona.

Some Curbs On Sex Offenders Called Ineffective, Inhumane (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

As convicted sex offenders go, they seem to pose little danger.

One is 100 years old. Another can barely walk and is in the late stages of Alzheimer's disease. Another is dying of heart disease in a nursing home.

Yet under a new Georgia law, thousands of registered sex offenders, even the old and feeble, could be pushed from their homes and hospices.

"He doesn't really know anything about it," said Ruby Anderson, 77, whose husband was convicted of having sex with a minor in 1997 and, at 81, no longer recognizes members of his family because of Alzheimer's disease. "The trouble is, I just don't know where we can go."

As states around the country have sought in recent years to control the whereabouts of convicted sex offenders, Georgia's law stands out as one of the toughest, a testament to the daunting public fears regarding children's safety.

The roughly 10,000 sex offenders living in Georgia have been forbidden to live within 1,000 feet of a school, playground, church or school bus stop. Taken together, the prohibitions place nearly all the homes in some counties off-limits -- amounting, in a practical sense, to banishment.

"My intent personally is to make it so onerous on those that are convicted of these offenses . . . they will want to move to another state," Georgia House Majority Leader Jerry Keen (R), who sponsored the bill, told reporters.

Since the law's enactment in July, however, a federal judge, human rights advocates and even some of the sheriff's departments that are supposed to enforce the measure have suggested that the zeal for safety may have gone too far.

The residency law applies not only to sexual predators but to all people registered for sexual crimes, including men and women convicted of having underage consensual sex while in high school.

Advocates for the sex offenders say the law is unfair to people who have served their sentences and been deemed rehabilitated. Many police officers, prosecutors and children's advocates also question whether such measures are effective. Most predators are mobile, after all, and by upending their lives, the law may make them more likely to commit other offenses, critics say.

"We should be concerned when we pass laws for political purposes that are irrational," said Sarah Geraghty, a staff lawyer for the Southern Center for Human Rights, the Atlanta-based group that filed court actions against the law's provisions. "This law will essentially render thousands of ex-offenders homeless, and that's just going to make them harder to monitor."

Besides the practical complications, she said, "forcing a terminally ill man to leave his hospice . . . shocks the conscience."

Exactly what to do with convicted sex offenders once they return to the community has been the focus of growing national attention.

Before 1994, only a handful of states required offenders to register their addresses with police. Now all 50 states do, as does the District.

Those lists have focused attention on where the sex offenders live, and as of this summer, 17 states had imposed residency requirements for them, according to research by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

This month, Californians voted to bar sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools or parks -- though a federal judge quickly blocked that provision.

In Iowa, which in 2002 became one of the first states to impose residency restrictions, police and prosecutors have united in opposition to the law, saying that it drives offenders underground and that there is "no demonstrated protective effect," according to a statement by the Iowa County Attorneys Association, which represents prosecutors.

"The law was well-intentioned, but we don't see any evidence of a connection between where a person lives and where they might offend," said Corwin R. Ritchie, executive director of the group.

Enforcing the law consumes lots of law enforcement time, he said, and leads some offenders to list interstate rest stops or Wal-Mart parking lots as their addresses.

"Our concern is that these laws may give a false sense of security," said Carolyn Atwell-Davis, director of legislative affairs for the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "We're not aware of any evidence that residency restrictions have prevented a child from being victimized."

Much of the public fear surrounding sex offenders has arisen from the perception that most commit another offense. But that idea is a "myth," according to the Center for Sex Offender Management, an affiliate of the Justice Department.

Child molesters have a 13 percent reconviction rate for sexual offenses, according to research cited by the group, and rapists have a 19 percent reconviction rate for sexual offenses. Concrete measures of recidivism are difficult to come by, however, because most researchers believe that crimes against children are underreported.

Even amid all the restrictions imposed by states, Georgia's attempt to control the sex offender population stood out.

Among those swept up under its definition of sex offender are a 26-year-old woman who was caught engaging in oral sex when she was in high school, and a mother of five who was convicted of being a party to a crime of statutory rape because, her indictment alleged, she did not do enough to stop her 15-year-old daughter's sexual activity.

Moreover, by prohibiting sex offenders from living within 1,000 feet of school bus stops, the law would force all or nearly all the offenders living in some counties to move.

That provision has been suspended, pending a federal court case. A consent order has temporarily halted the evictions of six elderly and disabled sex offenders, including Ruby Anderson's husband, Daniel.

But even without the bus stop provision, 78 of 129 registered sex offenders in Houston County, where the Andersons live, were required to move, according to the sheriff's department there.

Keen and other advocates have defended the legislation, calling it above all an effort to protect children.

"We felt if we were going to err on any side, we were going to err on the side of protecting the innocent rather than those who have already been convicted," he said.

He has no plans to alter it. As for those who feel it unfairly targets them, he said they can petition the local school board to move the bus stop.

Although the legal actions have focused attention on the rights of convicted sex offenders, he noted, the victims "have been given a life sentence."

"There's not a day goes by, if you pick up a newspaper or turn on the TV, that you don't see these crimes continue to happen," he said.

For those affected by the law, however, it seems to have reached too far.

"Every other block, there's a church," Ruby Anderson said. "Where can we go? I've checked."

Her husband, who was a janitor, was charged with statutory rape in 1996 for having sex with a girl younger than 14. He pleaded guilty on one count and was sentenced to probation, according to Houston County court records.

"At this late date for him, the law is very unfair," Ruby Anderson said. "He doesn't have any recollection of what happened."

FBI Opens Corruption Hot Line (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 22, 2006

In an effort to combat public corruption in Western Pennsylvania, the FBI has established a telephone hot line that people can call to file complaints of possible abuse by elected and appointed officials.

Tips via the FBI's line -- at 412-432-4722 -- can be made anonymously; they will be followed up on by investigators.

Public corruption has been stated as one of the highest priorities of the U.S. Department of Justice.

"We look forward to working with the citizens of Western Pennsylvania to root out corruption and restore credibility at all levels of government," said U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan.

FBI Subpoena Targets Records Of Grant Agency (NTP)

By Gordon Russell,

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 22, 2006

Now-defunct state office oversaw charities linked to lawmakers

BATON ROUGE -- A state office that oversaw a series of controversial charities tied to African-American legislators is being scrutinized by the FBI, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office confirmed Tuesday in announcing that it had complied with a subpoena for records from the department.

"The governor's office staff has complied with the FBI's request for information dating back to 1996 regarding certain programs funded by the former Office of Urban Affairs," Blanco's office said in a prepared statement.

The governor's office confirmed receipt of the subpoena Tuesday after a reporter inquired about it.

Before it was abolished earlier this year, the Office of Urban Affairs was in charge of overseeing grants to nonprofit agencies in the districts of black lawmakers. Critics commonly derided the grants -- and similar money doled out to rural districts -- as legislative "slush funds" that governors could use as an incentive to get reluctant legislators to vote their way.

Blanco's office refused to turn over a copy of the subpoena or divulge details about its contents, citing federal secrecy rules that bar such disclosures.

"Thursday, Nov. 16, staff members provided the documents requested and outlined the general operation of the office," Blanco's office said. "The governor's office is continuing to cooperate in this matter."

A source in the governor's office said the records that were turned over date back only to 2001, as earlier documents have already been destroyed.

Charities tied to Jefferson

It's unclear what the FBI is looking for. But earlier this year, James Bernazzani, the special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, announced his intention to investigate two charities that were financed by the Office of Urban Affairs. Both of the groups -- Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing & Community Development -- have longtime ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

The agencies attracted attention after former New Orleans City Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt provided them with four vehicles that had been donated to the city after Hurricane Katrina.

Taping Police Sessions Urged (BSUN)

By Brent Jones, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 22, 2006

City Council bill would require video of interrogations

The Baltimore City Council is reviewing a bill that would require the videotaping of police interrogations of witnesses or suspects in violent crimes -- a measure opposed by police but endorsed by public defenders who represent suspected criminals.

Councilman James B. Kraft, chairman of the council's public safety subcommittee, said he introduced the legislation because he believes it would decrease the number of allegations of improper behavior by police officers. Kraft said a video would protect officers against false charges, and witnesses against intimidation or illegal questioning.

Representatives of the Police Department -- who say they generally record statements but do not use video -- said at a hearing Tuesday that they have doubts about using cameras, and one high-ranking detective called it "costly" and potentially harmful for prosecutors.

Col. Fred H. Bealefeld III, chief of detectives, said at the hearing that his department is studying a video system used in Chicago. Bealefeld said it cost that department millions of dollars to install and run the cameras in interrogation rooms.

But the Office of the Public Defender dismissed the cost issue and praised the proposal, saying it could be a significant development in criminal proceedings.

"From our perspective in the defense field, what it does is show you things you would not be privy to when somebody gets on the stand and testifies," said Deputy Public Defender Nancy S. Forster. "You look on video and can see if police coerce it out of them or trick it out of them. It allows us to question the credibility of the police officer. It also makes certain that the entirety is taped."

Del. Samuel I. "Sandy" Rosenberg has urged the General Assembly to pass similar legislation the past two years, but without success.

Rosenberg, reached by phone, said he understands such a system might be costly for local government.

"But you're talking about a matter of justice," Rosenberg said. "On a scale, that gives a greater weight than the cost."

During the hearing, police officials asked for time to study the feasibility of video-recorded investigations, a request backed by the city state's attorney's office.

Deputy State's Attorney Cynthia Jones said her office needs more information to determine the legal challenges that videotaped testimony could present.

The subject was first broached in September when Council President Sheila Dixon introduced a resolution inviting Commissioner Leonard D. Hamm to explain his department's policy.

"From our office's perspective, the thing we're looking for are the nuts and bolts of the legalities of having these custodial investigations," Jones said. "I think President Dixon putting this out there is based on calls she's getting from the public.

DOJ_NMG_0097155

"It's a process. But before you say you're going to do it, you better know the pluses and minuses," she said.

Jones also questioned whether the city has the right to enact such legislation, echoing a comment made by Kraft during the public forum.

Kraft acknowledged that he is unsure whether state law gives the City Council the authority to force the Police Department to change the way it conducts interrogations. The councilman said financing the proposal would be the biggest obstacle. "That is the real No. 1 issue," he said.

Police officials also said they feared that a camera would malfunction at an inopportune time.

"You can't just sit a camera and a microphone in a room and expect it to work," said Jordan V. Watts Jr., a lawyer for the police. "There are a lot of problems with doing that in crucial times where you need that statement to come across. If you're doing an investigation, and [a suspect] bows his head or puts his head down, and you lose those words, it can become a problem."

Kraft said he hopes the measure will pass when it is scheduled for a first vote at the next council meeting Dec. 4.

Members of the Young Leaders 4 Baltimore attended the hearing and spoke in favor of the proposal. The group has demanded a change to the Police Department's interrogations policy after allegations that a detective raped a 16-year-old girl at a district police station in July.

Members of the group said a video recording would severely reduce claims of misconduct.

"This is for the betterment of the people," said Hassan Giordano, the first to speak at the hearing. "It's for the safety of the individual and the safety of the officer."

Judge Sentences Evans To Life Without Parole (BSUN)

By Jennifer Mcmenamin, Sun Reporter

Essex man killed stepdaughter, set body on fire

A 36-year-old convicted sex offender was sentenced Tuesday to life in prison without parole for stabbing, strangling and beating to death his 13-year-old stepdaughter before setting her body and their family's Essex rowhouse on fire to cover up the killing.

Carl Preston Evans Jr., whose arrest in August 2005 highlighted problems with the state's sex offender registry, also received two consecutive 15-year prison terms, one for the at tempted murder of his infant daughter and one for arson.

Baltimore County Circuit Judge Kathleen G. Cox, who pronounced sentence, characterized the killing as "a monstrous, monstrous crime," and pointed out that nothing Evans said, either in court or to an investigator who prepared a pre-sentence report, has shed any light on the motive behind it.

"The death of any child is tragic," Cox said. "To lose a child in the circumstances of this case, it's just unthinkable."

A Baltimore County jury convicted Evans in September of first-degree murder in the death of Breaunna Floyd, who was stabbed 24 times, strangled and beaten before being doused with gasoline and set on fire.

The jury also convicted Evans of arson for setting fire to the family's row home on Foxridge Lane in Essex in July 2005 and of attempted second-degree murder for leaving then-7-month-old Mosett Evans in the burning house.

In a knapsack that Evans left in his front yard that day, police found two knives -- one broken, both bloody -- as well as a towel and T-shirt. DNA analysis indicated that the blood on all four items came from Breaunna.

With firefighters and paramedics on the way, Evans fled. He was arrested 11 days later near a relative's house in West Baltimore.

Evans told the judge that he needed to take responsibility for his actions but stopped short of acknowledging any guilt in the crimes.

"Sometimes you make some crazy mistakes," he said quietly, his voice barely audible in a courtroom filled with his wife's relatives. "It cost me big time. It cost me everything. It cost me my family, including family that's sitting here today."

One man seated in the courtroom muttered in response, "We're ain't your family."

The sentences capped a brief hearing during which relatives described the family's lingering grief over Breaunna's death. Also, Evans' attorney argued that prosecutors could not ask for a sentence of life without parole because they had not properly notified the defendant of their intention to do so.

Public defender Gary D. Schenker told the judge that although prosecutors had sent him notice, they did not send such paperwork to Evans himself, which, he said, the statute requires. The judge, however, ruled that case law seems to require written notice without specifying to whom it must be delivered.

The Rev. Hillary Gaston Sr., the uncle of Breaunna's mother, spoke in court on behalf of his relatives, telling the judge how Evans was welcomed into the family after his marriage to Kenya and characterizing the defendant's crimes as "a betrayal beyond any magnitude."

"It's very difficult," he said. "We have lost young people, but never this way."

Convicted in 1991 of raping and beating a woman at gunpoint, Evans' arrest in the killing of his stepdaughter shed light on problems with Maryland's sex offender registry. In the days after Breaunna's death, authorities discovered that Evans had failed for several years to update his address with the registry as required and that authorities did not seek him out to correct the errors.

Evans' criminal record also includes convictions for burglary and armed robbery.

During his rambling remarks to the judge, Evans expressed regret for never having explained his actions to his family.

"I do want to say I'm sorry," he said. "I brought this on my family."

But prosecutor Michael S. Fuller told the judge that Evans deserved "absolutely no consideration from this court for what he did."

"Everything he has done to this point has been a charade," he said. The prosecutor later added, "He's clearly a danger to society. He should never see the outside of prison walls again."

Greek Authorities To Pursue Felony Charges Against Former Getty Antiquities Curator (LAT)

By Nikolas Zirganos, Ralph Frammolino, And Jason Felch

ATHENS — Greek authorities have recommended that felony criminal charges be filed against former J. Paul Getty Museum antiquities curator Marion True for her role in the acquisition of a 2,500-year-old gold funerary wreath considered one of the museum's masterpieces.

The Police Headquarters of Athens announced today that the city's chief prosecutor had concluded an initial investigation with the recommendation that five unnamed people -- three foreigners and two Greek citizens — be charged with looting, selling and receiving the gold funeral adornment.

The press release did not name the individuals involved and said only that the object was purchased by a "private American museum" in 1993 for $1.15 million. A senior Greek official familiar with the case said that the museum was the Getty and that True was among the five defendants.

Under the Greek system, the case will pass to an investigating magistrate who will conduct his own investigation, a process that is expected to take weeks or months.

Neither the Getty nor True's American attorney would comment on the development.

"Any comment at this time would be premature," said Harry Stang, True's attorney in Los Angeles.

The Greek announcement comes amid negotiations between the Getty and officials from the Hellenic Ministry of Culture over the return of the wreath and a statue of a female torso, or kore.

Already this year, the Getty has returned two other objects requested by Greek officials: a 5th century BC marble relief and a 4th century BC inscribed tombstone. The tombstone, or stele, was purchased by J. Paul Getty himself in 1955.

The most valuable and culturally significant item is the golden wreath, an explosion of delicately crafted stems and leaves adorned with colored glass. Greek officials claim it could only have originated from Greek Macedonia, the homeland of Alexander the Great.

Getty Museum Director Michael Brand said late Monday the museum is still evaluating photos and other evidence supplied by Greek officials to determine whether the objects had been looted, as Greek authorities claim.

"We have not made up our minds," Brand said.

A senior official with the Ministry of Culture said that the legal proceedings against True were independent of the cultural negotiations over the disputed objects.

The Times reported last year that True first saw the ornate burial wreath in 1992, when several men claiming to represent a European collector showed it to her in a Zurich bank vault.

According to internal Getty documents, they offered the wreath for $1.6 million but True lost interest when she became convinced the men were impostors. She wrote that the piece was "too dangerous for us to be involved with."

Four months later, she changed her mind and recommended that the Getty board buy the wreath through Basel antiquities dealer Christoph Leon. A subsequent German police investigation found that Leon acted as the intermediary for a Yugoslav and two Greeks, who had been carrying the object around Europe in a cardboard box.

The Getty contacted the Greek government in 1993 about the impending purchase but ignored warnings from Greek archeological officials that the wreath, as well as the kore and marble relief, were "almost certainly" illegally excavated and smuggled out of the country.

Greek authorities made a formal request for the return of the objects in 1996. True responded by suggesting that the wreath may have come from Italy, and the dispute went unresolved, documents show.

The Culture Ministry renewed the request in May 2005. After press reports about the wreath in Greece, prosecutors in Athens ordered a criminal investigation, which resulted in today's charges.

The senior Greek official, who asked not to be identified because he is not authorized to speak about the case, said that in addition to True, the investigation recommended charges against Leon, the Basel dealer; L.J. Kovacevic, a Yugoslav national; and Georgios Tsatalis and Georgios Kagias, Greek citizens.

Greek police raided True's house on the Greek island of Paros last March and found several unregistered antiquities -- many of which were fragmentary and of little value. No charges have been filed in that case and the investigation continues.

True is on trial in Rome on charges she conspired to traffic in looted art. The Getty has spent months negotiating with Italian cultural officials about 46 disputed objects. Today, the Getty agreed to return 26 of those objects and announced that it was ending talks about the remaining 20.

Getty Museum Ceases Talks With Italy Over Antiquities (NYT)

By Hugh Eakin And Elisabetta Povoledo

In an abrupt change of course, the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles announced yesterday that it had broken off negotiations with the Italian government and made a “unilateral” decision to cede only some of the antiquities that Italy says were looted from its soil.

In a six-page letter to the Italian culture minister, Francesco Rutelli, the Getty’s director, Michael Brand, said the museum had decided to turn over 26 artifacts. Referring to other treasures sought by the Italians, he said that Italy had “no valid legal claim” to a prized bronze sculpture in the Getty’s collection, and that evidence regarding a limestone cult statue it wanted returned was “inconclusive.”

Mr. Brand also wrote that the Getty would continue to study the cult statue, regarded by experts as possibly depicting Aphrodite, and would transfer title to Italy if new research lent weight to the country’s claim that it had been illegally excavated on its territory.

The museum’s move carries significant risks for the Getty. Unlike deals to return disputed art that Italy negotiated this year with the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the ceding of art by the Getty carries no guarantee of loans from Italy or other reciprocal benefits.

“We will not get anything in return unless there is a change of heart on the Italian side,” Mr. Brand said in a telephone interview.

The Getty's decision follows nearly a year of tense negotiations over an Italian claim for 52 objects in the museum's collection. The claim rests largely on evidence that has emerged in the trial in Rome of Marion True, a former Getty curator, and Robert Hecht, an American art dealer, on charges of trading in illegally excavated antiquities.

In Rome, Maurizio Fiorilli, a lawyer for the Culture Ministry, said the government had not taken an official position on the Getty's move. But noting the ministry's role as a civil plaintiff in the trial, Mr. Fiorilli said the 26 objects to be yielded would be held by the Rome tribunal as evidence supporting the indictments of Ms. True and Mr. Hecht.

"If Mrs. True is found guilty, the pieces will revert to the Italian government; if she is found innocent, the Getty will decide what to do," Mr. Fiorilli said in a telephone interview yesterday. "The pieces will come to Italy not as a concession on the part of the Getty but as a seizure, the result of a procedure that is part of our legal process."

Mr. Brand said the museum's parent, the J. Paul Getty Trust, reached its decision on Monday after his return from an unsuccessful meeting on Friday with Mr. Rutelli in Rome.

An impasse emerged after an Oct. 5 meeting in Rome in which lawyers for the Getty and the Culture Ministry signed a memorandum meant to lead to a final joint agreement.

In that document, a copy of which the Getty provided to The New York Times yesterday, the museum said it intended to return 26 objects: 25 requested by Italy and an additional artifact that its own research had determined belonged to Italy. Those objects include fresco fragments acquired in the early 1970s, red-figure Attic pottery and a rare antefix. The document also said Italy was removing six other objects from the original claim of 52.

The document indicated that the Getty was preparing a formal response to the Italian claim for the bronze sculpture — a life-size Greek youth believed to date from 300 to 100 B.C. — and that Italy and the Getty could have joint title to the Aphrodite while further research on its origins was pursued.

But relations between the sides soon fell apart, with Mr. Rutelli publicly expressing "dissatisfaction" with the talks.

On Oct. 20, the Getty received a letter from a Culture Ministry lawyer "making it clear that the ministry was repudiating" the Oct. 5 document, Mr. Brand wrote in his letter to Mr. Rutelli.

After news reports this month that the ministry was preparing to break off negotiations, the museum decided that Mr. Brand should go to Rome to make what he called "a final offer": the Getty would return the 26 objects promised in the Oct. 5 document and give Italy "full title immediately" to the Aphrodite, provided that the government agreed to "undertake further title research jointly."

But in the meeting on Friday, which lasted more than three hours, this proposal was turned down, and no agreement was reached.

In his letter to Mr. Rutelli and in the interview, Mr. Brand described the October document as an "agreement" that bound the ministry "to provide a formal agreement to the Getty within 10 days."

Mr. Brand said yesterday that the ministry had reneged on that agreement by insisting on the unconditional return of the bronze and the Aphrodite and by threatening the Getty in the news media with punitive "embargoes" before it had received the museum's final assessment of Italy's claim to the disputed objects.

But Mr. Fiorilli, the ministry lawyer, said in the interview yesterday that the Oct. 5 document did not have the status of an agreement and had been signed only as the "basis of a future accord" should both parties reach a consensus in negotiations.

Giuseppe Proietti, the Culture Ministry official who signed agreements covering the return of antiquities by the Met and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, said yesterday that he was surprised to hear that the Getty had said his ministry had repudiated anything. "That's not an accord," Mr. Proietti said of the October document.

Mr. Brand's characterization of the document contradicts his own comments to a reporter on Nov. 3 in which he described it as simply a memorandum between the parties. "It's not as though there's an almost final draft that we are just checking the situation on," he said then.

It remains unclear whether the Italian ministry will carry out its earlier threat of breaking cultural ties with the Getty, a threat it previously used in postponing antiquities loans to the museum and in trying to win back objects from other institutions like the Met.

Justice Courts For Small New York Towns To Be Overhauled (NYT)

By William Glaberson

ALBANY, Nov. 21 — New York's top judicial officials outlined a plan on Tuesday to begin reforming the state's 300-year-old system of town and village courts, which have been criticized for decades as outmoded, poorly supervised and unfair.

The plan, announced here by the state's chief judge, Judith S. Kaye, included changes that have been recommended for years by defense lawyers and legal experts. Among them were plans to increase training for the justices, to improve their supervision and to better monitor whether they are protecting basic legal principles like the constitutional right to a lawyer.

The courts — known as justice courts — are also to be required for the first time to keep a word-for-word record of their proceedings, like other courts in the state.

While the officials said that many town and village justices are diligent, Judge Kaye said a sweeping reform program was called for by what she called enduring concerns about the courts. The system has survived a century of calls for radical overhaul by governors and commissions, and an important legal challenge in the 1980s.

As outlined by a series of articles in The New York Times in September, the courts have survived in part because the justices — most of them not even lawyers — have longstanding and deep ties to the upstate political system, and because of the substantial cost of replacing them with more professional courts.

The plan announced on Tuesday is the most specific and ambitious effort in years to address significant parts of the system's troubled dealings.

Most of the measures, like requiring verbatim records and increasing the justices' training and monitoring, can be instituted through orders from Judge Kaye, effective immediately.

"These courts must provide the same high standard of justice the public expects and deserves from any court in New York," Judge Kaye said.

But the judiciary's plan still stopped short of calling for legislative changes in features of the justice court system that disturb critics most.

Those critics — defense lawyers and prosecutors, elected officials and legal experts — say the current threadbare system effectively leaves the state with two types of justice: a modern and professional one for the cities and a second, rudimentary and sometimes abusive one for suburban and rural areas.

The State Assembly is to begin a broad examination of the justice court system at a hearing next month. That hearing is to tackle several of the most serious concerns, like the fact that three quarters of the town and village justices are not lawyers. It will also focus on the fact that unlike all other courts in the state, these courts are financed not by the state but by towns and villages, limiting state control and often resulting in impoverished courts and justices who are paid $1,200 a year or less.

The justice courts are a sprawling system of more than 1,200 courts that are often the first—and frequently the only—stop in the state legal system for people in the 57 counties outside New York City. Dating from Colonial times, the courts occupy something of a time warp, with often poorly trained justices, sometimes convening in town firehouses or highway department garages — or their own kitchens — and dispensing a form of justice unlike any other in the state.

The courts usually handle landlord-tenant cases, small civil cases, traffic infractions and misdemeanors. Yet these courts have considerable powers to jail people, evict tenants and set bail in cases as serious as murder and rape. They handle two million cases a year and collect $210 million in fees and fines.

A state takeover of the financing of the justice courts or a requirement that the justices must be lawyers would require legislation. Judge Kaye and other court officials pointedly declined to say whether they might call for such changes in the future.

Judge Kaye said the judiciary would ask the Legislature for $10 million in next year's budget to begin making the changes announced on Tuesday, for expenses like training, recording equipment and improving the courts' physical facilities.

The judiciary's plan also outlined steps to toughen the examinations justices must pass before they take the bench, and to provide the courts with computers, fax machines, basic security devices and digital recorders to tape their proceedings.

Top court officials said they would begin a new program to require annual audits of justice courts' books, and to increase the size of a small staff of lawyers who answer justices' legal questions, usually by telephone. The officials said they would appoint supervising judges across the state to oversee the justice courts, but it was not clear how much power they are to have.

In September, The Times described many justice court cases in recent years in which defendants were jailed illegally, subjected to racial and sexual bigotry and denied fundamental guarantees, like the right to a lawyer or a trial. The articles also detailed many failed efforts over the last century to change or replace the courts.

The court officials' announcement, and a 68-page report that accompanied it, showed that court officials have chosen for the moment not to take on what could be the considerable political, financial and organizational problems that would accompany any call to overhaul or do away with the courts.

"Our focus is on what we can do now" under current law to improve the justice courts, Jonathan Lippman, the state's chief administrative judge, said. Judge Kaye has asked a state commission to study the justice courts and she said she would study its recommendations, expected early next year.

Tuesday's proposals were greeted by some lawyers and experts on the court system as long overdue. But some said that by failing to face basic issues concerning the courts, the plan seemed to leave much work to do.

"I don't understand how it is possible for them to assure the citizens they're going to get justice in these town and village courts," said Robert L. Spangenberg, a national expert on local court systems who studied the justice courts last year for a commission appointed by Judge Kaye.

Donna Lieberman, the executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, said that while the reforms suggested by Judge Kaye were welcome, "these are Band-Aids on a system that needs serious systemic reform." She said her group was considering a lawsuit to challenge the justice court system if the state did not quickly make broad reform in the courts.

David O. Fuller Jr., the president of the State Magistrates Association, the justices' organization, said the court officials' plan was a positive development. He added that the state's justices continued to believe the network of justice courts "is really a very good system" that does not require fundamental change.

The court officials' plan is to increase the classroom training for nonlawyer justices to two weeks from one and, for the first time, to require that lawyers who are elected to town and village courts receive judicial training before they take the bench.

In recommending such improvements, the report did not shy away from making clear the depth of the problems in the justice courts. The report said that some courts do not even have a judge's bench or a single court clerk. As for the current system of training nonlawyer justices, it said analysis of the results "reveals that this approach too often fails to facilitate real learning."

Laced through their remarks as well were suggestions that the court officials find the current justice court system frustrating to meaningfully oversee and police. Their report said current law gives state court officials "very little effective structural or operational control" and that this "balkanization of responsibility for the Justice Courts," is an issue New York policymakers should consider.

It observed that the legal system had grown far more complex in the 40 years since the Legislature last approved using justices who were not lawyers. Ensuring that all justices are minimally proficient in the law, it said, "is among the great challenges in New York governance."

Whistle-Blowers Bring Govt. Payback (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Whistle-blowers tipped off the government to $1.3 billion worth of fraud cases over the past year, largely at hospitals or other health care providers, the Justice Department said Tuesday.

In all, the department recovered $3.1 billion in settlements -- what prosecutors said was a record amount -- from individuals and companies during the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30.

DOJ_NMG_0097161

"Many of these cases were initiated by whistle-blowers," said Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler, who oversees the department's civil division.

He called the $1.3 billion identified by whistle-blowers a recovery level "probably greater than most years, smaller than a couple." In return, whistle-blowers were paid $190 million over the year for alerting the government to the fraud.

The single largest settlement, worth $920 million, came against Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare Corp., the nation's second-largest hospital chain. Following claims from six whistle-blowers, prosecutors accused Tenet of overbilling the government for $806 million in Medicare payments and paying $49 million in kickbacks to doctors who referred patients to the health care chain.

Tenet operates 66 hospitals in 12 states, mostly in the Southeast. Overall, fraud settlements with health care companies accounted for $2.2 billion -- more than two-thirds of the annual total.

Whistle-blowers have helped the government recover an estimated $18 billion since 1986, when Congress approved laws to strengthen their protections.

"Today, individual citizens are making the same kind of important difference in exposing fraud by those who do business with the government," said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who helped write the laws.

Until now, the government had never recovered $3 billion or more in fraud cases, and passed the $2 billion mark for the first time in 2003, Keisler said.

The overall total also includes a $565 million settlement with Boeing Co., closing two investigations into claims that the aircraft manufacturer improperly sought and carried out contracts with the Pentagon and NASA. Additionally, two whistle-blowers led the government to the single settlement over the past year related to Iraq reconstruction contracts. Houston-based EGL Inc., a subcontractor for Kellogg, Brown & Root, paid $4 million to resolve accusations that it added fake "war risk surcharges" while billing the government. Kellogg, Brown & Root, also known as KBR, is a subsidiary of the Halliburton Co., the Houston-based oil services conglomerate.

There was no immediate total for fraud payments related to hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

Federal Court Favors Newspaper Group In Fight For Records (AAS)

By Rebecca Carr, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, November 22, 2006

At issue is whether data on illegal immigrants who are convicted of crimes should be released to public.

WASHINGTON — A federal court of appeals ruled Tuesday that a lower court erred in dismissing a case that sought records under the Freedom of Information Act about illegal immigrant convicts who are not deported.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordered the trial court to settle factual disputes between Cox Newspapers, which owns the Austin American-Statesman, and the Justice Department over the privacy rights of illegal immigrants convicted of a crime. At the heart of the case is whether privacy rights outweigh the public's right to know that they have been released into the community.

"We're gratified that the judges agreed with us that the trial court shouldn't have granted the government's motion for summary judgment," said Andrew Alexander, chief of the Cox Washington bureau. Cox will confer with its lawyers to determine how to proceed, he said.

The information is essential for assessing whether the government is properly enforcing deportation laws, Alexander said.

"At its core, the case involves a bedrock American principle that citizens should have access to information that enables them to evaluate the performance of their government," he said.

The Justice Department declined to comment other than to say it would review the five-page ruling.

The department's lawyers have argued that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act request filed three years ago, including the convicts' native countries, dates taken into custody and dates of release, the legal documents show.

But personally identifiable information such as full names, dates of birth, alien registration numbers and FBI numbers would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs.

Benjamin Johnson, director of the Immigration Policy Center, an immigrant advocacy group, said the public has the right to know the dysfunctions of the immigration system and how it might be failing. But that does not mean it should release personal information, because immigration officials make mistakes, he said.

Other immigrant groups have said they support the release of such information.

Bankruptcy Lawyers Adjust To Drought (LAW)

By Zusha Elinson, The Recorder

California Recorder, November 22, 2006

An improving economy isn't good news for everyone. With fewer businesses going broke, the pace of traditional work for bankruptcy lawyers has slowed considerably -- for now.

Industry experts say a big reason is because money is flowing more freely -- especially from hedge funds and private equity groups -- to keep businesses afloat that might have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in leaner times.

But bankruptcy lawyers are evolving, and some even say the rivers of money may run dry in the near future -- possibly during the next economic downturn.

"There has never been liquidity like this before -- never close to it in my 32 years," said Frederick Holden Jr., a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's bankruptcy and debt restructuring practice group in San Francisco. "I hope for everyone that it doesn't cause any problems, but it seems unlikely."

Holden, who launched his career as a bankruptcy lawyer during the mid-1970s recession, said money alone can't solve the problems that failing businesses are facing.

"Now you have a lot of hedge funds coming in buying debt," he said. "That's all wonderful for the company, but if the company keeps losing money, that can only go on for so long."

Legal recruiter Lawrence Mullman said some firms are planning for just that. Though bankruptcy lawyers aren't flying off the shelf like IP or corporate lawyers, there is some interest, he said. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom and Kirkland & Ellis are among the firms beefing up their bankruptcy practices, according to the The National Law Journal.

"The demand is less, but some firms see what's coming and are looking to make some strategic hires," said Mullman, who works out of New York. "I think that they recognize that the cycle is going to begin again."

While not a universally held belief, Holden and several other bankruptcy lawyers told The Recorder they expect to see more Chapter 11s filed by late 2007.

It would certainly be better for business, because in the last two years filings have dropped dramatically. In the 2004 fiscal year, a total of 10,113 businesses filed for Chapter 11 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. In 2005, 5,856 businesses filed, and in 2006, only 5,475 businesses filed, according to statistics released by the courts.

"The significant decline in local Chapter 11s means there's less work on the West Coast, and we're not immune to that," said Peter Benvenutti, a partner in Heller Ehrman's bankruptcy and restructuring practice in San Francisco.

Benvenutti said the practice group -- like many others on the West Coast -- hasn't been hiring additional attorneys in recent years.

EVOLVING AND KEEPING BUSY

For Robert Eisenbach III, a Cooley Godward Kronish bankruptcy lawyer, the trend has meant a change in the focus of his work to what's currently the rage: hedge fund financing.

DOJ_NMG_0097163

"During the 2001 to 2004 time period, there were just a lot more Chapter 11s being filed," said Eisenbach, partner in charge at Cooley's San Francisco office. "As the number of bankruptcies goes down, we tend to get involved in more of out-of-court restructurings and litigation."

More and more, he's been working with credit and finance lawyers on complex deals where hedge funds and private equity groups are injecting money into failing companies to steer them clear of bankruptcy court.

"Unless there's a strategic reason to be in bankruptcy, there are economic incentives to do restructuring out of court," said Joseph Scherer, the partner who heads Cooley's credit finance group.

In the last four years, Scherer said he has worked with bankruptcy lawyers on a more regular basis, in large part because of the growing popularity of second lien loans instead of unsecured mezzanine financing. Expertise concerning what rights the second lien holder will get in bankruptcy is often needed, he said.

It's a trend recruiters are noticing, too.

"[Demand] is actually starting to increase, and bankruptcy lawyers are looking for firms with strong bond and hedge fund practices," said Lawrence Watanabe, a legal recruiter based in San Diego.

Orrick's Holden said there's also bankruptcy work in some industries that, for whatever reason, are not necessarily buoyed by the strong economy or free flow of financing. For instance, any industry that depends on energy may struggle when oil prices go up, he said.

Although such cases haven't rolled into Orrick's San Francisco office, Holden said he's still working on bankruptcy cases stemming from another industry-specific problem -- exposure to asbestos litigation.

Earlier this year, Holden finished up his work representing a committee of retirees inKaiser Aluminum's Chapter11 case, setting up a trust with the company's stock that will fund their pensions.

Geography can also play a role in bankruptcy work. In the late 1990s, companies filing for bankruptcy and their lawyers headed for Delaware, because of a predictability when it came to the amount of fees awarded. But now the center of gravity has shifted to New York, Benvenutti said.

"New York is generally considered to be a more user-friendly district," he said.

THE ROARING EARLY 2000S

Still, the bankruptcy market for lawyers is nothing like it was just a couple of years ago when the likes of Enron and Worldcom went bottoms up.

"It was a terrific time for the bankruptcy bar: You had K-mart and United Airlines -- we did work with Aloha Airlines," said Richard Lapping, co-chair of Thelen Reid Brown Raysman & Steiner's bankruptcy and creditors' rights group. "These were huge bankruptcy cases that meant a lot of work for a lot of lawyers."

Lapping, like other bankruptcy lawyers, said that trend might return.

"There's a little bit of tension in the economy, and we're getting calls that there may be work in the offing looking forward," he said.

Md. Challenges Federal Report (BSUN)

By Greg Garland, Sun Reporter

Administration disputes U.S. finding that juvenile-offender center is unsafe

The Ehrlich administration has sent a sharply worded letter and nearly 500 pages of supporting documents to the U.S. Justice Department, challenging a finding that the state has run a Baltimore center for juvenile offenders in an unsafe and unconstitutional manner.

A Justice Department report issued in August said youths held at the 144-bed center on North Gay Street "suffer significant harm and risk of harm" because there isn't enough staff on hand and treatment plans are inadequate.

The report noted youth-on-youth assault rates 47 percent higher than the national average for such facilities.

But state officials say the report was written nearly a year after federal officials inspected the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center in September and October 2005 and that the concerns they raised have been addressed.

"We strongly disagree with the Justice Department's findings," said Edward Hopkins, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. "We believe their conclusions are wrong."

The highly critical Justice Department report was regarded as an embarrassment for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who had made juvenile justice reform a key issue when he campaigned for the office four years ago. The report lays the foundation for a possible lawsuit that could lead to a court order forcing the state to change the way it runs the juvenile center.

In a 16-page, footnoted letter dated Nov. 6, Maryland Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. called on federal officials to drop the matter. The letter was released yesterday after The Sun requested a copy.

"DJS believes that, as of October, 2006, children confined to the [Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center] do not suffer the harm or significant risk of harm described in your letter and that there are certainly no risks [of] violating the constitutional or federal statutory rights of these youths," Montague wrote.

While youth-on-youth assaults at the center are higher than the national average, Montague wrote, the number has been reduced sharply since federal officials visited more than a year ago.

Many of the problems highlighted in the Justice Department report were resolved well before it was issued in August, Montague said.

For example, he said, the center "has replaced its lightweight plastic chairs with large boxy chairs which are more difficult to lift and too cumbersome to be effectively used as a weapon." And, he said, toothbrushes have been replaced with a "shank-proof" variety that can't be fashioned into weapons.

In addition, Montague wrote, the Maryland State Department of Education was brought into the center in January to take over its education programs, including special education services.

The Justice Department "nonetheless baldly asserts that that the Justice Center 'fails to provide adequate special education services.' ... The DOJ is wrong," Montague wrote.

He said further that, on the subject of educational programs, the Justice Department's report "contains basic factual mistakes and reaches conclusions that are simply unfounded."

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, said the federal agency would have no comment on the details of the state's response.

"We stand by our letter, and we remain willing to work with the state to reach a resolution," Magnuson said.

Although Montague wrote in his letter that staffing and other issues at the center have mostly been resolved, reports by the state's independent juvenile justice monitor tell a different story.

As recently as Aug. 31, then-monitor Katherine A. Perez wrote Montague about "the ongoing issue of staffing shortages and the threat to life, health and safety this presents to children" housed at the Baltimore juvenile justice center.

Juvenile Centers Still Not Up To Standard, Monitor Says (JCL)

By Julie Goodman

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, November 22, 2006

A court monitor for the state's two juvenile training facilities has once again reported that the state has failed to meet most of the conditions required under an agreement to bring the schools up to standard.

In May 2005, Mississippi entered a four-year decree to end a Justice Department lawsuit over abuse allegations at the Oakley and Columbia training schools.

The fourth report from monitor Joyce Burrell, filed Wednesday, covers the period May 1 through Aug. 31.

It says that while some progress was made during that period, much more is required to come into compliance.

Burrell noted improvements in student staffing ratios, and the improved cleanliness of floors, walls, ceilings, baseboards, youth rooms, bathrooms and common rooms. “In the short term, staff are to be commended for pitching in many extra hours to do a thorough cleaning and some painting of the buildings,” she wrote.

But she also noted unresolved setbacks in education and staffing issues, including difficulty in retaining new hires long enough to get problems under control. The problem must be addressed, she said, so that the department’s youth services can reach optimum staffing levels and cut down on overtime.

DHS Executive Director Don Taylor was not available for comment today, but has said in response to previous reports that improvements have been slow but continual.

The recent report also detailed continued problems with reports of abuse by students, noting that the actual student complaints are coming through attorneys from the Department of Justice or the Southern Poverty Law Center.

“The fact that students/cadets are not comfortable reporting issues to staff of the Division of Youth Services is troubling and suggests that they are still either afraid ... or they do not have the skills to effectively use the tools that are available to make reports.”

During this reporting period, there were too many serious allegations of youth-on-youth and staff-on-youth abuse at Oakley. A major communication problem is to blame for those serious complaints which do not progress up the chain of command.

Staffers “dropped the ball,” she said, when they decided not to pursue an allegation from a youth who choose to withdraw the complaint.

As she has noted in the past, Burrell said staffers still don’t understand what constitutes abuse at Oakley.

She recommended that an ombudsperson join the staff, and that tape recorders be used for students who have trouble reading and writing their complaints. She also suggested better regular assessments of how safe students feel.

Day Laborers Win Racial Lawsuit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

(AP) - WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.-A suburban village discriminated against Hispanic day laborers when it closed a hiring site and stepped up police patrols on the streets where they looked for work, a federal judge ruled Monday.

"Since August 2004, and continuing into this past summer, the defendants have engaged in a campaign designed to drive out the Latino day laborers who gather on the streets of Mamaroneck to seek work," Judge Colleen McMahon wrote. "The fact that the day laborers were Latinos, and not whites, was, at least in part, a motivating factor in defendants' actions."

McMahon did not specify a remedy for the village of Mamaroneck, about 25 miles north of New York City, giving the two sides 10 days to make suggestions. And in a footnote at the end of the decision, she suggested there was still time for a settlement.

Attorney Kevin Plunkett, who represented the village, said it was a stretch for the judge to determine that discrimination played a role in the crackdown. He said the quality of life for residents of Mamaroneck - not race - was the chief concern of village officials.

"This group of people just happens to be Hispanic," he said. "What happens if 50 other people were assembled in the community? That has to be addressed."

Plunkett said he and village officials would review the ruling and discuss what steps to take next.

The village had argued that it was only enforcing existing laws when it beefed up the police presence in the area around the park and set up traffic checkpoints that inconvenienced the contractors who came looking for temporary workers.

Six Hispanic immigrant workers - all identified as John Doe for fear of retaliation by police or immigration authorities - took the village to court in September, seeking an injunction against what they called selective law enforcement and ethnic discrimination. They said the village violated their right to equal protection when they cracked down on the laborers.

"We're very pleased," said Cesar Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represented the day laborers. "The court found that indeed the village of Mamaroneck had engaged in intentional discrimination and was motivated by racism."

The ruling could influence the treatment elsewhere of day laborers, who have become an increasingly visible symbol of the immigration issue as they solicit construction and landscaping jobs.

The victory is at least the second this year for day laborers in federal court. In May, a federal judge prohibited the city of Redondo Beach, Calif., from arresting day laborers for violating a local ordinance against soliciting work in public.

Ga. Prosecutors Review Shootings By Cops (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

(AP) - ATLANTA-Prosecutors in a suburban county plan to review 14 shootings by police, including eight fatalities, amid concern about the high number of killings compared with the nation's two largest cities.

DeKalb County prosecutors will also investigate the death of another person in police custody who was not shot, and they expect to be asked to look into four more fatal shootings by police, Adora Andy, a DeKalb County district attorney's office spokeswoman, said Monday.

"We will review the documents, and we will determine the appropriate course of action," Andy said.

Prosecutors could pursue criminal charges against officers if warranted.

The review of shootings and in-custody deaths involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the shootings since then.

Monday's police materials omitted a fatal police shooting Sept. 2, and Andy said she expected to get that later.

Andy declined to say why Police Chief Nick Marinelli made the request. She also would not disclose what reports he has turned over.

A police spokesman did not return calls seeking comment beyond a Police Department statement that said the DA office's investigation had been requested.

Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than the six in New York City and equal to the Los Angeles number.

It also was three times the number of fatal shootings DeKalb police had recorded last year in the county of 700,000.

Nationwide, justifiable killings by officers while on duty declined from 378 in 2001 to 341 last year, according to the FBI, which does not catalog fatal police shootings that are accidents or not justified.

Records obtained by the AP through an open records request showed that some of the department's required in-service training in the use of deadly force had been reduced, along with instruction in the use of batons.

The toll led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies, including a lack of emphasis on de-escalation of tense situations. County CEO Vernon Jones said at the time that there were no widespread problems at the department.

Since September, there have been three more fatal shootings by DeKalb police. Now, the police chief has asked for a review by the prosecutor's office to remove any doubt in the public's mind, police said Monday.

The review request comes as police have released details of an internal probe into the shootings. A police review board found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force and that officers in three nonfatal shootings were unjustified.

The officers in the remaining shootings through September were either found to be justified, or no determination was made.

Gay Custody Case Stalls In Court (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

Two Baltimore County judges have delayed ruling in a child- custody case that has forced a 7-year-old girl to spend time with her adoptive mother's former lesbian partner, despite objections from a court-appointed child-welfare specialist.

DOJ_NMG_0097167

A social worker for Baltimore County Circuit Court reported in August that the ex-partner's overnight visits with the girl "probably caused acute underlying turmoil" for the child, according to court records.

"At this time, she seems emotionally vulnerable and experiencing severe anxiety in response to the crisis that this dispute has precipitated," social worker Cheryl Taylor says in the report. "Overnight weekend visits seem to pose particular separation threats and anxiety for [the girl] at this time."

The report remains sealed, but excerpts of Miss Taylor's findings are cited elsewhere in the court record.

Miss Taylor notes that the girl told everybody involved in the case -- including her mother, her mother's former partner and the family pediatrician -- that she does not want the visits to continue. The social worker also has recommended that the child "remain in long-term psychotherapy."

Still, two successive judges presiding over the case have delayed ruling on the emergency request by the mother, identified as Janice M., to stop the court-ordered visitation.

Judge John O. Hennegan put off ruling on the mother's request in August. The case last month was transferred to Judge Michael J. Finifter, who scheduled a hearing for Jan. 28.

The Washington Times is withholding the full names of Janice M. and her former lesbian partner, Margaret K., to protect the identity of the girl, who was adopted from an orphanage in India in 2000 by Janice M.

Both women declined to be interviewed for this report.

"The little girl doesn't even know what a lesbian is," said Susie Banks, 49, whose 7-year-old daughter is best friends with Janice M.'s daughter. "She has no clue why this woman is doing this to her. ... She wrote a note to her mother last Christmas saying she wants a dad and a dog."

Mrs. Banks, a homemaker from Ellicott City, has appeared as a witness for Janice M.

Margaret K., who was Janice M.'s live-in girlfriend from 1987 until 2004, won visitation rights to Janice M.'s adoptive daughter in a court ruling in February.

The ruling, which denied Margaret K. custody of the girl but required that she have visitation with the child every Wednesday and every other weekend, was upheld this month in a decision by the Court of Special Appeals.

The courts found that Margaret K. is the child's de facto parent.

Homosexual rights groups and the American Civil Liberties Union have rallied behind Margaret K.

The case also has energized proponents of same-sex "marriage" who say that issues of child custody and visitation would be resolved more easily if homosexual unions were legally recognized.

In January, a Baltimore City Circuit Court judge ruled that the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex "marriage" is unconstitutional. The case will be argued next month in Maryland's highest court, the Court of Appeals.

Dan Furmansky, executive director of the homosexual rights group Equality Maryland, said he was pleased that Margaret K.'s case was being judged solely on the basis of what was in the best interest of Janice M.'s daughter.

"Sexual orientation has no bearing on the ability to take care of a child," Mr. Furmansky said. "Our position is that every case should be decided individually, and the best interest of the child is what would be determined."

The social worker's report also cites a report by the girl's pediatrician who "did not see anything beneficial about forcing the visits," according to court records.

Margaret K.'s attorney, Jennifer S. Fairfax, challenged Miss Taylor's conclusions.

"Ms. Taylor's ultimate findings are remarkably inconsistent with her specific and detailed findings, particularly her findings with regard to what [Margaret K.] has to offer" the child, she said in correspondence to the court.

She cited Miss Taylor's findings in the report that Margaret K. is "a loving, caring, positive and important influence on [the girl's] life and under less stressful conditions could be an appropriate parent care-giver to the child."

Miss Fairfax noted that the report says Margaret K. "puts [the girl's] needs above her own" and should remain an "extremely constant and steady influence in [the girl's] life."

Mothers Rally To Back Breast-Feeding Rights (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

DOJ_NMG_0097168

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Karen Gral knows how difficult it is to travel with small children: standing in long lines with squirming toddlers, dealing with new security rules that prohibit liquids -- including some baby foods -- and lugging strollers, car seats and diaper bags through airports.

For her, the finish line is sitting on the airplane and breast-feeding her hungry and worn-out 16-month-old to sleep.

So when the Alexandria mother of two heard that a family was kicked off a Delta Air Lines flight last month because the mother refused to cover her baby with a blanket while breast-feeding, Gral decided to join 70 people at Reagan National Airport yesterday for a "nurse-in" in front of the Delta ticket counter. Similar protests were held at more than 30 airports around the country, including Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, where 62 people gathered in support of Arlington native Emily Gillette.

"Breast-feeding is the most natural thing in the world. What was Emily supposed to do? Not feed her child? Not give her child comfort?" said Gral, while nursing her son, Garrett, who was wearing a white onesie that read, "I'm a Breast Man."

Delta has said it regrets the incident with Gillette, which took place aboard one of its contract carriers, Freedom Airlines.

"Delta Air Lines fully supports a mother's right to breast-feed on board our aircraft, and we were very disappointed in the decision to move Ms. Gillette from the flight," said Gina Laughlin, a Delta spokeswoman.

According to Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth A. Boepple, the family boarded a flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York on Oct. 13 after a two-hour delay. On board, Emily began to nurse her toddler daughter in her window seat before takeoff. Gillette's husband, Brad, sat in the aisle seat to provide his wife and their daughter some privacy.

A flight attendant handed Emily Gillette a blanket and said, "You need to cover up. You are offending me," according to Boepple.

Gillette refused, saying, "No, thank you. I will not put a blanket on top of my child's head," according to Boepple.

Moments later, the Gillettes were escorted off the plane by a ticket agent and put on a flight the next day.

The Gillettes have filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission.

Many showed up at National to push airlines to adopt more supportive policies for nursing mothers and to encourage federal legislation that protects breast-feeding in public and pumping milk in the workplace.

"This is not a protest. We want to show people that breast-feeding is completely normal," said Robin Abadia, 31, who took time off from work to attend the event with her husband and two children.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), reintroduced legislation to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to protect breast-feeding in public, provide tax incentives for businesses that establish private lactation areas in workplaces, and allow tax deductions for breast-feeding equipment.

A "nurse-in" was staged in front of ABC studios in New York last year after "The View" co-host Barbara Walters made what many considered to be disparaging remarks about a woman breast-feeding next to her on a plane trip.

Many pediatricians recommend that nursing mothers breast-feed their children on the ascent and descent of flights, to help open children's ear canals as cabin pressure changes with altitude. The World Health Organization recommends that infants be exclusively breast-fed until they are at least 6 months old.

US Lags Behind In Gender Gap Study (FT)

By Scheherazade Daneshkhu In London

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

The US lags at 22nd place behind developed and even a couple of developing countries in a study of inequality between men and women, mainly because it has few women in politics. This is in spite of the ascent of Nancy Pelosi who is set to become the first woman to head the US House of Representatives.

Sweden is the only country where men and women form equal numbers among all ministers and parliamentarians. Cherie Booth, a human rights barrister and wife of Tony Blair, UK prime minister, said there were more women in parliament in Iraq and Afghanistan – two countries not covered by the report – than in the UK.

The study of 115 countries published on Tuesday by the World Economic Forum, a Swiss-based think-tank, measures the gender gap based on economic, political, educational and health-based criteria in a benchmarking exercise aimed at improving women's position in society.

The individual country rankings show Sweden, Norway and Finland at the top of the league, having closed about 80 per cent of the gender gap, with Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Chad at the bottom, with a gender gap of about 50 per cent.

The Philippines is the only Asian and developing country in the top 10. The US falls short of the top 20 but other economically-advanced countries are ranked lower. France and Italy are ranked 70 and 77 respectively, while Japan takes 79th place. The UK is in ninth place.

The index focuses on the relative extent of the gender gap regardless of a country's wealth – by assessing how well countries divide their opportunities and resources between men and women.

Although no country offers women equal treatment with men, countries have made big progress in education and healthcare for women, having closed 90 per cent of the gap with men in these areas.

When it comes to political empowerment – the ratio of women to men in parliament, ministerial positions and executive office – just 15 per cent of the gap with men has been closed.

There was a positive correlation between national income per head and the WEF's analysis of the relative position of women in society, with women in richer countries tending to fare better than those in poorer societies.

ANTITRUST:

Muni Dealers Brace For U.S. Probes (WSJ)

By Stan Rosenberg

Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Leading Providers of GICs Are Among Those Receiving Federal Subpoenas Recently

Municipal-bond dealers held their cards close to their vests as the market faces nationwide criminal and civil probes into possible abuses over their dealings in a wide range of muni-bond transactions.

The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating questionable practices at a number of firms, with leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, having received federal subpoenas recently.

The Bond Buyer, a leading muni-bond publication, reported yesterday that the practices may go beyond GICs and could include "virtually every investment product or derivative" brokered or provided by various firms over the past six to 14 years.

Most executives at dealer firms, as well as portfolio managers, declined to comment on the situation.

"In general, everybody's just looking at it and seeing what's going on here, doing a lot of work to get the material together that they're looking for," said one senior executive at a Wall Street investment firm. Asked if most of the major firms have been subpoenaed, he said: "I have no idea because I'm not talking to anybody about it."

An executive at a smaller West Coast-based firm said he had seen no impact on the muni market since news of the investigations broke. However, activity in the market -- as in other areas of the financial markets -- has been muted this week ahead of the Thanksgiving Day holiday.

According to the Bond Buyer, "dozens" of firms in the $2.2 trillion muni market have been asked for information by the Justice Department and SEC. The Bond Buyer said the parallel criminal and civil investigations "go far beyond GICs and may cover thousands of investment products and derivatives entered into in connection with muni-bond transactions that could total hundreds of billions of dollars." Yet, only a small amount of these transactions will be subject to criminal or civil allegations, the publication reported.

As reported by Dow Jones Newswires Monday, a federal official said a conservative estimate would be that a cloud of potential taxability hangs over $10 billion to $15 billion of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities.

While the spotlight of the federal investigations has been on suspected GIC bid-rigging, the bond transactions under scrutiny also present tax issues by diverting arbitrage profits away from the federal government to participants in bond deals.

Such arbitrage windfalls in the muni market are made by investing tax-exempt bond proceeds in high-yielding obligations, and are supposed to be rebated to the Treasury. The Internal Revenue Service can tax bondholders, although it has tried to settle most such cases with issuers. One of the most flagrant instances of such abuse was known as "yield burning" and resulted in federal enforcement action against dozens of securities firms more than six years ago.

GICs offer an issuer a place to park bond-issue proceeds at stipulated interest rates until they need to be used. There are various GIC providers. At least three bids are supposed to be received, but in some instances, one bid is far superior than the others, and there are suspicions that GIC brokers can fix the bidding, rewarding favored firms with business.

"I guess it doesn't really surprise me that they would be evaluating the propriety of the pricing of these products," said Ben Watkins, director of Florida's Division of Bond Finance. "I don't think there is the level of transparency in that market that there should be, and I don't think that issuers are as diligent as they should be in obtaining fair pricing for these products."

Treasurys Rise on Quiet Day

Treasury bond prices ended higher in a quiet trading session, with little in the way of data or Federal Reserve commentary to move the market.

Scott Gewirtz, head of Treasury trading at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said buying was driven by investors who had "gotten short at the top of the range and were forced to cover," meaning they bet prices would fall further and were forced to buy after the price decline reversed itself.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 5/32 point, or $1.5625 per $1,000 face value, at 100 11/32. Its yield fell to 4.582% from 4.601% Monday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 12/32 point to 97 16/32 to yield 4.658%.

Municipal Bid-Rigging Subpoenas Seek Information On Derivatives (BLOOM)

By Darrell Preston And William Selway

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

Nov. 21 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. investigators have demanded that banks and brokers provide information on derivatives as part of an investigation into anti-competitive practices in the $2 trillion municipal bond market, according to a lawyer hired by one of the firms subpoenaed in the probe.

The Justice Department is looking into whether bids were rigged on investment contracts sold to local governments. Investigators are also seeking information on interest-rate swaps and other financial products that governments buy to guard against swings in borrowing costs, said Mark Scott, the former director of tax-exempt bonds for the Internal Revenue Service who is now a partner with Vinson & Elkins in Washington.

``It's pretty broad," said Scott, who is representing a client subpoenaed by investigators whom he wouldn't identify. ``They are going to get truckloads of information."

The investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission, is the broadest criminal probe ever of the municipal bond industry and has resulted in more than a dozen subpoenas being issued last week to brokers, banks and insurance companies, including American International Group Inc. and General Electric Co.

Regulators are looking at whether brokers for U.S. local governments violated the law while arranging bids for guaranteed investment contracts, where a portion of the hundreds of billions of dollars raised in the tax-exempt bond market every year is placed until it is needed for projects.

Serving Two Roles

Guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, are sold by Wall Street banks and insurance companies, some of which also sell swaps and other municipal finance products. A swap, a type of derivative contract, is an agreement to exchange interest payments, usually a fixed payment for one that varies based on the movements of benchmark indexes or rates used by banks to track borrowing rates.

In some bond issues, the winner of the bidding for a guaranteed investment contract has also performed a second role, such as bond insurer or provider of options. Those dual roles can raise conflicts of interest.

DOJ_NMG_0097171

Three brokers of guaranteed investment contracts subpoenaed last week -- Beverly Hills, California-based CDR Financial Products Inc., Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group Inc. and Sound Capital Management of Eden Prairie, Minnesota -- also advise governments on swaps.

Documents Sought

The subpoenas seek documents ``for all relevant municipal contracts awarded through competitive bidding," said Scott, who read from the subpoena sent to his client. That includes documents on financial agreements including interest-rate and ``basis" swaps, ``swaptions" collateralized CDs and other vehicles for hedging investment-rate risk, he said.

``They're looking for the smoking gun," said Scott. ``Why would you raid an office if you weren't looking for a smoking gun?"

The information on swaps sought in the subpoenas was reported earlier in the Bond Buyer newspaper.

Joe Norton, a spokesman for New York-based AIG, previously disclosed that the company had been subpoenaed by the SEC and the Justice Department without commenting on the content of the requests. Fairfield, Connecticut-based GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson said the company is cooperating with the requests.

CDR, Investment Management Advisory Group and Sound Capital also all said in separate statements last week that they are cooperating with investigators.

``This is indeed an industrywide investigation that appears to be growing by the day," CDR said in a further statement yesterday.

Yield Burning

The criminal investigation stems from a probe by the Internal Revenue Service, which enforces rules that prevent local governments from profiting by borrowing at tax-exempt interest rates and reinvesting the money in higher-yielding securities. While local governments reinvest bond proceeds until the money is needed, their earnings must be paid in taxes to the IRS.

The IRS has looked into whether improper bidding practices for guaranteed investment contracts deprived the U.S. government of those taxes, just as the sale of overpriced Treasury bonds did during the so-called yield-burning scandals of the 1990s. In those cases, banks raised the price on the bonds, driving down, or burning, the yield. That reduced the investment earnings that should have been sent back to the IRS.

Swap Fees

Last year, the IRS also said it was investigating whether financial advisers to states and municipal governments made excessive fees on interest-rate swap contracts or allowed banks to make inflated commissions.

The subpoenas, which Scott said were received by a small client he declined to identify, seek a broad swath of information from the 25 or so firms that received them. CDR in its statement yesterday said investigators were seeking documents back to 1992.

The documents seek detailed information including organization charts, lists of directors and officers, birth dates and home addresses of employees, calendars and appointment books, travel and expense records, telephone records and all records relevant to the awarding of bids, said Scott, reading from a subpoena.

Prosecutors: Vista Apparently Complies With Microsoft Antitrust Judgment (INFOWEEK)

By Antone Gonsalves, InformationWeek

Information Week, November 22, 2006

U.S. prosecutors say Windows Vista and the latest version of Internet Explorer apparently comply with the requirements of the 2002 antitrust judgment against Microsoft.

In a joint status report filed Tuesday with the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., prosecutors said Microsoft appeared to be complying with the judgment, which found Microsoft abused its Windows monopoly and set down rules for the software maker to follow to avoid future anti-competitive behavior. Prosecutors and Microsoft have been submitting joint reports on compliance to the court every six months.

The Justice Department and a court-approved technical committee are monitoring the development of Vista to assure compliance with the court order. The monitoring includes extensive testing of Vista and Internet Explorer 7 betas.

The committee and Microsoft developed a bug-tracking system to help ensure that Vista ships without any "known issues related to its treatment of middleware under the final judgments," prosecutors said in the report.

"Plaintiffs are pleased to report that this system has been a success," prosecutors said. "Microsoft addressed all outstanding middleware-related bug issues prior to Vista being released to manufacturing."

Since issuing the last report May 12, the Justice Department has received 25 third-party complaints, but none of them raised issues related to Microsoft's compliance with the court order, prosecutors said. "Each of the non-substantive complaints received a simple response acknowledging their receipt."

One issue that remained outstanding was Microsoft's continuing effort to improve the technical documentation on certain Windows technology it is required to provide on reasonable and non-discriminatory terms to any other software maker. In the 2002 judgment, Microsoft was found to have taken illegal advantage of its monopoly in desktop operating systems by ensuring its software ran better on Windows than competitors' platforms.

Prosecutors said there were indications that the new documentation "is substantially higher in quality than the prior version."

"In summary, plaintiffs have not yet reached any conclusions about Microsoft's technical documentation rewrite project," prosecutors said. Microsoft, so far, has met its deadlines for providing rewritten documentation to licensees.

The Justice Department has raised concerns with the quality of the technical documentation Microsoft has provided to licensees, and with the length of time it was taking to improve the documentation. The technology in question relates to the protocols used by computer servers to communicate with client PCs running Windows. The interoperability technology covered under the judgment is available for licensing for minimum five-year terms that would run at least through Nov. 11, 2017.

The original antitrust ruling was set to expire next year. However, portions have been extended to Nov. 12, 2009, with the DOJ having the option of requesting an additional three-year extension.

Justice Dept.: Vista Satisfies Antitrust Deal (CNET)

By Anne Broache, CNET News.com

CNET News, November 22, 2006

Microsoft's soon-to-be-released Windows Vista operating system does not appear to raise antitrust concerns, federal and state prosecutors said Tuesday in a court filing.

In a periodic joint status report, required as a part of Microsoft's 2002 antitrust settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice and state plaintiffs, the government attorneys said a technical committee charged with overseeing the software giant's compliance had found no outstanding issues after "extensive testing" of Vista and Internet Explorer 7.

According to the report, Microsoft and the technical committee have been offering a downloadable program that is designed to help Microsoft's competitors in the fields of Web browsers, e-mail and instant-messaging clients, and media players to make their programs "Vista-ready" before the new operating system ships.

The program serves as a single source for all the registry settings needed for applications "to attain equal visibility on Windows XP and Vista systems," the technical committee said. The program's goal is to reduce the chance that people will experience difficulties in changing default software to non-Microsoft products, for instance. It also aims to make it easy to locate third-party applications in the start menu, desktop, task pane and other commonly used surfaces, after installing them.

Microsoft said it had also contacted 30 competing software makers and had invited them to work alongside company engineers at its Redmond, Wash., campus lab for Vista Readiness.

Since the last status report filing in May, government attorneys said they received 25 complaints alleging antitrust concerns about competing middleware but said they concluded that none of those gripes had merit.

Although the matters were not raised by U.S. regulators, some possible antitrust repercussions of security and file-formatting features in Vista were recently flagged as concerns by European and Korean regulators. Microsoft said last month that it had implemented changes that address those complaints.

The latest status report said Microsoft appears to be making some progress on what has become one of the thornier components of the settlement: rewriting documentation for licensees of its Microsoft Communications Protocol Program. The MCPP, another requirement of the antitrust settlement, is designed to help third-party developers create software that works with Windows.

But government attorneys said they remain worried about the project staying on track. Microsoft has already endured scolding for alleged "foot-dragging" on that front from the plaintiffs and the federal judge presiding over the case, who ultimately approved a two-year extension for that project's deadline.

"Microsoft's full commitment will be essential if the project is to stand any chance of producing complete and accurate documents on the schedule that Microsoft has provided to the court," the government wrote in its portion of the status report.

In a separate battle in Europe, Microsoft faces a Thanksgiving Day deadline for completion of a similar documentation project.

Des Moines Register, November 22, 2006

Jury selection in the Microsoft anti-trust case in Polk County District Court was completed today with seven men and five women selected to hear the class action law suit.

The case is expected to take several months to try with witnesses that will include Microsoft founder Bill Gates and chief executive officer Steve Ballmer.

Plaintiffs' lawyers, led by Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin, are seeking damages of up to $329 million for Iowans who purchased Microsoft product between 1994 and this year.

The crux of their case is that anti-competitive actions by Microsoft resulted in overcharges and extra expenses to Iowa consumers.

The Iowa case is the last of several dozen state lawsuits against the giant computer software company. The state cases were filed after a federal anti-trust action against Microsoft was settled in 2000.

None of the other state cases has ever gone to a jury for a decision. All were either settled out of court or dismissed, officials for both sides have said.

The jury is expected to be seated late next week. The trial will begin with what is expected to be a lengthy list of jury instructions from Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg about how Iowa law applies to the situation and how the case will proceed.

Opening statements could begin as early as Nov. 30 and are expected to consume several more days before witnesses begin testifying.

Jury selection took more than a week with one full day devoted to having potential jurors fill out a 30-plus page questionnaire and another day for lawyers to assess the answers.

Each side has a jury consultant. Hale Starr of West Des Moines-based Starr Litigation Services is assisting Conlin and the other plaintiffs' lawyers, while Theresa Zagnoli is helping Microsoft lawyers. Zagnoli, who once worked for Starr in Des Moines, is now a partner in Zagnoli, McEvoy, Foley, a Chicago-based research firm.

Each side has also hire local public relations firms to help manage publicity about the case. Jamie Buelt of En Q Strategies is working with Microsoft and Eileen Wixted of Wixted Pope Nora Thompson & Associates is working with the plaintiffs' lawyers.

Fewer than 100 people from a potential jury list of 450 registered voters were actually interviewed to obtain the 12-person jury, an official said.

Several of the individuals selected as jurors indicated during questioning that they have purchased Microsoft products during the past 12 years, thereby making them eligible for damages, if any are awarded. But all told the court they believed they could hear the evidence with an open mind and make a fair decision.

Several pre-trial motions remain to be ruled on by Judge Rosenberg, including a request by Conlin to be able to play video excerpts from an earlier deposition by Gates.

Normally, depositions are not entered into the court record when a witness is available to testify in person, except as evidence to challenge live testimony. Conlin had earlier received permission from the judge to call Gates as a hostile witness when she presents her case.

Milwaukee Business Journal, November 22, 2006

Oshkosh Truck Corp.'s proposed purchase of JLG Industries Inc. has cleared federal regulatory review with the passage of a required waiting period for the deal.

The companies jointly announced Tuesday the expiration of the 30-day waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 in connection with the proposed merger of a wholly-owned subsidiary of Oshkosh with JLG.

The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the conditions to Oshkosh's acquisition of JLG. Consummation of the merger, which is expected to occur in early December, remains subject to other customary closing conditions, including approval of the merger by JLG's shareholders.

Specialty truck manufacturer Oshkosh Truck (NYSE: OSK) announced Oct. 16 that it agreed to buy JLG Industries (NYSE: JLG), a maker of aerial work platforms and telehandler vehicles, in a transaction valued at $3.2 billion.

The addition of JLG's $2.3 billion in revenue will make Oshkosh Truck a $6 billion manufacturer of specialty trucks.

Franchisees Accuse Quiznos Of Fraud In Suit (MJS)

By Paul Gores

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 22, 2006

Owners say they are made to pay inflated prices for food, supplies

A lawsuit accuses Quiznos Sub of forcing Wisconsin franchisees of the sandwich chain to buy food and supplies at inflated costs and sell food at artificially low retail prices, making the restaurants unprofitable.

The class-action lawsuit, filed in federal court in Green Bay on behalf of 28 Wisconsin franchisees of Denver-based The Quiznos Franchise Co. and its affiliates, seeks compensation for lost investments and asks for punitive damages and an end to what it calls an "illegal business scheme."

Quiznos did not return calls for comment Tuesday.

The lawsuit alleges the company has systematically defrauded its franchisees by building the brand at the expense of its operators in the field.

The suit contends Quiznos omits or misrepresents key facts about Quiznos business operations in an effort to induce people to buy a franchise.

But too many people who buy a franchise find that the cost of food and supplies in comparison to the selling price of items on the menu keeps franchisees from realizing a profit, Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisee Association, said Tuesday. That's because, the lawsuit alleges, Quiznos forces franchisees to work with Quiznos-mandated suppliers and pay them what the lawsuit describes as "excessive prices for goods and services."

"The numbers just don't add up, and that's the problem," Bray said.

The lawsuit also asserts, among other allegations, that Quiznos makes franchisees accept coupons from customers for free or highly discounted food without reimbursement, and that it saturates markets with outlets.

The average start-up cost for a Quiznos outlet, which includes a $25,000 franchise fee, is about $220,000, Bray said.

The lawsuit contends that when a franchise fails, lenders sell the equipment at lower cost to a new operator, putting the location back in business and continuing to operate "on the backs of those with no control."

According to the suit, the Quiznos "scheme" is intended to fuel revenue growth needed in order to bring about the sale of the remainder of the company to investors.

The lawsuit alleges fraud, breach of contract, violations of federal and state antitrust laws and violations of the Wisconsin Fair Dealership Law.

Plaintiffs in the suit, who are represented locally by the firm Whyte Hirschboeck Dudek, include franchisees from all corners of the state.

Wisconsin Franchisees Sue Quiznos Sub, Alleging Fraud

GREEN BAY, Wis. (AP) -- Quiznos Sub forces its franchisees to buy food and supplies from the company or its approved vendors at unfair prices and sets retail prices too low for the stores to make a profit, according to a lawsuit filed by 28 operators of Quiznos franchises in Wisconsin.

The class action lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court on Monday, said Denver-based Quiznos has systematically defrauded its franchisees in a scheme designed to build the brand at the expense of the store owners.

The lawsuit, which seeks millions of dollars in damages for lost investments, accuses Quiznos of fraud, violations of federal and state antitrust laws, racketeering, breach of contract and violations of Wisconsin's fair dealership law, attorney Justin Klein said Tuesday.

Tamani Chio, a spokeswoman for Quiznos at its headquarters in Denver, did not immediately return a telephone message Tuesday.

The first Quiznos, featuring toasted sandwiches, opened in Denver in 1981 and the company has grown to more than 4,500 restaurants, becoming the fastest-growing restaurant chain in the country, trailing only Subway as the nation's No. 2 sandwich shop -- not counting hamburgers.

"Quiznos has been taking advantage of its franchisees for years through practices that we contend are illegal and in violation of the franchise agreement," said Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisees Association Inc., a trade group that help organize the class-action suit.

Bray, who owns two Quiznos stores in Texas and has been a franchisee for nine years, said Quiznos "has slowly, methodically and deliberatively modified the business model, year over year, to make it economically favorable to them, to the detriment of the franchisees. It is time to put a stop to this."

Among the named defendants in the lawsuit are The Quiznos Franchise Company LLC of Denver; Richard E. Schaden of Lafayette, Colo., and Richard F. Schaden, of Westminster, Colo., the father-son owners of Quiznos; and Cervantes Capital LLC of Denver, which the lawsuit says runs the Quiznos operations.

According to Klein, a similar lawsuit was filed in New Jersey earlier this year by some Quiznos franchisees there. "We are in the preliminary stages of that case," he said.

Klein said the allegations against Quiznos involve restaurants in many states, but Wisconsin was chosen for one of the first lawsuits because it has "very good" laws that protect franchisees.

"There are suits soon to be filed in other states," the attorney said.

A Quiznos franchise costs $25,000, and to open a restaurant and get it running requires an investment of between $300,000 and $400,000, Klein said.

"They tell you who you can buy from and who you can't buy from," he said. "The prices are unreasonably high. Quiznos gets rebates from approved vendors."

Between 2002 and 2004, Quiznos leaped from 1,765 stores to 3,339, an annual growth rate of nearly 45 percent, with company sales climbing 48 percent to $1.27 billion.

What's New? Justices May Help Define Standard In Patent Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

Call it the case of the gas pedal, prescription drug and gift bow.

The variations and costs of those and many other items could be affected by a Supreme Court patent case that could be one of the most important intellectual-property disputes to ever come before the justices.

With abortion, affirmative action and other high-profile issues before the court this term, a patent case normally would be a yawner. However, KSR International v. Teleflex, a dispute between competing makers of adjustable gas-pedal systems in vehicles, arises as the justices have shown increasing interest in U.S. law protecting inventions.

The case essentially tests how to determine when an invention is truly new and different, and should receive a patent that entitles its inventor to the exclusive right to make, use and sell the item. That standard can make a difference in how people and companies spend time and money on inventions. If it is too easy to get a patent for a small variation on a previous invention, there is more of a chance that competitors could infringe on it, so companies might acquire patents solely for defensive reasons. If it is too difficult to get a patent for a small but unique adaptation of an item, it could discourage research and development.

The question in the oral arguments scheduled for Tuesday focuses on how to determine when an invention is "obvious," and therefore not worthy of protection. At issue is whether a standard used by the U.S. appeals court that hears patent cases allows patents for changes too small to matter.

The dispute is being watched closely by manufacturers, from the tiremaker Michelin to gift-packaging producer Hallmark.

"The issue in this case is one that strikes at the very heart of the patent field," says lawyer Peter Sullivan, who represents a group of manufacturers backing KSR.

Last year, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office granted 183,187 patents, a number fairly typical of recent years, says Patent Office spokeswoman Brigid Quinn. (One product can involve many patents.) Meanwhile, applications are up. Last year, 443,652 requests were received, more than twice the total from 1995.

The KSR case involves an adjustable gas-pedal system that was developed for use by short drivers in large vehicles. Teleflex says its pedal assembly, patented in 2001, has a distinctive electronic throttle control and pivot that stays in place.

KSR devised a pedal system that drew a patent-infringement lawsuit from Teleflex, alleging that the KSR system used a feature of Teleflex's system. KSR countered that the Teleflex patent was invalid because it was an "obvious" combination of existing works. A trial court agreed.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, to which patent disputes are appealed, ruled that KSR did not make a sufficient case for "obviousness." It said KSR did not show that prior technology offered a "teaching, suggestion or motivation" for their system.

KSR's attorney, James Dabney, urges the justices to reject the "teaching, suggestion or motivation" standard. He says the test should be whether someone in the field would have been capable of adapting existing technology to achieve the new result, not whether the motivation was there.

Dabney says current rules make it difficult to challenge patents for trivial adaptations.

Teleflex lawyer Thomas Goldstein says the appeals court got it right.

"Because inventions are so often evolutionary rather than revolutionary," he says, "an obviousness standard that merely compares an invention to the prior (work) will often produce the mistaken conclusion that the former was obvious."

Goldstein says the "teaching, suggestion or motivation" standard minimizes "hindsight" by focusing the test on how a person would have combined the elements of an invention from existing works.

In a court brief, the American Intellectual Property Law Association, siding with Teleflex, cites the difficulty of deciding what is new and how hindsight can distort assessments of whether a variation of an invention is patent-worthy.

The court's resolution could affect the development of drugs and other therapies for disease, according to advocates on both sides. The Biotechnology Industry Organization, emphasizing patent protection for various stages of drug development, is backing KSR. AARP, the largest U.S. seniors group, is with Teleflex. The group says improper drug patents delay the entry of generics into the market.

Sullivan, who represents several companies siding with KSR, notes that one of them, Hallmark, was sued for patent infringement over a machine it devised to curl ribbons for decorative bows. The Federal Circuit court rejected Hallmark's claim that the competitor's patents were "obvious," based on prior inventions.

Like KSR, he says patents too often are granted to routine variations on existing creations.

But what might seem routine may really be new.

The Intellectual Property Law Association contends that what counts is how old things are put together in new ways. It warns that many things look obvious only in hindsight, and the group recalls movie director Billy Wilder's famous line: Hindsight "is always 20/20."

Place Your Bets, Please: Takeover Wheel Spins (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Who's next?

That's the question on the lips of investors, traders and investment bankers on the heels of a deluge of mergers and acquisitions.

Some say consumer-oriented stocks, health-care providers, gaming and tech companies could become acquisition targets in the months ahead. Some point to Sprint Nextel, Hilton Hotels, and home builders such as Lennar, Ryland Group and D.R. Horton as possible targets. Private-equity firms are circling home-service company ServiceMaster, say people familiar with the matter.

Others are focusing on companies with steady cash flows and a large percentage of shares owned by company executives, or companies run by older executives who may be willing to sell out.

There has been so much deal activity this year that it looks like anyone could be fair game. Targets have included companies with stable cash flows but poor growth prospects, even in sectors that haven't seen many mergers in the past.

"Deals tend to feed on themselves," says Sam Schwartz, a managing director at Credit Suisse. "Financial sponsors who have purchased companies [in leveraged buyouts] soon are going to look for exits, through initial public offerings of stock or mergers and acquisitions, as long as the financing market remains robust."

But investors shouldn't get carried away betting on possible takeovers. Not only are they tough to predict, these deals also are somewhat less lucrative than they once were. The average premium paid over market prices for shares of companies subject to an acquisition bid this year is 17%, down from 25% in 2000, according to Thomson Financial.

Some analysts say the acquisitions are a sign that stock prices remain reasonably priced, despite the recent run-up in the market that has pushed stock indexes to new highs. Some short sellers -- investors who bet on stock-price declines -- have become cautious. They are reluctant to establish big positions against even stocks with weak outlooks, worried that any wager against a company will turn into a loser on word of a lucrative deal. This wariness is adding to the market's upward momentum.

Mostly, all the wheeling and dealing stems from lots of money sloshing around the global markets, as interest rates remain low. Investors are shoveling money at private-equity firms, which buy public companies or businesses with an eye toward reselling them later at a profit, and at high-yield but risky loans and junk bonds backing acquisitions. That suggests many deals are financial bets, not strategic business moves, perhaps reducing their chance for success.

The bankers who say well-known, consumer-oriented companies and some real-estate investment trusts could see more offers note that some of these stocks have been weak amid worries about how troubles in the housing market will affect various companies. Some private-equity specialists are focusing on companies with strong brand names, steady cash flows and valuable real estate.

Amid all the activity, the total dollar value of takeover offers by U.S. companies is down 1% so far this year compared with the same period last year, according to Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. Meanwhile, the value of leveraged buyouts -- deals by private-equity firms financed by debt backed by the target's assets and repaid with its cash flow -- has nearly tripled.

NEW HEIGHTS

• Graphic: Where the Deals Are1 | FAQ: Buyout Boom2

More than 40% of the $1.28 trillion of announced U.S. mergers this year has come from private-equity firms or foreign buyers, up from less than 24% last year, Thomson says. Five of the six largest U.S. acquisitions unveiled so far this year were by leveraged-buyout firms.

Some companies once considered too big to become private-equity prey now are seen as possibilities, as private-equity coffers grow. Among them: Sprint, whose shares have dropped almost 12% in the past year but still has a market value of $58 billon, as well as Hilton and Avis Budget Group Inc.

Their stock prices have climbed in recent months. Sprint shares are up more than 25% since hitting a 52-week low in late August. Hilton has jumped more than 33% in three months, giving it a market value of almost $13 billion. Avis Budget, which hit a 52-week low in mid-August, is up about 19% since then, for a market value of just over $2 billion.

A report this month from analysts at Morgan Stanley ranked Lennar, Ryland and D.R. Horton atop its list of leveraged-buyout candidates, based on various metrics such as volatility of free-cash flow.

Home builders have grown by buying smaller competitors in recent years, but have generally shied away from big acquisitions. Although the sector's volatile cash flows can dissuade private-equity firms, some analysts say that as housing slows and these companies do fewer new projects, they will generate more cash flow that might be used to repay debt in a leveraged buyout.

Spokesmen for Sprint and Hilton wouldn't comment. Representatives for Hilton, Ryland, Lennar and D.R. Horton couldn't be reached.

It had been thought that the gambling sector would be immune from the LBO wave, in part because it can be a challenge to obtain a gaming license. Last month's proposed purchase by Texas Pacific Group and Apollo Management of Harrah's Entertainment for about $15 billion suggests the challenges can be surmounted. Casino companies sometimes own valuable real estate that can be used as collateral to raise debt for a leveraged buyout, bankers note.

Bankers say there have been takeover talks involving health-care companies, which are seeing lower growth rates but still churn out cash flow that can be used in a deal financed by heavy debt. Some investors also expect deals in the oil patch, where companies are sitting on loads of cash but shares have slipped as energy prices have fallen. Nabors Industries, which has $9.8 billion market value, has been mentioned as a possible target. A spokesman declined to comment.

Qantas Gets Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie (WSJ)

By Lyndal Mcfarland

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- Qantas Airways said it is considering a takeover approach by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd., amid market speculation it will soon receive an offer valuing the Australian flag carrier at up to 11 billion Australian dollars (US$8.5 billion).

In a brief statement, Qantas didn't provide further details on the nature of the approach, but a senior dealer said the group is expected to offer up to A$5.50 a share. Qantas shares soared on the news, with its stock gaining as much as 20% to a morning high of A$5.25 in Australia.

"The approach is confidential and incomplete and is being investigated by Qantas," Cassandra Hamlin, the carrier's acting company secretary, said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange, indicating other options such as a regional merger with Singapore Airlines might be on the table.

Qantas also said in a statement it has "undertaken over a period of years discussions with a range of individuals and companies, including airlines, on possible partnerships, joint ventures and acquisitions."

SIA, which competes with Qantas for passengers on lucrative routes to Europe and North Asia, said it isn't in talks with Qantas.

Macquarie Bank said it has no comment on the Qantas statement, repeating a statement made to Dow Jones Newswires late Tuesday in Australia when speculation of a bid first emerged. Texas Pacific also said it has no comment.

The private-equity sector has targeted Australian companies in recent months with multibillion dollar bids. To date, the largest bid has come from a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co and including Texas Pacific, Blackstone Group LP and Bain Capital LLC, for Coles Myer Ltd. The retailer recently rejected the A$18.2 billion bid as inadequate.

A senior institutional trader said the bidding consortium has been lured to Qantas as it has low debt and operations such as terminals, freight, maintenance and catering that could be spun off or put into funds. Macquarie Bank could hedge the oil-price risk internally as well, the trader said.

But analysts said any takeover of the iconic airline known as the "Flying Kangaroo" will face significant hurdles with Canberra imposing stiff shareholder restrictions following its privatization 11 years ago.

Any bid for Qantas will place the national government in a difficult position as it confronts criticism from lawmakers and labor unions about the likelihood of large layoffs and cost-cutting measures by the consortium, analysts said.

Also, current ownership restrictions limit a single investor from holding more than 25% of Qantas, with foreign investors limited to owning a total of 49.9%. National Australia Bank credit analysts said the bidding group will need the 25% shareholder limit to be removed, along with approval from Treasurer Peter Costello.

"These are high hurdles to overcome, and though Qantas is a very different case, it is worth remembering that in 2001 the treasurer rejected Shell's takeover approach for Woodside Petroleum on national interest grounds," the bank said.

Analysts noted that airlines haven't been a traditionally attractive target for private-equity groups, given the exposure to fluctuating oil prices, tough price competition and volatile passenger demand.

Texas Pacific already has an interest in the airline sector. It bought a US$200 million stake in US Airways Group Inc. after the airline filed for bankruptcy protection in 2002.

The approach adds to the list of ambitious takeover attempts by Sydney-based Macquarie Bank. In the past year, Macquarie has failed in several high-profile deals, including bids for the London Stock Exchange and Hong Kong-based telecom group PCCW Ltd.

Suez-Gaz De France Pact Clouded By Ruling That Marks Union Win (WSJ)

By David Gauthier-Villars

Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

A Paris court ruling could upset the schedule for the planned €43.43 billion ($55.65 billion) merger of French utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA, and potentially thwart the deal altogether, handing a victory to French energy-sector workers and dealing a major blow to France's government.

The unexpected ruling, which GdF tried but failed to get annulled last night via an appeal, said state-run GdF can't approve the merger until it gives unions more information about the deal's impact on jobs. This means a crucial GdF board meeting that had been called for today to determine the merger's final terms is likely to be called off.

The ruling, which was upheld late last night by an appeals court, may cause the merger schedule to be pushed back at least until March -- missing the original year-end deadline -- because Suez and GdF will have to redraft merger terms to factor in 2006 earnings, according to lawyers involved in the deal. Pushing through the highly politicized merger in the middle of the French presidential elections, planned for April, could also be tricky because the opposition left-wing Socialist Party opposes the deal.

Soon after the appeals court upheld the ruling, GdF and Suez issued a joint statement saying they intend to complete the merger "as soon as possible."

Yesterday's court ruling represents a victory for French energy workers, who, like many of their counterparts across Europe, have battled against the deregulation of power and natural-gas industries in Europe, saying they should remain in state hands.

The ruling is another setback for the two companies and for the center-right government of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, who helped orchestrate the merger and pushed through a bill in parliament allowing for the privatization of GdF. The state owns 80% of GdF and is expected to own 34% of the merged company if the deal is completed. A spokesman for the prime minister's office declined to comment.

Opposition to the deal has also been mounting among Suez shareholders, who say they are getting shortchanged because their company is more valuable in the market than GdF. Several shareholders, including big European and U.S. funds, have threatened to reject the merger unless the terms are changed.

Under the original terms of the deal, Suez and Gaz de France have proposed a 1-for-1 stock swap plus a €1-a-share special dividend to be paid to Suez shareholders to compensate for Suez's higher market valuation. Some Suez shareholders say they deserve a dividend of at least €4 a share to bring the companies' valuations back into line.

Company Exonerated In Antitrust Probe Wins Award (USAT)

By Del Jones

DOJ_NMG_0097180

A San Diego company that in 2002 was the target of Senate antitrust hearings on Tuesday was one of three companies awarded the 2006 Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award, perhaps the most prestigious award given to business by the federal government.

Premier purchases $27 billion a year of medical supplies and services for 1,500 hospitals. In 2002 the company was accused of accepting something akin to payola from large manufacturers that kept small companies and their cutting-edge products from being sold to hospitals.

The accusations were untrue, CEO Richard Norling said in an interview Tuesday, but the scrutiny proved to be a learning experience for the company. He says Premier also learned as it went through the Baldrige process and made changes designed to allow small companies in the medical industry to better compete.

Norling said it "feels incredibly good," to come full circle from being a company under scrutiny. He said that Baldrige examiners were aware of the company's history and had asked him if there was anything that might turn up later to tarnish Baldrige's image if it were to go out on a limb and give Premier the award.

"The Baldrige Award's judges determined that Premier … lived up to (the award's) very high standards," Baldrige director Harry Hertz said in an e-mail. "Premier has been a leader in setting ethical practice guidelines."

The first Baldrige was awarded in 1988. Premier won in the service category, not the health care category that was introduced in 1999 and this year accounted for 45 of the total 76 applicants. There were no winners this year in manufacturing or education. Other winners:

•North Mississippi Medical Center, a 650-bed hospital in Tupelo that serves 24 rural counties, in the health care division. Its charitable donations, charity care, medical cost savings and volunteer services total $70 million a year, and in 2006 it will treat 157,000 people through free health fairs, immunization and other programs at churches and shopping centers.

•Mesa Products of Tulsa, with 70 employees and $25 million in annual revenue, in the small-business division. Mesa prevents underground and underwater pipelines and tanks from corroding through an electrochemical process called cathodic protection, which is a science that dates back to 1824. By applying an electrical current to the exposed steel surface, corrosion can be prevented on buried and submerged steel structures.

EU Clears UCB Takeover Of Schwarz Pharma (AP-YBIZ)

AP, November 22, 2006

EU Waves Through $4.23B Takeover of Germany's Schwarz Pharma by Belgian Drugmaker UCB

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Belgian drugmaker UCB SA won EU approval Tuesday to take over Germany's Schwarz Pharma AG, clearing the last regulatory hurdle to the deal.

The acquisition, which Schwarz's board is recommending to shareholders, would create a new company with revenue of more than 3.3 billion euros ($4.23 billion) and yearly research and development spending of 770 million euros ($986.91 million).

UCB said it received a green light from U.S. regulators on Nov. 10 and was now waiting for Schwarz shareholders to tender their shares by a Dec. 8 deadline.

The European Commission cleared the deal despite overlaps between the two because they both produce a small number of over-the-counter and prescription medicines in some European countries, from antihistamines, iron supplements, heart disease drugs and asthma treatments.

But their combined market shares were not high enough to see them disrupt the market, it said.

"Customers and competitors identified a large number of alternative suppliers," the Commission said. "Indeed, intense competition coming from several players with significant market shares and strong reputation will continue to characterize these markets."

UCB said in October that the deal would help position it as a global pharmaceutical player.

Schwarz Pharma specializes in cardiovascular drugs, but also makes medicine used to treat Parkinson's Disease, including the Neupro patch, and epilepsy.

UCB transformed itself from a chemical and pharmaceutical maker to a biotechnology and pharmaceuticals business with its acquisition of Britain's Celltech Group in 2004. The company makes drugs used to treat cancer, inflammation and allergies.

After the deal, the company will be called UCB and be based in Brussels.

Bear In The Air (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Last's week proposed merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines is the leading edge of a consolidation wave that will finally fix the problems of the airline industry . . . and check out our selection of historic bridges for sale.

Life affords most other industries legal and structural ways to shield themselves from all-out price warfare -- through patents and branding, product differentiation, or various kinds of competitive "friction." Not so the airlines. The Internet has made pricing transparent. Lenders allow start-up or discount carriers to fly the latest, spiffiest models. The high-margin business traveler accounts for a smaller share of the market nowadays, and even he's become a lot less price-insensitive. And no industry is more discommoded by antitrust's primitive and ill-advised intolerance of cooperative behavior by competitors.

High fixed costs, low variable costs, and a customer who will switch for a nickel's difference in price: Add the balkanization of the global air traffic market, which leaves U.S. carriers uncomfortably exposed to the ups and downs of the domestic economy, and you have a formula for an industry that, on average, loses money even amid the gentler business cycles of the past 30 years.

Don't expect consolidation to change this, even if the current murmurfest really does result in a flurry of deals to reduce the Big Six to two or three. There's a lesson in the special genius of US Airways CEO Doug Parker's proposed acquisition of Delta -- a deal that might have been inspired by the old joke about two hunters trying to outrun a bear.

This is his third pass at Delta, and yet notice how the pairing seldom has turned up on Wall Street's list of the most likely combinations. Most analysts' idea of a rational airline merger is one combining two carriers with complementary networks -- minimum overlap, allowing each to extend its service into new markets. Mergers with lots of overlap aren't favored, and not only because of antitrust concerns. Such combinations serve mainly to eliminate capacity, which benefits competing carriers as much as it does the merged airlines, who alone must bear the costs and disruptions of the merger.

And yet the market has cheered on Mr. Parker's proposal nonetheless. Investors seem to understand that his plan recognizes that the goal is not to outrun the bear, but the other hunters.

First off, he estimates that fully half the benefits of the merger would materialize only if he can snag Delta while it's still in bankruptcy, thus using a judge's power to toss out aircraft leases and labor contracts without financial penalty or messy bargaining. Being able to restructure his fleet and workforce more quickly than his competitors can is a crucial advantage.

Secondly, the consolidation of Delta and US Air would occur over a network centered on some of the nation's most gridlocked airports. US Airways already controls the biggest market share at Washington National; combined with Delta, it would end up with the largest market share at LaGuardia, even after forced gate divestitures. The federal government has struggled with how to allocate operating slots at these two airports (plus Kennedy and O'Hare), and it remains nearly impossible for new entrants to gain access. Mr. Parker's new carrier, as the biggest in the East, would naturally be well-positioned to capture much of these scarcity rents.

True, the benefits might be modest and fleeting, and potentially lost if the merger doesn't proceed with a minimum of fuss. But the new carrier (which he would call Delta) might well enjoy two or three years of nicking passengers for modestly higher fares before the next downturn. And because of the way the industry is leveraged, a few nickels and dimes of extra margin on tickets results in a big impact in the bottom line and the share price.

In turn, Mr. Parker would be in the catbird seat for the industry's next bloodletting -- and don't doubt such a bloodletting will recur, as it has in every downturn since deregulation in 1978. Right now the industry is reporting a surge in profits amid an upswing that has seen traffic growing faster than airlines can lay on new planes and crews. But that's par for the course and no reason to assume the airline sector is about to become profitable in the long haul.

OK, we're reading his mind, but what makes his deal appealing points to why other carriers are unlikely to rush into mergers of their own. Their costs in pain and anguish would be the same or greater, but with little prospect of being able to charge significantly higher fares, even in an industry where the number of competitors is reduced.

Alas, one thing that might help -- a relaxation of antitrust rules to allow airlines to enter and exit code-sharing agreements at will -- almost certainly won't transpire. Such a break with intellectual precedent would be the most direct way to turn a chronically unstable airline industry into one that is reasonably prosperous and provides the optimum of service in terms of frequency and destinations even in the grimmer parts of the business cycle.

There was a time when Washington might have been willing to experiment with such a daring notion if only to get itself off the hook for the pension plans of failing carriers. Delta's then-President Fred Reid publicly ventured three years ago at an industry conference the hopeful possibility that the "Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation ought to have an additional arrow in their quiver, to enable scheduling, pricing and yield management to be done in a centralized entity [by alliances of airlines] which was immune from antitrust laws."

It will take at least another industry meltdown to put such a heterodox brainstorm back on the table. Ditto the equally adventurous idea of allowing foreign ownership of U.S. domestic carriers. Until then, investing in airline shares will be a game for speculators, not buy-and-holders.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Firm Blames Farmers, 'Act Of God' For Rice Contamination (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

The company that created the experimental variety of genetically engineered rice found this summer to have contaminated the U.S. rice supply contends that rice farmers and an "act of God" are to blame for the inadvertent release of the unapproved crop.

Those are among the assertions by Bayer CropScience of Research Triangle Park, N.C., in response to a class-action lawsuit filed by hundreds of farmers in Arkansas and Missouri.

The 30-page response offers the first clue to how the company plans to defend itself against the 15 class-action lawsuits filed by farmers, who allege that they stand to lose millions of dollars because of the contamination.

Lawyers for the farmers said they had expected the company to deny responsibility, but were offended by its attempt to blame farmers. The lawyers said their clients had no reason to suspect that the seeds they were planting in recent years were contaminated by Bayer's unapproved variety.

"The farmers are innocent victims," said Don Downing, a principal at Gray, Ritter & Graham PC, the St. Louis firm that filed the largest suit, in U.S. District Court in eastern Missouri.

Denying any culpability, the Bayer response variously blames the escape of its gene-altered variety of long-grain race, LL601, on "unavoidable circumstances which could not have been prevented by anyone"; "an act of God"; and farmers' "own negligence, carelessness, and/or comparative fault."

Asked how farmers were at fault, Bayer spokesman Greg Coffey said the company does not comment on pending litigation.

Bayer conducted field tests of LL601 from 1999 to 2001 in Louisiana, then dropped the project without seeking government approval to market it. This year, LL601 was found to be widespread in U.S. long-grain rice, prompting Europe to cut off imports and throwing the rice futures market into turmoil.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is investigating how the variety escaped from test plots into farmers' fields, where it was quietly amplified for years until its discovery. The seeds and plants of LL601 look virtually identical to those of the popular conventional variety with which they had become mixed, said Steve Linscombe, director of Louisiana State University's rice research station in Crowley.

The day the contamination was announced in August, Bayer asked the government to approve the variety. A decision is still pending. Meanwhile, lawsuits have been filed on behalf of about 300 rice farmers in the South.

The company's response to the largest of those suits asserts that Bayer's test plots were in full compliance with Agriculture Department rules. Critics of U.S. biotech regulations have said that, if true, that only proves the inadequacy of those rules and calls into question whether the department can fairly investigate the problem.

"It is unfortunate that Bayer, rather than accept responsibility for its actions, is instead trying to pin the blame on the American rice farmers, the very people most detrimentally affected by Bayer's conduct here," said Adam Levitt, a Chicago lawyer who has filed five class-action suits for rice farmers.

Another 1918? (WP)

ON MONDAY, the Department of Health and Human Services released a progress report on its preparations for a flu pandemic in the United States. Not stressed, but nevertheless clear, was how much the country would rely on antiviral drugs such as Tamiflu, a drug that can reduce the severity of flu symptoms, to treat Americans while new vaccines were developed. Public health authorities are frantically stockpiling Tamiflu, and they hope to have more than 50 million courses of antiviral medication on hand by the end of 2008 to administer in the event of an outbreak.

But a report released by the World Health Organization earlier this month said that strains of the H5N1 "bird flu" virus -- a likely candidate for mutation into a pandemic flu -- might be developing resistance to Tamiflu and other antivirals. The influenza virus is unpredictable and quick to mutate. No one knows how, or how fast, the bird flu virus will change, so no one knows if the reported cases of Tamiflu resistance will remain isolated or if the virus will become increasingly more resistant to standard antivirals -- as it has with other drugs. But the country faces the possibility that its reserve of Tamiflu might not do much to counter a pandemic flu.

The federal government is also collecting doses of vaccines that protect against existing strains of the bird flu virus, though on a much smaller scale than its purchase of Tamiflu. These shots, the HHS report said, might eliminate or ease symptoms caused by new forms of the virus. But the WHO report was pessimistic about the effectiveness of the vaccines against strains of the virus they were not designed to fight.

In other words, if a pandemic flu began spreading tomorrow, the government's most effective strategies for saving lives could be old-fashioned quarantine and public education, techniques akin to those used during the great flu pandemic of 1918. It is not surprising, then, that the federal government currently estimates that as many as 2 million people could die if a virulent and contagious strain of flu hit the United States.

Given the capriciousness of the virus, says Columbia epidemiologist Stephen S. Morse, the government has "no silver bullet" in its arsenal. But HHS should consider investing heavily in technologies such as the reverse genetic engineering of flu vaccines, a process that promises to speed up vaccine production dramatically. The federal government should also focus more on aiding the World Health Organization's efforts to monitor avian flu and to improve the health infrastructure in Southeast Asia. Added American assistance to the understaffed WHO in Indonesia, Thailand and Vietnam could save many more American lives than 50 million courses of antivirals.

Mining Firms Again Eyeing Navajo Land (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak, Times Staff Writer

Demand for uranium is soaring. But the tribe vows a 'knockdown, drag-out legal battle.'

Crownpoint, N.M. — When mining companies started calling tribal offices last year, Navajo President Joe Shirley Jr. issued an edict to employees: Don't answer any questions. Report all contacts to the Navajo attorney general.

Decades after the Cold War uranium boom ended, leaving a trail of poisonous waste across the Navajo Nation, the mining industry is back, seeking to tap the region's vast uranium deposits once again.

Companies are staking claims, buying mineral rights and applying for permits on the edge of the tribal homeland. They make no secret of their desire to mine within the reservation as well.

That prospect has turned neighbor against neighbor and touched off legal, political and financial maneuvering far from Navajo lands.

Fifty years ago, a nuclear arms race propelled the search for uranium. Today, the driving force is the quest for new sources of energy. China and India are building nuclear reactors at a rapid pace to fuel their growing economies, and the Bush administration is pushing to expand nuclear energy in this country to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

With demand increasing, the price of uranium has climbed to more than $60 a pound. Six years ago, it was as low as $7.

Mining companies are extracting uranium in Texas, Wyoming and Nebraska, and are taking steps to mine in Colorado.

But Navajo country, covering some 27,000 square miles in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah, is the biggest prize of all — "the Saudi Arabia of uranium," in the words of Mark Pelizza, a vice president of Uranium Resources Inc.

A subsidiary of the Texas-based company holds a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to mine in and around Crownpoint, a crossroads town of 3,000 Navajos that sits on the largest known undeveloped uranium deposit in the U.S.

URI officials are seeking permission to begin mining on a test basis in the nearby township of Church Rock, N.M., in 2008. If results there convince regulators that the project is environmentally sound, the company will be allowed to start operations in Crownpoint.

Mining in both places is expected to yield 42 million pounds of uranium over 20 years — worth more than $2.5 billion at today's prices.

Two Canadian firms — Strathmore Minerals Corp. and Energy Metals Corp. — are also laying the groundwork for mining.

Altogether, the three companies have acquired rights to tens of thousands of acres just outside the reservation's southeast boundary. URI alone has invested more than $25 million.

Mining executives say they plan to extract uranium from underground rock formations through an environmentally benign chemical process. There will be no blasting, no unsightly pits and no lasting contamination, they say.

Unconvinced, the tribal council last year passed a ban on mining or processing uranium in "Navajo Indian country," a term that embraces both the reservation and neighboring communities such as Crownpoint and Church Rock that participate in tribal government.

Federal courts have recognized "Indian country" as extending beyond the reservation's boundaries, but the ban seems destined to be challenged in court.

After the measure took effect in April 2005, mining concerns kept calling the Navajo capital, Window Rock, Ariz., hoping to secure support for their projects. So Shirley signed Executive Order 02-2005, which instructs tribal employees to avoid any "communications with uranium company representatives."

The directive infuriated mining executives. "You tell me, what kind of a democracy is that?" asked John DeJoia, a Strathmore vice president. "They've got tremendous resources out there. They're a very poor nation. That could change."

Robert McNair, director of capital projects for Dejour Enterprises Ltd., a Canadian energy company, asked state officials for help. He reached Derrith Watchman-Moore, New Mexico's deputy environment secretary.

A Navajo who had served as the tribe's environmental director, Watchman-Moore told McNair there would be no new uranium mining until past contamination had been purged. "My strategy was to discourage them from asking for a permit," she said.

It worked. Dejour decided to focus instead on a huge deposit in Saskatchewan.

The tribal government has also tried to block financing for the projects. When Shirley learned Itochu Corp. was considering investing $32 million in the URI venture, he asked the Japanese conglomerate not to do it.

"The Navajo people have made our wishes and our laws clear: We do not want further uranium mining in our communities," Shirley said in a letter to Itochu's chairman.

But URI, Strathmore and Energy Metals have pressed on. They have an important ally in Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), who has been a forceful advocate for nuclear power as chairman of the Senate Energy Committee.

In the spring, Domenici pushed Department of Energy officials to meet with mining executives who were worried that the government might sell large quantities of uranium from a 135-million-pound federal reserve that is costly to maintain. The mining officials feared such a step would depress the price of the metal and make it harder to finance their projects.

An assistant energy secretary assured the executives that there would be no big sales before 2009, according to records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. Later, the Energy Department drafted a long-term strategy for the reserve and invited the industry's views.

Mining companies say about 100 skilled laborers will be hired at each site. Those jobs, along with income from mineral leases, could help ease pervasive poverty among Navajos, they say.

Opponents say the environmental risks are too great. One of URI's planned subterranean minefields is within a mile of six wells that supply drinking water for about 15,000 people in and around Crownpoint. Chronic exposure to uranium in drinking water has been associated with kidney disease and increased risk of cancer.

URI's federal license requires it to provide replacement wells, but tribal officials worry that contaminated water could migrate toward the new wells. No company has ever mined so close to a public water supply using the technology employed by URI.

The uncertainties unsettle many Navajos, who are surrounded by the legacy of past mining — abandoned shafts, tainted wells, radioactive dust.

"All these promises … I don't believe a word of it," said Larry King, a 49-year-old Navajo who raises cattle on his family's ranch in Church Rock. "I've seen too much mining. I'm not convinced."

The right solution?

Most of the projects would employ "solution mining," in which water fortified with oxygen — and sometimes bicarbonate — is injected into an underground formation of porous sandstone. The solution washes uranium and other minerals from the sandstone. The uranium-laden water is then pumped to the surface. There, the uranium is filtered out, dried and trucked away for further processing.

The oxygen solution is pumped back into the aquifer, and the process is repeated until the sandstone has yielded all the uranium that can be removed economically.

The amount of water poured back into the ground is slightly less than was removed, creating a low-pressure area. This causes groundwater to flow into the mining zone rather than away from it, and prevents uranium and other contaminants from spreading, according to the companies.

Just in case, they plan to ring mining zones with test wells so that any movement of pollutants will be detected promptly.

After an area has been fully mined, the producers would restore the aquifer by repeatedly pumping water to the surface, cleaning it with the same process used to purify bottled drinking water and injecting it back into the ground.

Solution mining has a three-decade track record in the U.S. Five facilities are operating today — one in Wyoming, one in Nebraska and three in Texas.

"I'm not aware of any major disasters," said Tibor Rozgonyi, head of the mining engineering department at Colorado School of Mines. "You can control the contamination, if you design correctly."

The questions revolve around whether aquifers can be permanently cleaned.

In Wyoming, the state Department of Environmental Quality has approved the closure of two solution-mining sites in the last two years. But it took at least six years to clean the aquifers to the state's satisfaction. "We think they can do it faster, in two or three years," said Richard Chancellor, the Wyoming official overseeing the restoration.

In a boom and bust industry, time matters, he said: "What if they went bankrupt and walked away?" Bonds posted by mining concerns might not cover all the costs of cleanup and monitoring, skeptics say.

In Texas, Uranium Resources Inc. is having difficulty cleaning a solution mine south of Corpus Christi. George Rice, a hydrogeologist hired by a review board in Kleberg County, found elevated concentrations of uranium, radium-226 and other pollutants more than five years after mining had ended.

In his report, Rice wrote that a URI official told him a request to relax the state's cleanup standards was "inevitable."

The problem, Rice wrote, is that once a closure is approved, the company can stop pumping, cleaning and monitoring groundwater. "There is no guarantee that the water will not migrate beyond the mine's boundaries," he wrote.

Pelizza of URI says it shouldn't matter if the water in a solution-mining zone isn't totally purified as long as it meets standards for its pre-mining use. "How clean," he asked, "is clean enough?"

Troubled history

The Puerco River, which runs along the southern boundary of the Navajo reservation, is usually dry in the summer. But early on July 16, 1979, the channel roared with 93 million gallons of radioactive water.

An earthen dam at a uranium mill in Church Rock had ruptured, releasing liquefied tailings, a waste product of traditional uranium production.

The result was the largest accidental release of radioactive material in American history. The surge was detected 50 miles downstream, in a stretch of the river that Navajos use to graze cattle and irrigate their corn.

The dam was considered state of the art, officials of United Nuclear Corp., which operated the mill and a nearby uranium mine, later told Congress.

The Environmental Protection Agency is trying to decontaminate groundwater at the site. But project manager Mark Purcell said the task may prove impossible. Some of the tainted water is moving toward Navajo land, he added.

With this experience as a backdrop, Navajo organizations and environmental groups are fighting URI's plan to make Church Rock a test site for solution mining.

A tribal water resources manager, John Leeper, noted in a written declaration to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission that private wells tap the Church Rock aquifer "for human drinking water."

King, the rancher, joined the board of the major opposition group, Eastern Navajo Dine Against Uranium Mining. (Dine, pronounced dih-NEH, is Navajo for "people.") The organization joined outside environmentalists in appealing URI's federal license, stalling the project for years.

It has sponsored protests with a rallying cry of leetso doo'da — Navajo for "no uranium." Its leaders have traveled to Washington, D.C., and the United Nations to argue against a resumption of mining.

"We don't want nobody doing experiments around our area, no," King said.

To Juan Velasquez, Strathmore's vice president for environmental and regulatory affairs, such talk is "the bane of the uranium industry. We're all fighting against emotional arguments."

Velasquez knows mining's troubled history in Church Rock. He became president of United Nuclear four years after the 1979 tailings spill, with responsibility for cleaning up the mill.

In 1992, the NRC ordered the company to set aside more than $16 million to guarantee completion of the cleanup. Instead, on Velasquez's instructions, the money was turned over to United Nuclear's parent company.

The commission imposed an unusually large $100,000 fine for "willful violation of an NRC order." United Nuclear agreed to pay $99,000 without admitting wrongdoing. Velasquez called that "a business decision" and said "there was never a time in which any surety was at risk."

Before Velasquez's arrival, United Nuclear had closed its Church Rock uranium mine, leaving behind a pile of radioactive waste ore. The closure met federal standards then in place. In August, a heavy rain flushed radioactive material from the mine into an arroyo.

Velasquez said he had no concerns that today's stricter mining regulations might likewise prove inadequate in the future. The Navajos, he said, have more pressing health issues than uranium mining.

"We could worry ourselves to death that one additional cancer in a million will be caused," Velasquez said. "It sounds stereotypical, but these Indians jump in their car and drive 90 miles per hour down the road. But they won't take the risk on uranium."

Twenty-five miles northeast of Church Rock, the groundwater in Crownpoint is pure. Uranium permeates the sandstone in the aquifer, but it is tightly bound.

Water from the six municipal wells, famous for its sweet taste, contains trace concentrations of uranium far below the EPA maximum for drinking water, federal regulators say.

URI wants to transform an old uranium drilling site into a solution-mining zone and processing plant.

For now, the lone employee at the site is Benjamin House, who signed on with URI 10 years ago, when it was the only company pursuing a mining license. A former delegate to the Navajo council, House has purchased airtime on the Navajo radio station to press the company's case. He has also booked tours of URI's Texas facilities for tribal and local leaders.

He steels himself for confrontation as he makes his rounds. URI plans to mine a second site west of Crownpoint. When House stood there recently, in a sparse field of tumbleweeds and pinon trees, a red pickup halted abruptly on the nearest dirt road. The driver leaned out the window to snarl at House.

House knows what his detractors think: "I sold out." But, he said, some Navajos approach him on the sly, saying they could use the jobs mining would bring.

House's most vocal backers are nine extended Navajo families who signed mineral leases with URI in the early '90s. They look forward to receiving royalties if mining gets underway.

Among them is Bessie Largo, a widow who makes ends meet by weaving rugs. Speaking in Navajo translated by House, she said her acreage was not suited for farming. "We are supposed to make a living off that land, and that is exactly what we are trying to do," she said.

Preparing for battle

The tribe claims jurisdiction over any territory where mining would affect Navajo residents, regardless of who owns the land or the mineral rights.

"A sovereign has a right to protect its people against environmental threats," said David Taylor, an attorney in the Navajo Department of Justice.

Mining executives, however, are honing arguments that the tribal ban does not apply to their lease-holdings in an area known as the "checkerboard," at the reservation's southeast edge.

Here, the tribe's communal land gives way to a hodgepodge of parcels held by federal and state agencies, private businesses and other owners. This is where the planned Church Rock and Crownpoint solution-mining sites are.

Strathmore is leasing land owned by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management. URI plans to mine on land the Navajos bought from the Santa Fe Railroad in 1929. The railroad retained the mineral rights, and a successor sold them to URI.

The uranium firms don't hide their eagerness to move onto the reservation proper. Pelizza sees the checkerboard projects as the key to achieving that goal.

"There's a concern. Once we've addressed those concerns, maybe the Navajos will see that and make exceptions," he said.

Taylor, the tribal lawyer, says it won't happen.

"We have no intention of letting them mine without a knockdown, drag-out legal battle," he said.

AP, November 21, 2006

BUCHANAN, N.Y. (AP) _ Government tests indicate that amounts of radioactive material found in ground water under the Indian Point nuclear power plants were seven times higher than reported by the laboratory hired by the complex to test for leaks.

Testing conducted for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the state Department of Environmental Conservation revealed that strontium 90 levels from the August samples ranged from 5 to 30 picocuries per liter.

Federal regulations say that the levels of strontium 90, a radioactive chemical linked to bone cancer and leukemia, must be lower than 8 picocuries per liter for water to be considered safe enough to drink.

Nonetheless, the NRC and state health officials have said for more than a year that the public is not in danger because the radioactive isotope is not reaching any sources of drinking water.

When Teledyne Brown Engineering, of Knoxville, Tenn., conducted tests on behalf of Indian Point, the company found only between 2 and 6 picocuries of strontium 90 per liter.

Entergy Nuclear Northeast, which owns the plant, has suspended the contract with Teledyne until officials can understand the discrepancy in testing.

"We've taken a new round of samples and are sending them to another lab," said Donald Mayer, Indian Point's lead engineer on the radiation leak.

Entergy plans to remove the source of the leak by storing spent fuel into special dry-storage casks at the site that can later be drained and diluted from a spent-fuel pool. The company has also begun to demineralize the water to lower the concentration of strontium and dilute the source of the contamination that is leaking.

Dale Klein, the new chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission last month ordered an independent review of how it oversees the Indian Point nuclear power plants.

Klein, who was installed in July, ordered NRC staff to develop a plan "because of repeated inquiries about the adequacy of NRC oversight and licensee performance" at the two IP reactors in Buchanan, on the Hudson River 35 miles north of midtown Manhattan.

Local FBI To Receive New Agent (DURHER)

By Joe Hanel, Herald Denver Bureau

Durango Herald, November 22, 2006

Murder rate on Ute reservations 20 times state average

DENVER - The Federal Bureau of Investigation will send a new special agent to the Four Corners in large part to deal with a combined murder rate on the two Ute Indian reservations that is 20 times the state average.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said he secured the commitment from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday. The region currently has one FBI agent, who works out of Durango. Southwest Colorado might get an additional federal prosecutor, as well, according to Salazar.

The murder rate on the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute reservations combined is 75 per 100,000 people, compared to 3.7 per 100,000 for the rest of Colorado, according to numbers the U.S. Attorney's Office in Denver gave to Salazar's office.

Salazar spoke to Gonzales on Friday during a tour of the Supermax prison outside Cañon City. Salazar said the two talked about the need for increased law enforcement on the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute reservations.

"I was pleased to get his commitment to send an additional FBI agent to the area to address the growing lawlessness in the area as well as his pledge to examine the possibility of sending an additional assistant U.S. attorney to the area," Salazar said in a prepared statement.

Salazar cited an "unacceptable number of unsolved crimes" on the reservations because of a lack of law enforcement officers in the region.

The Durango FBI branch is intended to be a two-person office, and it has had two agents in the past.

The new FBI agent will have to go through the typical federal application and hiring process, said Special Agent Renee Vonder Haar, the FBI's spokeswoman in Denver. She doesn't know how long it will take to hire a new agent.

"I definitely know they have been talking about it, but I don't know when it will happen," Vonder Haar said.

The Department of Justice reports its violent-crime statistics in terms of crimes per 100,000 people. Because the population of the reservations is well below 100,000, a murder rate of 75 per 100,000 does not mean there have been 75 murders in the last year.

At least two recent homicide cases from Towaoc are working their way through the courts. Samson Lameman is accused of shooting Tasha Posey after a drunken game of Russian roulette in May. Peter Begay faces second-degree murder charges for the death of 2-year-old Davery Oshley last November.

FBI Profiler Inspires Actor (USAT)

By Bill Keveney, Usa Today

USA Today, November 22, 2006

CULVER CITY, Calif. — Jim Clemente keeps a picture in his wallet of a boy he helped save as a member of the FBI's Behavioral Analysis Unit.

It reminds him of why he does his job. It reminds the actors on CBS' Criminal Minds of the real people they portray.

MIND OF A ' CRIMINAL': Criminal Minds hits its stride

"I saw that he carries this picture with him wherever he goes, and that the saving of these children is what his life is all about," says Mandy Patinkin, who became friends with Clemente during research for his role as BAU profiler Jason Gideon.

Through Patinkin, Clemente established a bond with others connected to the show, providing informal advice about profiling and the BAU.

Now, in a rare occurrence for an agent still with the FBI, Clemente has written a Minds episode, tonight's "Lessons Learned" (9 ET/PT), in which the agents interrogate a Guantanamo Bay detainee in the hope of stopping an imminent terrorist attack in the USA.

Clemente, 47, says the collaboration works well, creating an accurate picture of the BAU for the public and alerting other law enforcement agencies to its services, particularly in cases in which time is of the essence.

"In one hour, they can reach 15 million people," he says.

While researching at FBI headquarters in Quantico, Va., Patinkin couldn't quite get his hands around his role until he met Clemente, a former prosecutor who has served with the elite BAU since 1998. "It completely set me free in terms of his humanity, his nature, his kindness and concern," Patinkin says. "I pray that when I talk to him, some of it is left behind in me."

The two also had something in common: cancer. Clemente was on leave from the FBI at the time, undergoing treatment for lymphoma. Patinkin provided support, having recovered from his own bout with cancer.

"Mandy has been a great friend," says Clemente, who spoke on set in late October. With his recovery going well, he was scheduled to return to active duty in the BAU.

One tactic Patinkin learned from Clemente, included in an interrogation scene, is that engaging the subject as a human being and listening carefully can yield needed information.

"If you treat the subject with dignity and respect, that's the best way to promote interaction, to make it more likely that he will talk to you," Clemente says.

If the subject responds, profilers can pick up non-verbal clues. In the case of Middle Easterners, for example, dialect or use of certain words can tell investigators where the subject is from.

Clemente says tonight's episode is fiction, written with the advice of his nephew, a film student. In one scene based on real experience, some team members who haven't flown to Guantanamo are thrown off by the "Gitmo twist," a sharp turning maneuver necessary for landing.

Clemente used the episode to honor a BAU friend and colleague, Andrew Bingaman, who died of lymphoma the day Clemente turned in his episode outline. He named a character after Bingaman. "Andy fought cancer and terrorism with unbounded bravery," Clemente says.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Sweep (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, November 22, 2006

PROVIDENCE — In an investigation aimed at especially brazen drug dealing on street corners, the city police and federal drug agents have arrested 70 people on narcotics and weapons charges and are seeking to arrest another 27.

Law enforcement authorities began rounding up the suspects last week, punctuating an investigation nicknamed Operation Crackdown that was announced yesterday. Some corners where the drug peddlers stood three, four or five deep, depending on the weather or the time of day, have been cleared, said police Sgt. Fabio Zuena.

The operation incorporates a new approach in which seven suspects with minor criminal records were separated from the crop destined for arrest and will be offered what Police Chief Dean M. Esserman called “a second chance” to straighten out their lives and avoid another arrest.

Those seven — four juveniles and three adults — will be called into a room for a dose of “tough love” by their neighbors, community leaders and the police, Esserman said, and offered education, substance-abuse treatment and employment opportunities.

They will be told, he said: “You may not return to that corner. We don’t have to catch you. We’ve already caught you. We just have to have the [arrest] warrant signed the moment you return to that corner.” Then an array of social services will be pressed on them.

Operation Crackdown was described as unusual in its duration and scope. Beginning in April and lasting through last month, investigators researched the drug-dealing hot spots throughout Providence and focused on an area of Upper South Providence with the Lockwood Plaza public-housing development as the epicenter.

They identified 104 people as investigation targets, including the seven who are avoiding immediate arrest, and made a number of undercover purchases of cocaine and handguns. Esserman and Mayor David N. Cicilline said that list makes it "the largest narcotics and gun investigation" in Providence police history. Brian Crowell, assistant special agent in charge of the New England division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, said the 72 arrested are "the most ever targeted in a single drug investigation in Rhode Island."

Investigators bought or seized four kilos of crack and cocaine and four handguns — there were 150 individual drug buys — and seized $38,000 in currency.

Operation Crackdown is inspired by the Urban League of Rhode Island, whose national organization wants to replicate the success of the so-called Highpoint Initiative in Highpoint, N.C. The Highpoint program, which has been popularized in academic law enforcement research, took aim at "open-air drug markets" by removing street dealers in an effort to reduce drug-related crime and violence in neighborhoods.

The new wrinkle in the Highpoint Initiative is the organized and swift offer of help to offenders who merit help, drawing in religious and other community leaders and social-service agencies.

Dennis Langley, president and chief executive officer of the Urban League of Rhode Island, said Providence was one of three cities asked to participate in the Highpoint Initiative because his chapter and Esserman are held in high esteem by his national organization. His chapter is taking responsibility for working with the seven minor offenders.

"We are not about arresting people," Langley said at the formal announcement in the auditorium of the Public Safety Complex. "We are about changing communities and changing lives for the benefit of our society."

Langley and police supervisors said they hope to dispel fear and reduce the feeling of disorder in certain neighborhoods by reducing or eliminating street dealing.

"Over the years we have had so many individuals complaining that we cannot live in our neighborhoods because of the drug trafficking," Langley said.

Only time will tell, said police Lt. Thomas Verdi, commander of the city police Narcotics and Organized Crime Bureau, whether a program launched in the much smaller city of Highpoint, which is in a semirural region, can be successfully transplanted to larger cities with different demographics. Tucson and Kansas City also are trying it.

Lockwood Plaza and its immediate vicinity was chosen as the focus of the investigation, according to the police, because it was one of the more overt and busy drug markets and because the target area has numerous calls for police service. The target area is bounded by Broad, Myrtle and Dudley streets, Prairie Avenue and Stewart Street.

Thirty-three of those targeted are from in and around Lockwood Plaza, according to Esserman, which is a privately managed property of the Providence Housing Authority. The authority acquired Lockwood Plaza in a federal government foreclosure and spent $6 million to $7 million in renovations three years ago.

The housing authority tries to screen out prospective tenants with criminal records and has a longstanding policy of evicting tenants who are caught in drug-dealing or other serious crimes or who invite in relatives and friends who get involved in crime.

Although there was a target area, the probe spread citywide and arrests were made in a number of neighborhoods. Those arrested range in age from 14 to 49 years old. Most have been convicted of felony crimes and a majority are violators of their probation or parole, according to Verdi.

Nine of the suspects have been singled out for federal prosecution — the roundup was triggered last Wednesday, after a federal grand jury handed up their secret indictments — in large part because they were allegedly dealing in amounts of drugs that will subject them to harsher punishment in the federal system. The rest are to be prosecuted by the state, including the 27 not in custody but who are named in arrest warrants.

Among the nine to be prosecuted federally are Khalid Mason, 30, formerly of Pavilion Avenue, Providence, and Derrick Isom, 31, of Dunnell Avenue, Pawtucket, who are accused of running a crack house. They led a gang of street dealers in the Lockwood Plaza neighborhood, according to Verdi.

Mason, who had been named in a Providence police arrest warrant for at least two years, was caught by U.S. deputy marshals, living under an assumed name on the Mashantucket Pequot reservation in Ledyard, Conn. While a fugitive, according to Verdi, he had lived in California and Atlanta.

The nine are: Juan "Weezy" Forbes, 20, of Knight Street, Providence, who is charged with conspiracy to distribute and distribution of at least 50 grams of crack and with three counts of being a felon in possession of a firearm; Eric Grundy, 20, of Vandewater Street, Providence, charged with conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack and distributing crack; Daniel McClain, 28, of Stanwood Street, Providence, charged with conspiring with Grundy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack and distributing at least 50 grams of crack; Donnell Jenkins, 28, of Northup Street, Cranston, charged with two counts of distributing crack, one of which involves at least 5 grams.

Also, Ronald Hill, 35, of Broad Street, Providence, charged with two counts of distributing crack, one of which involves at least 5 grams; Fernell Brown, 20, of Knight Street, Providence, charged with two counts of distributing at least 5 grams of crack; and Isom and Mason, both of whom were charged with conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack, distributing at least 50 grams of crack, and using an apartment to traffic in crack.

Conviction of distributing or conspiring to distribute at least 50 grams of crack carries a maximum punishment of life in prison.

All except Grundy have been arraigned in U.S. District Court and pleaded not guilty and are being detained. Grundy is serving a state sentence and has not yet been arraigned.

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 22, 2006

THE STORY SO FAR

Temple grad student Akhil Bansal and his dad in India are making millions smuggling pills to Americans who buy them online. Today's installment begins as DEA agents race to Australia, hoping to head off a move that could ruin their big case. It is October 2004.

ABOARD QANTAS

DEA agent Eric Russ sprawled across three seats on a southbound 747, earplugs in, eyeshades on, sound asleep.

His partner tried to relax, too, but several hours into the overnight flight to Sydney, Carlos Aquino was wide awake. Carlos had been busting drug dealers since 1969, when he was a trim military policeman in Vietnam. But he had never worked a case so important, so complex.

And now, with just three days' notice, he was scrambling to get to western Australia.

Carlos looked into the dark Pacific sky, then pulled out a 41-page report marked "DEA SENSITIVE."

The document summarized the six-month investigation: Agents traced three packages of generic pills at the Philadelphia airport to a Chester storefront. A receipt at the storefront led them to something called Rx-mart.com, which was hosted by a Web server in Texas. Keen detective work by FBI agent Jason Huff revealed that the person paying Rx-mart.com's bill was a cocky 25-year-old named Andrew Shackleton who lived in Australia, where he appeared to run a multimillion-dollar online pill ring.

DEA believed that Shackleton used pill suppliers around the globe, including bit players such as Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal.

DEA hoped to extradite Shackleton and charge him under a U.S. law - "operating a continuing criminal enterprise" - that carried a huge hammer, a 20-year minimum mandatory sentence. The law had been aimed for use against mobsters and drug kingpins. This would be among the first uses against Internet pill pushers.

At DEA's request, the Australian Federal Police had checked Shackleton's bank records and shadowed him in Perth. But now AFP wanted to bring Shackleton in for questioning, which could tip everyone else under investigation. It might ruin the U.S. case.

Which was why Carlos and his partner were in such a hurry to get to Perth.

MANHATTAN

Foram Mankodi, a pediatrician from Bombay, led her fiancé, Akhil Bansal, toward the Halloween parade in Greenwich Village.

A pocked goalie mask hid Akhil's broad face; he was Jason from the movie Friday the 13th. Foram, her dark hair under a peaked hat, dressed as a witch.

The Halloween festivities, she hoped, would provide a break from their increasingly hectic lives. Akhil's workaholic ways were wearing him down.

Not only was he pursuing two master's degrees from Temple, but Akhil was also managing his father's India-based business - supplying pharmaceuticals to companies that sold them to Americans on the Internet.

In the year since he had proposed, Foram watched Akhil grow the U.S. side of the business from a two-person, 1,000-pill-a-day operation into a 10-person, 50,000-pill-a-day enterprise. Already, the intense 26-year-old had earned his first $1 million, money he used to buy a new five-bedroom, $420,000 condo in an affluent Delhi suburb.

But she didn't love him for his money. After they met at the Temple library, their first dates were visits to the Franklin Mills mall. Back then, they took walks on Kelly Drive and watched Friends and Seinfeld. Now, Akhil was promising to fly her to London for New Year's Eve.

Their parents didn't know about the engagement; the couple was going to wait until Akhil graduated and they could return to India.

Foram found Akhil, with the green tint in his brown eyes, to be handsome, brilliant, kind, genuine, confident, sure to succeed. Akhil acknowledged that he was "obsessed with achievement and perfection." His memory was photographic, his class papers top-rate. Someday, she knew, he would run a large hospital in India.

Even Akhil's jokes related to business. The doormat outside his Roxborough apartment said: "Please stay on the mat. Your visit is very important to us. Your knock will be answered in the order in which it was received."

Foram loved Akhil's directness. Before he proposed, he hacked into her e-mail account to make sure that she was true, that she really cared for him.

Akhil told her about the snooping afterward. "All is fair in love and war," he said.

She found this charming.

He had his faults, among them a quick temper. When an argument would reduce her to tears, he would wave a hand and say, "Ah, you women use tears as your weapon."

When she would tell him to stop bragging, he would say, "What is man without ego?"

Akhil cared little about politics. His passions were cars, money and music.

And although he was proud to help grow his father's business, Akhil yearned to make a name for himself. He often cited the Hindi expression upnay pairopay khada hona: "Stand on my own feet."

Foram knew that Akhil was so driven, he had trouble relaxing, even on vacation. During a trip to Niagara Falls, Akhil spent hours tethered to a laptop. When Foram urged him to join friends at the barbecue grill, he snapped, "This is important."

Later, he explained that he had just caught a German rival hacking into his computer to steal client data.

Akhil retaliated. He sent the bastard a virus.

AGRA, INDIA

Dr. Brij Bansal opened an e-mail from a Costa Rican online pharmacy operator.

Amounts you did not confirm

Monday another $40,000 will leave Cyprus. All transfers will arrive in Fleet/USA. Thanks a lot for your great business.

CENTER CITY

Beneath a red Mexican tapestry, federal prosecutor Barbara Cohan spread a DEA chart across her red desk. The diagram was dotted with mug shots, lines drawn to suggest associations.

The Australian Shackleton and his spiked, peroxided hair loomed large in the center. Web operators in five continents formed an outer ring around him. Off in a corner, with suspected couriers, was Akhil Bansal.

Barb let out a laugh. Taken together, the mug shots reminded her of the characters from the bar scene in Star Wars.

Barb had worked drug cases for 24 years, but found these suspects particularly greedy. They dispensed prescription drugs like candy. Such audacity made her smile. Her job was much more fun, she often said, when the defendants were evil.

Barb's colleague and friend, prosecutor Wendy Kelly, was on her way to Australia to join two DEA agents. With Kelly gone, Barb focused on the Indians living in Philadelphia.

Akhil was not Mr. Big, she believed, but he would do. To indict the case in federal court here, she needed a local defendant. And prosecutors preferred a dealer to a user.

Surveillance had trailed Akhil to a suspected Queens, N.Y., stash house, then to another home, where agents had videotaped Indians loading hundreds of packages onto a UPS truck.

Akhil's role wasn't clear. Yet for a young guy in grad school, his bank accounts seemed flush. When Barb subpoenaed his records, she discovered $100,000 in certificates of deposit and a free student checking account with $138,797.23.

Large wire transfers from abroad - $35,000, $60,000, $100,000 - were routine. He wrote big checks - $3,000, $25,000, $50,000 - to cash and to a Queens company.

The money transfers weren't illegal, per se. And agents hadn't witnessed Akhil commit any crimes. But there was enough suspicious activity to ask a magistrate to authorize a search of his e-mail. When they got approval, the feds sent a search warrant to hotmail.com, the company that hosted Akhil's account.

KING OF PRUSSIA, PA.

Douglas, a husky 19-year-old computer salesman, logged on to ourprescriptionsforless.com. He lived with his mother in a small brick house within sight of the Bloomingdale's arch at the mall.

He clicked on alprazolam, a generic sedative. Douglas liked the way it cut his anxiety in social situations.

By ordering online, Douglas avoided an embarrassing doctor visit or alerting his mother, who still carried his health insurance and might see the bill.

Douglas clicked on quantity and chose 110 tablets, more than a month's supply - more than he thought he would need - just in case. These Internet pharmacies were shady, clearly illegal, and Douglas wasn't sure how long they would remain in business.

He entered his address. He liked that the pills were shipped from a domestic depot. Why risk involving U.S. Customs?

He charged $132.57 to his credit card.

The process was so easy. And why not? Wasn't the point of pharmaceuticals to help people? Weren't the major drug companies always bombarding American consumers with ads? The pitches were everywhere - magazines, newspapers, TV, billboards, banners at ballgames. Anxious? Sleepless? Limp? Have we got a pill for you.

Douglas confirmed his order, and it zipped through cyberspace.

The order shot from the online pharmacy in Romania to a credit-card processor in the British Channel Islands, where it was approved, then e-mailed to Indian suppliers in Agra, who forwarded it to a rented home in Queens, where an Indian supervisor printed it out and handed it to another Indian woman, who climbed to the second floor, took 110 tabs of alprazolam from a cubbyhole, slid them into an envelope, labeled it, and put it into a bag for pickup by UPS, which, two days later, delivered it, up the walk by the big holly tree, to Douglas' doorstep in King of Prussia.

PERTH, AUSTRALIA

The day after the Americans arrived in Perth, they shook off jet lag and turned on the diplomatic charm.

The Australians knew little about Shackleton, except that he was a shadowy figure, a former waiter suddenly rich enough to buy himself a flat and renovate his parents' home. But, Carlos explained, Shackleton had made one foolish mistake: He'd used a Texas company, not an Australian one, to host his online pharmacy and e-mail, making it easier for FBI to get a warrant to search it.

Shackleton's e-mail provided a bonanza. It appeared to show that the brash CEO of Shack Corp. ran a global pill network that netted $5,000 a day, almost $2 million a year.

Shackleton had homes in Perth; Florence, Italy; and Frankfurt, Germany. He was toying with buying a million-dollar chateau near Paris.

DOJ_NMG_0097194

Houses were nice, but Shackleton's ultimate goal was amassing $800 million. He figured he could achieve this in five years if he sold 3,000 packages of Valium a day.

"It's not easy to get rich," he wrote in an e-mail to an Internet consultant. "My goal is the upper echelon of economic independence."

What struck the Americans most about the guy, besides his spiked hair, was his arrogance. He began e-mail to employees with the words, "I decree...," and signed off, "Your Lord."

He called his three main suppliers by frat-boy nicknames - the German was "White," the Hungarian "Chubbs," and the Indian "Curry."

Curry's son lived in Philadelphia.

CENTER CITY

The day after the Australia contingent returned, Barb and Kelly met with their boss in his expansive Chestnut Street office overlooking Independence Hall. U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan wasn't a micromanager, but he liked to be briefed on big cases.

The trip had gone well, Kelly reported, better than expected. The Aussies had agreed not to question Shackleton, but would instead tap phone lines, pull bank records, the works.

But there was more, Kelly added - something she had learned that morning.

Barb took over.

She grabbed a large white board and spun it around, revealing DEA's cluttered chart of targets.

"We've been focusing here," she said, pointing to Shackleton in the center, spokes running out to other online pharmacies.

Barb paused, reveling in the moment's drama. She pointed to the upper lefthand corner of the chart, to a smaller universe of suppliers, the Bansals. "Our focus needs to be here."

She put a finger on Akhil's mug. "Head of U.S. operations."

Mr. Big wasn't a cocky 25-year-old Australian. He was a cocky 26-year-old Indian. And, Barb said, "he's right here in our backyard."

His e-mail proved it: His father, a doctor in India, was smuggling one million prescription pills a month to America - generic Viagra, Valium, Xanax, kilos of the painkiller hydrocodone, the psychotropic club drug ketamine, the stimulant ephedrine.

Customers ordered directly from a dozen or so Bansal clients, who operated independent online pharmacies, and the Bansals filled their orders. It seemed that the son was supervising everything, Barb said, right from his modest apartment in Roxborough.

This was no Robin Hood operation - no discounting pills for the gravely ill. The Bansals, she said, charged more for their meds because they didn't require prescriptions. They sold to anyone with a credit card and a modem.

"These guys are just like street-corner drug dealers, except they use the Internet," Barb said, getting worked up. "There are dealers, suppliers, distribution networks. This is the new wave of drug dealing - white-collar drug dealing."

Meehan had recently attended a Justice Department briefing at which DEA Administrator Karen Tandy announced that online pharmacies were a priority. Here was their chance, he said. This case would make a splash.

Kelly wanted to move now - arrests, indictments, prison. The risk to consumers was too serious, she argued. The Bansals were shipping addictive, dangerous prescription pills. Maybe that Colorado woman who overdosed was part of the case. Who might be next?

Barb argued for more time. In heroin and crack cases, she noted, authorities routinely waited to gather enough evidence to take down whole networks, not just a few dealers. Why was this case different? Because it involved white-collar dealers and middle-class consumers?

Barb and Kelly agreed on one thing: They couldn't make this case alone. They needed three things:

One, help from India. Though the nation was notoriously corrupt, and Akhil's father was rich enough to pay bribes, the risk seemed worth it. Assistance from Indian drug agents would be essential.

Two, an expert to track money-laundering on a global scale. Could bureaucrats at Justice in D.C. move fast enough to send someone?

Three, a way to read Akhil's e-mail as he sent and received it. That would require an e-mail wiretap. No one in the room had ever tried that.

They didn't know anyone who had.

U.S. Pulls Out Of Colombian Coca Region (MH)

By Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, November 22, 2006

BOGOTA - After several years of trying to wean farmers from the drug trade in the conflictive southern province of Caquetá, the U.S. government is winding down its funding of alternative development programs in the region.

The pullout comes amid a flurry of criticism of U.S.-backed efforts to eliminate illegal drug production in Colombia, and just before the U.S. Congress is expected to vote to continue aid for counter-drug programs in this nation of 41 million people.

Colombia remains the largest supplier of cocaine to the U.S. market, and recent reports have suggested that production is increasing despite some $4 billion in U.S. aid for the military, crop eradication and economic development programs since 2000.

The Caquetá development programs are a small part -- $9 million in U.S. funds went to the province in five years -- of this annual aid package, but the region carries symbolic weight as one of Colombia's poorest and most notoriously guerrilla-ridden provinces.

For decades, the leftist guerrillas of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, better known as the FARC, have dominated the area, which has 410,000 people and is a little more than half the size of Florida. They have used it as a training ground for new recruits and a launching pad for attacks.

LABORATORY

Given its background, Caquetá became a laboratory for the counter-narcotics program known as Plan Colombia, designed to dry up coca, the raw material for cocaine, and replace it with viable alternatives. The overall plan included billions in U.S. aid for military training, intelligence equipment and hardware like helicopter gunships as well as money for economic projects and infrastructure.

At first, the plan seemed to be working in Caquetá. Under President Alvaro Uribe, the Colombian military launched an unprecedented offensive of 17,000 troops that pushed the guerrillas from their traditional strongholds in Caquetá and elsewhere, and disrupted the coca economy.

Colombian police data shows a drop in coca farming in the province from 59,000 acres in 1999 to 12,000 last year. U.S. and Colombian economic programs followed, including $5.6 million from the Agency for International Development (AID), $3.9 million of which went to a project for rubber trees that benefited 579 families.

But now both parts of the effort seem to be in retreat. According to politicians from the area and analysts of the military, the Colombian army is quietly withdrawing some troops from the province. The armed forces do not comment on troop movements.

Meanwhile, the United States has stopped funding economic development programs in the Caquetá region.

"There are serious doubts about the impact of the program," said Alfredo Rangel, a former consultant with the Colombian military who now runs a think tank on security issues. ``The impression is that these programs are very inefficient."

Caquetá politicians are dismayed by the U.S. government's decision. They say the programs helped undercut the coca economy during the military offensive, but still need time to take root.

"When the coca left, the economy went into crisis," said Luis Fernando Armario, a longtime congressman for Caquetá. ``Now is when we need the economic help."

The U.S. pullout from Caquetá comes just months after reports by the State Department and the United Nations said the total coca acreage in this country is growing again. In March, the State Department said coca acreage had increased by 26 percent; in June, a U.N. report showed an 8 percent rise.

U.S. officials say that their latest survey, done primarily through satellite photos, covered more land than previously and say coca acreage is down since the plan began.

REFOCUSED AID

One U.S. embassy official here also said the Caquetá pullout -- which doesn't affect other much smaller programs in the region that focus on human rights and internally displaced people -- is part of an AID effort to refocus U.S. assistance.

"We're not pulling out of Caquetá," said the official, who wished to remain anonymous because the official is not authorized to speak in the name of the U.S. government. ``That [alternative development] program came to its natural close."

Farmers in the area disagree. Pablo Emilio Piñeda, the head of a rubber producing cooperative, says the project is far from finished. He worries that many of his colleagues will now return to growing coca.

"With this decision, many of these families are in limbo," Piñeda wrote The Miami Herald in an e-mail. ``They could easily return to sowing illegal crops."

The U.S. decision appears to have been based on a set of factors more complex than officials have publicly acknowledged.

A State Department memo on the alternative development projects in Caquetá, obtained by The Miami Herald and previously reported in Colombian media, offers a view of some of the difficulties that U.S. officials face.

The document states U.S. government workers were advised not to travel to one project in Caquetá because of guerrilla activity, and one project dealing with livestock in Caquetá had to be moved to another province because of ``security concerns."

The document also outlines the economic challenges AID is facing in places like Caquetá and argues that the same money in other provinces could benefit more families. The U.S. embassy official said this document was one of many that was used to analyze the situation in Caquetá and come to the decision to leave.

"Instead of saying this didn't work, what the mission concluded, in conjunction with the [Colombian] government, is that we can do this better," the official said.

But critics of U.S. policy in Colombia contend that the decision to shut down development programs in Caquetá reflects a larger problem in the overall strategy.

Adam Isaacson of the Washington-based Center for International Policy says that close to 80 percent of U.S. funding for Colombia continues to be for military aid, leaving little for alternative development.

Of the $700 million annual U.S. package, for instance, AID receives around $130 million per year for projects ranging from economic development to training for justice officials and investigators.

"When they think of Plan Colombia, they don't think of job opportunities and strengthening of governments," Isaacson said of rural coca farmers. ``They think spray planes and helicopters, and I think this decision to leave Caquetá reinforces that image."

Local farmers like Piñeda agree. "It seems like they're betting on war, and that's the saddest thing about all this," he said in the e-mail.

Seneca Tobacco Merchant Agrees To Comply With Federal Demands (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo (NY) News, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097197

A prominent Seneca Nation tobacco merchant who has tangled several times with the federal government has agreed to change his business practices and forfeit $1.25 million to the government.

Scott B. Maybee, one of the largest Seneca tobacco merchants in the region, signed a recent federal court agreement promising that his cigarette companies will closely adhere to federal laws during all future sales.

The agreement is believed to be the first of its kind between a Native American mail-order tobacco business and the federal government, federal officials said Thursday.

Maybee runs three Salamanca-based companies that employ about 200 people to do mail-order and Internet cigarette sales. His business was the subject of a lengthy investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives.

In court papers, U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn agreed that the government will not criminally prosecute Maybee for any activities uncovered during the investigation.

Maybee, in turn, will forfeit $1.25 million to the government, in six payments spread out over the next two years.

"[As] long as Maybee is fully compliant with all federal laws, Maybee may continue to operate his interstate cigarette business," Flynn said.

According to his attorney, Margaret A. Murphy, Maybee agreed to:

Adopt a written age-verification procedure that ensures cigarettes are only sold to adults at least 21 years old.

Guarantee that all shipments of cigarettes not bearing government tax stamps will fully comply with federal regulations.

Limit individual consumer sales to 10 cartons per order and 25 cartons per month.

Maybee said his agreement was reached after a series of discussions involving him, Murphy and Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard D. Kaufman.

Maybee's is believed to be one of the largest among approximately 200 tobacco-related businesses run by Seneca Nation members. He also runs several nontobacco businesses. In recent years, his tobacco operations have had several legal run-ins with federal agents. Maybee has never been charged criminally, but in 2004, he had to forfeit 588,000 cigarettes that had been seized during an ATF investigation.

The 34-year-old businessman encouraged other Seneca tobacco sellers to adopt similar business practices to avoid problems with the federal government, but he said he will not do anything that would harm the Senecas' rights to operate as a sovereign Indian nation.

Maybee said he will continue to fight in court against what he considers to be unfair tax enforcement actions by New York State. The cigarette companies involved are called SmartSmoker, OrderSmokesDirect and BuyCheapCigarettes.com. Maybee's agreement with the government was approved by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara.

A Parting Shot From George Allen (NYT)

As a last little gift to America, Senator George Allen, who was narrowly defeated by James Webb this month, has introduced what may be his final piece of legislation: a bill that would allow the carrying of concealed weapons in national parks. The argument behind the bill is that national park regulations unfairly strip many Americans of a right they may enjoy outside the parks. The bill has passed to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, where we hope it will die the miserable death it deserves.

America’s confusion about the Second Amendment is now nearly total. An amendment that ensures a collective right to bear arms has been misread in one legislature after another — often in the face of strong public disapproval — as a law guaranteeing an individual’s right to carry a weapon in public. And, in a perversion of monumental proportions, the battle to extend that right has largely succeeded in co-opting the language of the Civil Rights movement, so that depriving an American of the right to carry a gun in public sounds, to some, as offensive as stripping him of the right to vote. Senator Allen’s bill is, of course, being cheered by the gun lobby, which sees it not as an assault on public safety but as a way of nationalizing the armed paranoia that the National Rifle Association and its cohorts stand for.

If Americans want to feel safer in their national parks, the proper solution is to increase park funding, which has decayed steadily since the Bush administration took office. To zealots who believe that the Second Amendment trumps all others, the parks are merely another badland, like schools and church parking lots, that could be cleaned up if the carrying of private weapons were allowed. The concealed-weapon advocates are doing an excellent job of sounding terrified by "lonely wilderness trails." But make no mistake. Senator Allen's bill would make no one safer. It can only endanger the public.

IMMIGRATION:

Governors Want More Federal Cash For Imprisoning Illegals (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

PHOENIX - Governors of nine states, including Arizona and California, are urging President Bush to include full reimbursement for states' costs of imprisoning illegal immigrants convicted of crimes when he submits his proposed federal budget next year.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano's office said she and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were spearheading the effort to increase funding for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Justice Department.

Until the federal government secures the border, the SCAAP funding is needed and deserved by states that have "to fill this gap by policing the regions and incarcerating criminal aliens at their own considerable expense," said the letter, which was dated Monday and released Tuesday.

Other state governors who signed the letter were Bill Richardson of N.M.; Thomas Vilsack, Iowa; Christine Gregoire, Wash.; Phil Bredesen, Tenn.; Jon Corzine, N.J.; Ted Kulongoski, Ore.; Brad Henry, Okla.; and Kathleen Sebelius, Kan. Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico also signed the letter.

The letter is the latest in a series of steps taken publicly and behind the scenes by governors to press for increased SCAAP funding.

In July, Gregoire sent an invoice for nearly $50 million to the Justice Department for unreimbursed costs of housing criminal illegal immigrants in state prisons.

Napolitano has sent similar invoices since late 2004.

Man's Deportation To Somalia Sets Off A Wave Of Concern Over Safety (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

On the evening of Nov. 2, a young corporate lawyer in New Jersey received a frantic call from a charity client, a 46-year-old Harlem grocery clerk with a history of petty crime. He was in custody on an airplane in Newark on his way to Mogadishu, the capital of his native Somalia, a country so dangerous that to the lawyer's knowledge, no one had been deported there in years.

The courts were closed, and a federal judge who heard an emergency motion the next day ruled that the clerk, Mohamad Rasheed Jama, was already outside United States jurisdiction.

So, after a stop in Nairobi, where he was handed over to Kenyans, Mr. Jama stepped off an airplane in Mogadishu — and into the hands of Islamist militants, who soon accused him of being an American spy and began demanding money.

"They were extremely angry," said his lawyer, Emily B. Goldberg, relating the last frightened call she got from Mr. Jama, who had spent four years in immigration detention in New Jersey awaiting deportation to the land he left at 18. "He asked me if there was anything I could do. I told him in the American system, there was nothing more I could do."

Mr. Jama, whose deportation was based on a 1989 conviction for owning an unlicensed gun, is among the first Somalis to be repatriated against his will since the United States Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 last year that the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia did not bar such deportations. About 4,000 Somalis nationwide are eligible for immediate deportation under the ruling, which turned on the syntax of a Congressional statute.

The case of Mr. Jama, who has a 9-year-old American daughter in Harlem, highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate.

Conditions in Somalia have worsened in recent months, moving to the brink of an all-out regional war. In June, Mogadishu was seized by Islamic militias suspected of harboring leaders of Al Qaeda. The militias, after routing warlords backed by the United States, began imposing a Taliban-like regime of strict religious courts.

A week before his abrupt departure, Mr. Jama's volunteer lawyers filed a habeas petition on his behalf, arguing that his continued detention in the Middlesex County Jail in New Jersey was unlawful because "it is simply beyond dispute that effecting his removal to Somalia would be impossible."

Michael W. Gilhooly, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, confirmed Mr. Jama's deportation, declining to say whether more were under way. But at a federal appeals hearing in Seattle last month, a Justice Department lawyer said that three people had been deported to Somalia since the Supreme Court ruling, after volunteering.

Because an injunction halting most such deportations was lifted in April, the government lawyer, Greg D. Mack, added, the others would be deported at the discretion of the Department of Homeland Security.

The 28 years Mr. Jama spent in New York hardly prepared him for survival under Islamic fanatics. His job history, detailed in an affidavit, includes three summers as a "jack of all trades" at Jewish youth camps in Orange County, long hours as a counter man in corner stores on upper Lexington Avenue, as well as garment work in Midtown Manhattan and a stint as a junkyard dealer on 125th Street.

His lengthy rap sheet reflects a drinking problem, he said in the affidavit, and his having adapted too well to Harlem's "street culture." Besides a misdemeanor assault and the gun possession, for which he served three years in prison, his offenses include possession of marijuana, selling beer without a license and riding a bus without paying the fare.

But in his old Harlem neighborhood around West 115th Street, he is mainly remembered as a hard worker and good father brought down by alcohol.

"He was very cool, a good dude," said Lester Robinson, 26, whose sister, Waldrina Robinson, is the mother of Mr. Jama's daughter, Ashante.

Ms. Robinson, a home attendant, said she ended a five-year relationship with Mr. Jama in 2000, but she spoke warmly of the years after Ashante's birth in 1997, when Mr. Jama changed the baby's diapers, often cared for the girl at the grocery store where he worked, and "gave me every dime" he earned.

"He was a good father — when he was there," she said.

From the government's perspective, Mr. Jama should have been gone years earlier. In 1978, when Somalia still had a central government, Mr. Jama entered the United States on a one-year visa to work with his father as a security guard at Somalia's Diplomatic Mission to the United Nations.

Left behind at 19, when his father joined his mother in London, Mr. Jama learned English, earned a high school equivalency diploma and became a permanent legal resident under the immigration amnesty enacted by Congress in 1986. But he bought an illegal handgun for protection after a cousin was killed in a robbery, he said, and was arrested for having it after an alcohol-fueled dispute with other relatives drew the police.

Mr. Jama was ordered deported in 1993. But with no foreseeable chance of deporting him to Somalia, where civil war was raging, the authorities released him under supervision. As was typical at the time, no action was taken when he stopped reporting, even when later infractions led to brief jail time.

After 9/11, attitudes changed. Mr. Jama was picked up in October 2002, as were many other Somalis. But unlike those with comparable records who were provisionally released again when deportations stopped, Mr. Jama had no lawyer until this year. Then the American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey took the case and enlisted help from the law firm Gibbons, Del Deo, Dolan, Griffinger & Vecchione.

"I want nothing more from life than to be near Ashante and to be involved in her life on a daily basis once again," Mr. Jama wrote in his affidavit, seeking supervised release to a cousin in Queens who had found him a job in a grocery store. "Although my greatest fear is remaining in immigration detention for the rest of my life and never regaining my freedom, I am also frightened about what could happen if the United States tried to remove me to Somalia."

As a member of the Warsengeli clan, Mr. Jama faces special danger in areas dominated by other clans, including Mogadishu, a Somalia expert wrote in an affidavit. Other affidavits cited the failed deportation of Keyse G. Jama (no relation), the Somali man who had lost the Supreme Court case, only to be rejected at gunpoint at a Somalia airport and sent back to Minneapolis in the spring of 2005. A federal judge outraged at that botched operation ordered the government to "slow down its rush to act" and release him.

Keyse Jama is now in Canada, where he fled in January and applied for political asylum, which is granted to the vast majority of Somali applicants, said David Yerzy, his Toronto lawyer. "The Canadian government recognizes that their lives are in danger," he said.

In the United States, lawyers for Somalis are asking whether Mr. Jama's deportation signals the start of a mass deportation or a warning to those facing indefinite detention that "if you use habeas, you'll be on the next flight," said Jeffrey Keyes, the Minneapolis lawyer who argued the Supreme Court case.

In Mogadishu, as far as is known, Mr. Jama is just trying to survive.

"The government demonstrated a complete disregard for my client's safety," Ms. Goldberg said. "I strongly believe that Mr. Jama is simply the first of many that will be placed in a similarly dangerous situation."

'Blade ' Actor Wesley Snipes Calls Himself A 'scapegoat' In Tax Fraud Case (AP)

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) - Wesley Snipes has told a newspaper columnist he is being unfairly targeted by federal prosecutors who indicted him on tax fraud charges.

"It appears I'm to be the scapegoat, because there's more public interest in 'celebrities gone bad' than 'rich people being taken advantage of,'" Snipes wrote last weekend in an e-mail to Orlando Sentinel columnist Scott Maxwell.

An Oct. 17 indictment charges Snipes with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the "Blade" trilogy and other films was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm, American Rights Litigators, would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

If convicted, Snipes, 44, faces up to 16 years in prison.

"I will abide by the law, seek the protections the law affords me and, as always, seek the advice of competent council in effort to resolve this issue," Snipes wrote to the columnist. "I'm not running, I'm not a fugitive, despite the misrepresentations in the press."

Snipes is said to be in Namibia filming a movie.

"There is no deal that has been worked out," U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Steve Cole said Monday. "The only thing we have discussed is coming back to face the charges."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Social Security Up For Discussion (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

With the elections over and Democrats poised to take control on Capitol Hill, the Bush administration is making a fresh push to persuade them to help rein in the rising costs of Social Security and government health-care programs by offering to open talks with "no preconditions."

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., the president's point man on Social Security and other entitlement programs, said in an interview yesterday that he has had "a number of . . . very, very general, very preliminary conversations" with lawmakers from both parties about the issue since Election Day, Nov. 7.

So far, "it's too early in the aftermath of the election to know whether we're going to get traction," Paulson said, adding that he is "going to make a huge effort to persuade people to engage in a bipartisan discussion where we don't precondition our discussion."

"No preconditions," Paulson said, means both sides get a chance to put their ideas on the table. In regard to Social Security, administration officials said that means President Bush will continue to advocate that younger workers be allowed to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts, a proposal Congress roundly rejected last year.

It also means that the White House is willing to listen to other ideas, administration officials said, including personal savings accounts that do not involve diverting Social Security taxes, as well higher payroll taxes to help cover a projected explosion in Social Security costs after members of the baby boom generation begin to retire in 2008.

"We're in a listening mode," said Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, who has also been spending a lot of time since the election talking to key Democrats about entitlements. "The president wants to listen. He wants to hear what the leaders on Capitol Hill think is the best way to go. He's not wed to any particular approach."

Political analysts said the outreach campaign is a sign that Bush may be willing to compromise to make progress on Social Security, an issue he has consistently identified as one of the top priorities for his second term. Weakened by low approval ratings, a chaotic and unpopular war in Iraq, and his party's loss of control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years, Bush may see Social Security as an issue on which he could score points before leaving office in 2009, analysts said.

Bush's former chief economic adviser, Lawrence B. Lindsey, added to that speculation on Monday, after writing in the Wall Street Journal that Bush "may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform." Specifically, Lindsey wrote, the administration might agree to lift the cap that limits Social Security payroll taxes to the first $90,000 of income, thereby raising total taxes, but not tax rates, for high-income workers.

"Bush has been on a losing streak. The question is: Is he going to attempt to save his legacy by giving the Democrats everything they want on Social Security and passing a big Social Security bill with his name on it?" said Kevin A. Hassett, director of economic policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute. "It could be that's what we're looking at next year."

While Paulson and Portman are talking about consensus, some Democrats worry that Bush is still determined to pursue the idea of private accounts. Many of them oppose such accounts on the grounds that they would weaken Social Security overall. That fear was fanned last week when Bush appointed Andrew G. Biggs, a proponent of Social Security privatization, to the agency that runs the program.

"This nomination of Biggs is very troublesome," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is in line to chair a House subcommittee on Social Security. "The president is sending signals that what he's really after is privatization. And that's just a non-starter."

Other Democrats want Bush to explicitly put taxes on the table, including elimination of some of his signature tax cuts, instead of focusing exclusively on restraining the escalating costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. The big three entitlement programs eat up 8 percent of the country's total economic output and are projected to double in cost over the next 50 years, creating a budget hole that must be shrunk by cutting benefits or filled by raising taxes.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who is to chair the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, had lunch last week with Paulson and said he came away impressed. The secretary, he said, is "a straight shooter" who agreed to attend a retreat that could take place as early as February where Ways and Means committee members will look for common ground with the administration on fiscal issues. But entitlement reform is unlikely to be part of those discussions, Rangel said.

"I don't know whether we're secure enough with each other to start on these very sensitive issues," he said.

Also yesterday, the White House released its final economic forecast before submitting its budget for fiscal 2008. In a conference call with reporters, Edward Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said Bush's top economic advisers, like many private forecasters, expect the economy to grow a bit more slowly next year, at an annual rate of 2.9 percent.

That would be a bit below the average growth rate of the past three years, when the economy grew at an annual rate of about 3.2 percent.

Compromised (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts.

That is why it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a "deal" on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked.

Doing so would raise the marginal tax rate on the entrepreneurs that Mr. Bush credits for having led the economic recovery by more than 10 percentage points. The new effective rate would be five percentage points above the level when he took office. Moreover, in 2011, the rate would go up a further 4.3 percentage points to an effective 53% marginal rate on entrepreneurial income. The president would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than that which prevailed in the Carter administration. Most of the improved incentives for entrepreneurship and work brought about under Reagan would be repealed.

Should the president do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system. Social Security was set up as a contributory pension plan, not a welfare scheme. Benefits are linked, by statutory formula, to contributions. Congress and the president could choose to maintain this relationship. Traditional supporters of Social Security like AARP have long insisted on this link and argued against turning the program into another welfare plan by ending the linkage between contributions and benefits.

There are two problems with that approach. First, an increase in the cap on taxes and benefits would produce very little net revenue for the system. Even if one assumed higher taxes did not hurt the economy, the increased benefits would consume much of any increased revenue. Second, the benefits that high income people would get would be politically unsustainable. A retiree who earned a million per year would receive a monthly Social Security benefit of $13,500. This is politically unimaginable. So, expect both the universality of Social Security and the link between taxes and benefits to go, and this most enduring element of the New Deal to become a welfare program.

But it is the damage to the economy and to the fiscal system that is more important. Economists differ on how much such a dramatic increase in tax rates on entrepreneurs would damage the economy. Certainly given the statements of the president earlier this year he believes it would be significant. Consider some figures.

Published IRS data from 2004 show that taxpayers with incomes over $100,000 earned $1.9 trillion in wages, salaries, bonuses and self-employment income. Of that, roughly $800 billion was above the Social Security maximum tax threshold. Levying the 12.4% Social Security tax on that income would produce $99 billion in revenue. Of that, employers and the self-employed would be able to deduct half of that tax from their corporate or personal tax returns. Thus, $17.4 billion of the $99 billion would not be a net gain to the Treasury, but a transfer from the general fund to the Social Security trust fund. So the net gain to the government would have been about $82 billion in 2004.

That assumes that taxpayers would not have changed their behavior when their marginal tax rate rose to 48.6% from 38.4%. No one believes that, although economists do disagree on how much. These are a very sophisticated group of taxpayers with both the knowledge and the means to adjust to taxation by changing the form of business, converting income to capital gains, or other methods. A cautious estimate that enjoys wide acceptance in the tax community says that for every 1% reduction in the share of their income they take home, high income individuals cut their taxable earnings by four-tenths of a percent. My own research from the Reagan tax cuts indicates the response by this group is higher, roughly seven-tenths of 1%.

Although these numbers may seem small, when they are applied to a massive tax rate increase like this, they can have important ramifications. Remember, taxpayers will be seeing the share of income they keep dropping from roughly 61 cents on the dollar to just 51 cents -- and that is before state taxes are figured in. This implies a decline in the tax base of between 7% and 13%.

Under the lower assumption, total federal revenues would only increase by $27 billion, with the behavioral response of taxpayers offsetting 70% of the static revenue increase. True, Social Security tax revenues would still rise by $82 billion, but this would be offset by a net decline in personal income taxes of $55 billion. Under the higher assumption about a behavioral response, total federal revenues would decline. While Social Security taxes would rise by $69 billion, personal income taxes would drop by $95 billion.

Whatever one's assumption, lifting the Social Security tax cap would have to be viewed as an economically and fiscally risky proposition. I seriously doubt that the president would be interested in agreeing to a deal that purports to "save Social Security" when the reality is that it seriously undermines the economic and fiscal basis that underpins the system.

There is another argument that the president will have heard that might persuade him to do what the rumors say he is considering: fairness. It is true that high income earners do not pay Social Security taxes on all of their earnings. As already noted, it is also true that they do not receive benefits on those earnings. So, if you think that Social Security should be a welfare program with benefits unlinked to contributions, then in a sense this may be unfair.

But, consider the total tax system. An urban myth has arisen that the so-called "rich" do not pay their "fair share" of taxes despite the fact that the top 10% of taxpayers pay 68% of federal income taxes in the country. A comparison between a relatively high-income entrepreneur, of which I am one, and a "typical" worker might be illustrative.

Last year an entrepreneur similar to me would have paid federal taxes equal to 33.9% of total income. That is, income before any exemptions, exclusions, adjustments or deductions. By this measure all of the fringe benefits that an entrepreneur provides himself as a self-employed individual are included in income. His federal income taxes and the employer and employee shares of his Social Security taxes are all counted as "taxes."

For comparison, consider a married worker earning a salary of $75,000, who like our entrepreneur, has three children. To compute his total income on the same basis, I gave him the same level of benefits as an average worker and the same level of capital income as others making his income. I also followed convention to impute to him both his own Social Security taxes and all of those paid by his employer. On that basis, his average tax rate was 14.5%.

Based on a 40-hour week, while he finishes paying his Federal taxes on Monday afternoon at 2:48, our entrepreneur will work all day Monday until about the same time on Tuesday until he finishes, another full day. If the plan to eliminate the cap on Social Security earnings is adopted, he will work all day Monday, all day Tuesday, and then Wednesday morning until 10:26 to finish paying his federal taxes. Then he can start paying his state taxes.

That assumes he keeps working as hard as he is and doesn't rearrange his income to take more fringe benefits or shelter it in other ways. This suggests another way to think about just how risky this plan is. Using those 2004 figures cited above, all it would take would be for one of these workers in ten to decide it wasn't worth it to work until 10:30 Wednesday morning just to pay Uncle Sam and this plan the president is reportedly considering would actually cost government tax revenue. Don't make it too tough on him, or Atlas may actually decide to shrug.

Will Bush Bargain To Save Social Security? (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush tried and failed to fix Social Security's long-term finances with his own party in control of Congress. His determination to keep trying, even as Democrats take over, is fueling speculation that he is ready to meet their price for coming to the bargaining table: dropping his goal of letting workers create private retirement accounts.

While Democrats don't take over the House and Senate until January, already some in both parties are reading tea leaves for signs of administration flexibility, including in recent remarks by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten.

Were the president to drop private accounts and call their bluff, Democrats would be challenged to make good on their professed willingness to help ensure Social Security's solvency.

Both sides acknowledge that a combination of reduced future benefits and higher revenues will be necessary eventually. As more Americans reach retirement age, Social Security will soon bring in fewer revenues from workers' payroll taxes than it sends out in benefit checks to retirees, workers' survivors and the disabled.

For Mr. Bush, private accounts are a way of reducing Social Security's future obligations, and central to his concept of an "ownership society" in which Americans rely less on government.

Democrats, along with the seniors group AARP, oppose personal accounts because they would initially require heavy government borrowing, and could leave future retirees at risk of market downturns.

Except for the Iraq war, perhaps no other issue so tests whether Democrats' capture of Capitol Hill in this month's midterm elections will cause Mr. Bush to alter what has been a largely partisan and uncompromising governing style. At the same time, any compromises cut with the Democratic majority are sure to cost Mr. Bush the support of many Republicans, especially in the House.

Publicly, the White House isn't budging. "Private accounts are part of our proposal and we're interested in having others put things on the table, not taking things off," says administration spokesman Dana Perino.

For those who nonetheless see a Bush concession ahead, perhaps the biggest reason is this: If Mr. Bush doesn't drop private accounts, it is virtually certain that nothing will happen on Social Security, the issue he has called the top domestic priority of his second term. Democrats say Mr. Bush also must finally spell out exactly what future benefit reductions or revenue increases he could support.

Another factor is the arrival of Mr. Paulson, who joined the Bush cabinet last summer. The former Goldman Sachs chief executive has said a priority will be tackling government spending for health care and Social Security -- "the biggest economic issue facing our country."

Democrats and Republicans agree that Mr. Paulson wouldn't have taken the Treasury post -- especially after Mr. Bush's previous two secretaries were routinely undercut by the White House -- without assurance that he would have significant influence.

Mr. Bush, in his press conference the day after Republicans lost their House and Senate majorities, said he had "instructed Secretary Paulson to reach out to folks on the Hill to see if we can't at least get a dialogue started" about Social Security and the other costly entitlement programs, Medicare and Medicaid. Last week, Mr. Paulson met at the Treasury with Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who will be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction for Social Security as well as tax and trade policies.

Mr. Rangel says the two had "a very good and very long" meeting but only discussed generalities. "I don't want to be the first one to say what's off the table, what's on the table," he adds.

Democratic Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, who will chair the Senate Finance Committee that handles Social Security, will amplify Democrats' opposition to private accounts when he has dinner with Mr. Paulson Dec. 5, an aide said.

This week, in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Mr. Paulson dodged a question about the Democrats' demand that the administration drop the private-accounts idea. "Only by taking a bipartisan approach, not conditioning the discussion" might an agreement be reached, he said.

Some listeners wondered whether Mr. Paulson was signaling administration willingness to quit prescribing the accounts. Administration officials privately said that wasn't the case. Still, a Treasury official said Mr. Paulson wants to approach the issue with an open mind and will suggest to lawmakers, "Why don't we start talking and see where we go, as opposed to prescribing things right away?"

Chief of Staff Bolten got a similar query about private accounts when he spoke last week before more than 100 people at a dinner of the board of the Brookings Institution, a policy think-tank. According to one attendee, Mr. Bolten "came as close as he could in a quasi-public setting to saying that carve-out accounts could be dropped if that were the price of reform." A second audience member supported that interpretation.

After his 2004 re-election, Mr. Bush spent much of 2005 campaigning nationwide for Congress to pass a law allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security payroll taxes to personal accounts. He argued that workers' investment earnings could offset the regular Social Security benefits they would agree to forego at retirement. Eventually Mr. Bush acknowledged that the accounts alone wouldn't make Social Security solvent, and that additional benefit reductions and perhaps tax changes would have to be made.

Republicans never attempted to write a bill. Without some Democrats' support, they wanted no part of acting alone to cut future benefits and raise taxes on upper-income workers, for fear they would lose their congressional majorities. They lost them anyway this month, as voters rebelled against corruption and partisanship, over-spending and the war in Iraq.

Messrs. Rangel and Baucus each tried to get Mr. Bush to drop private accounts in the past. Mr. Rangel tried at a White House encounter in April 2005. He said afterwards that Mr. Bush sternly replied, "I'm the president, and private accounts will stay on the table until I leave." Mr. Rangel said the president also predicted -- incorrectly, as it happened -- that Democrats would pay politically if they obstructed him.

As Premiums Rise, Social Security's Staffing Level To Be Tested (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Staffing problems at the Social Security Administration could make it difficult for field offices to handle increased telephone calls and visits prompted by an upcoming increase in Medicare premiums, according to the Government Accountability Office.

Social Security began mailing notices of the higher, income-based premiums on Monday and expects all 1.6 million affected enrollees to have them in hand by the end of next week. Enrollees may request a recalculation of their premium if they think incorrect tax data have been used to determine their income and set their premium, or if they have recently experienced an income loss from a spouse's death, a divorce or some other "life-changing event."

In a letter sent last week to the Senate Finance Committee, the GAO warned that Social Security is coping with staff shortages and operating under a hiring freeze just as the agency's workload is expected to jump because of the premium increases. The GAO, the congressional auditing agency, noted that the premium change, though approved by Congress in 2003, may come as a surprise to some beneficiaries.

Mark Lassiter, a Social Security spokesman, said the agency plans to shift workloads among field offices if some offices "are getting disproportionately hit" by telephone calls and visits from Medicare beneficiaries.

He expressed confidence that the agency's 1,300 field offices will be able to handle any surge in work. "We do the work we are assigned to get done," he said.

Congress changed how Medicare Part B premiums are calculated starting next year and reduced the government's contribution toward premiums for higher-income beneficiaries -- defined as individuals with incomes of more than $80,000 and married couples who file joint tax returns showing incomes of more than $160,000. In the past, premiums increased on a uniform basis, regardless of income.

Medicare Part B covers doctors' services, certain outpatient services and some home health care. Most people do not pay a Part A premium, which covers hospitalization, because they or a spouse have 40 or more quarters of Medicare-covered employment.

For 2007, a person with income of $80,000 or less and a married couple with income of $160,000 or less will pay $1,122 in annual Part B premiums.

Persons with incomes of $80,001 to $100,000 and couples with incomes of $160,001 to $200,000 will pay $1,269.60 in Part B premiums next year.

At the top of the scale, individuals with incomes of more than $200,000 and couples with incomes of more than $400,000 will pay $1,936.80 for Part B coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0097206

Premiums are set by the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, and the Social Security Administration is responsible for determining and assessing the Part B income-based premiums.

The GAO said implementing income-based premiums will cost Social Security an additional $200 million in administrative expenses between fiscal 2006 and 2010.

The extra work comes at a tough time for the agency. Social Security has adopted a hiring freeze because Congress has not been able to complete work on the agency's fiscal 2007 appropriations bill. Agency officials also have warned that it could be forced next year to send employees home without pay, perhaps for as long as 10 days, if Congress does not reverse proposed budget cuts.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Senate majority leader, said Republican leaders had informed Reid's office that the Senate will postpone work on appropriations bills until next year.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), the current majority leader, did not return a telephone call or e-mail inquiry.

If spending bills are put off until next year, Congress will have to pass another continuing resolution, or interim spending measure, to keep the government operating into 2007. The current CR expires Dec. 8.

Some cash-strapped agencies will probably have to petition Congress for adjustments in their spending levels before a long-term CR is adopted. Typically, interim funding measures finance agencies at their current level or at a lower level, depending on budget proposals pending in Congress.

"This guarantees there will be a tussle over funding levels," Manley said.Postal Talks to Continue

The U.S. Postal Service and its four largest unions have agreed to extend contract talks in an effort to reach negotiated settlements, postal spokesman Gerald J. McKiernan announced.

The contracts expired at midnight Monday, but their terms and conditions continue until new pacts take hold. More than 616,000 postal employees are covered by the contracts.

Dems Unlikely To Block Gates Nomination (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 22, 2006

When Robert Gates testifies before a Senate panel in two weeks, Democrats will voice their opposition to administration war policies and gauge Gates' willingness to change them. But they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary.

Democrats have begun lining up behind Gates, indicating they are inclined to vote for him if he meets two general criteria: He agrees a new approach in Iraq is needed and demonstrates he will hold sufficient political clout at the White House.

"We really do have to get a strong signal that he has been given a free hand to make whatever changes he thinks appropriate, and that within the administration he will have unimpeded access to the president," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., in an interview Tuesday. "Those things are critical to success."

The senators say they are not immediately opposing Gates largely because his confirmation would lead to the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief who led the U.S. invasion in Iraq and staunchly defended the war even as public approval plummeted.

The initial support of Bush's nominee comes even though Gates is the same man once accused of distorting intelligence for political reasons — a primary charge Democrats level against the Bush administration in the war in Iraq.

In 1991, 31 Democrats voted against confirming Gates as CIA director, citing charges he had pressured intelligence analysts to develop conclusions that fit President Reagan's policies and turned a blind eye to the Iran-Contra scandal, in which arms were sold to the Iranians and the cash used to supply the Nicaraguan Contra rebels.

Twelve of the senators who rejected Gates 15 years ago remain today, including Carl Levin, D-Mich., Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

Also not working in Gates' favor is a career built more on ending the Cold War than on Middle East expertise, and his lack of experience managing a budget and staff as large as the Pentagon's, the government's biggest.

But when Bush announced Gates' nomination on Nov. 8, Democrats began extending their support. Sens. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who will be majority leader next year, and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, who will head the panel that oversees the Pentagon's budget, said they hoped Gates was swiftly confirmed, while Biden said he was inclined to vote for him.

Reed and other Democrats say they will focus more of their attention on Gates' views of Iraq than his dealings in the intelligence.

"I will be watching the upcoming confirmation process very carefully to discern whether Mr. Gates has the capacity to both listen to and lead our military in a new direction," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.

Inouye, who with Sen. Ted Stevens met with Gates on Monday, said he had known Gates for at least 30 years and that he would vote for him as he did in 1991. He said he and Stevens, R-Alaska, top members of the defense appropriations subcommittee, used the meeting to assure Gates he would not play politics with military funding.

"I expect him to be confirmed," Inouye said.

Other Democrats — including Levin, who next year will chair the Armed Services Committee, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy — are holding their cards close on Gates but say they are eager to see if he is willing to advocate a new Iraq policy. Clinton, D-N.Y., and Kennedy, D-Mass., are expected to meet with Gates in the next few weeks.

"The one thing he has going for him ... is that we want the change to take place very quickly," said Reid. "So it's to our interest to have this change at the head of the Defense Department as soon as possible."

According to an AP-Ipsos poll released Tuesday, only 31 percent of Americans approve of Bush's handling of Iraq.

Democrats say they are impressed by Gates' willingness to work with their party. Gates is a member of the Aspen Strategy Group, a bipartisan group of former senior U.S. officials and policy experts who meet regularly to discuss international affairs. Also, before being nominated by Bush, Gates was a member of a high-profile bipartisan panel assessing options in Iraq.

Reed, a senior member of the Armed Services panel, on Tuesday called Gates a "realistic voice on foreign affairs and somebody who deliberately tries to draw upon a cross section of views." He said he also was impressed Gates was willing to step out of private life to take on the challenge of Iraq.

"Those are all good qualities. There's a huge task facing him," Reed said.

Norman Ornstein, a political scientist at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said he was not surprised. To oppose Gates or focus too much on his past at the CIA would be to pick the wrong battle with Bush if Democrats want Iraq policy to change, he said.

"I think they'll want to look forward," Ornstein said.

Draft Viewed As Impractical, Unnecessary (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

WASHINGTON — Turning conscripts into battle-ready troops would take a year or more in the unlikely event the government revived the draft, military experts say.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said this week that he will reintroduce a bill he sponsored in 2003 that would reinstate the military draft. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military leaders, however, oppose the plan and call a draft neither necessary nor practical. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi also said Monday that she opposes the plan.

Rangel doesn't expect Congress or President Bush to support reviving the draft, says Emile Milne, the congressman's spokesman. Instead, Rangel wants to spark a “discussion among the people who represent the American people here in Congress.”

If the draft resumed, draftees wouldn't join the military for at least six months. The nation's dormant draft law gives the Selective Service System 193 days to deliver the first inductees following the revival of conscription.

Fully training those troops would take months more. The Army starts with a nine-week basic training course that's followed by individual training that lasts another month for the infantry, two months for tank crews or three months for military police.

The nation has a much smaller military than in 1970, when the transition to an all-volunteer force began. Then, the United States had a population of 205 million and more than 3 million active-duty troops. Now, out of a population of about 300 million, there are fewer than 1.4 million active-duty troops.

A smaller military would have a harder time absorbing tens of thousands of new draftees, says Bernard Rostker, a former Pentagon personnel chief and Selective Service director.

"We don't have the training bases," says Rostker, now with the independent RAND Corp. think tank. "If you draft people, where are you going to put them?"

The military has closed or realigned dozens of military bases, including several training facilities, since 1988. It has also significantly reduced its number of overseas bases. A 1999 report concluded that the military would have to rebuild some buildings at dormant or realigned bases, but could train and field a force equivalent to the 1987 military with the bases it has. The military had about 2.2 million active-duty troops in 1987.

Rangel says a draft would ensure that families of all backgrounds and income levels share in the sacrifices that a war demands. Rostker disagrees. He says that because "there are a lot more poor people than rich people" in the country, the poor would still be disproportionately represented.

"I don't see how that would be considered equitable," Rostker says.

Volunteers are more reliable in combat, retired brigadier general Nick Halley says. He commanded a unit of mostly draftees as a young officer during the Vietnam War and a larger group of volunteers during Operation Desert Storm in 1991.

The troops in Vietnam were valiant, Halley says, but those in Desert Storm had better skills and motivation. "If the purpose of the military is combat readiness, the draft is not the way to do that."

Behind Talk Of A New Draft: Equity (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, November 22, 2006

The burden of war is never equitable.

Thousands of American troops have been killed and wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, and many thousands more will bring home at least some of that burden. But most Americans experience no direct or even indirect cost of a war soon to last longer than World War II.

Would reinstituting the military draft even things out, spreading the responsibility while influencing politicians to think twice before sending men and women into harm's way?

Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York thinks so. Challenging Iran and North Korea as well as increasing the US force level in Iraq to try to stem the heightened violence there can't be done without a draft, says Mr. Rangel, a Korean War combat vet. He has dusted off his proposal to bring back conscription, which was suspended in 1973.

Rangel's bill is unlikely to go far in Congress, where opposition reflects public opinion. But his proposal does raise important questions about how the armed forces are put together today and how the US military operates.

"I do think we need a draft," says Charles Moskos, military sociologist and professor emeritus at Northwestern University. "Our country is experiencing what I call 'patriotism lite.' Nobody's willing to sacrifice anything. We don't even have gas rationing. Congress votes to go to war, but won't send its own children. We don't have enough troops. We've used reservists and the National Guard in an unprecedented manner."

Then there's the element of economic and social privilege as relates to military service today, says Dr. Moskos. In his 1958 Princeton University class of 750 men, more than 400 served in the military, he says, including many who went on to distinguished careers in business, education, and government. In Princeton's most recent graduating class of about 1,100 men and women, nine entered the military.

"These are not by any means bottom-of-the-barrel soldiers today," says Moskos, who was drafted into the Army after graduation. "But they are working-class and lower-middle-class young men and women."

In congressional testimony last week Army Gen. John Abizaid, top commander of US forces in the Middle East, acknowledged that former Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki was right when he said at the beginning of the war that several hundred thousand troops would be needed to occupy Iraq. But General Abizaid also said that increasing troop levels in Iraq now, as Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona and others have called for, would put "a tremendous strain" on the military. Most military experts find no legitimate reason to bring back conscription.

"A draft would induct far more people than are needed by the military if it were universal, posing the question of what to do with all the surplus draftees - a million or so," says military analyst John Pike, director of globalsecurity.org. "It would be politically very disruptive if it were a lottery with only 1 in 10 getting called."

Even should there be a draft, it would take many months before new draftees could begin to fill the need in Iraq, says retired Army Col. Dan Smith, senior fellow at the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Quaker lobby in Washington.

First, there would be prolonged congressional debate, likely followed by legal challenges over exemptions and the general fairness of the system, says Colonel Smith, a West Point graduate and Vietnam War veteran. Then it would take more time to develop training programs and produce equipment.

"These are the practical constraints," he adds. "Sociologically, I don't think the country will stand for reinstituting the draft over a threat that is not mortal."

There are philosophical and ethical issues involved as well.

A draft "contradicts the principles of a free society by coercing people to fight for freedom," says Ivan Eland, national security analyst at the Independent Institute in Oakland, Calif. "Soldiers who want to be in the military do a better job than those who don't, and the military services know it."

As with Vietnam, public concern about the possibility of conscription is useful to those who oppose the Iraq war.

"It seems to me the issue is about making it more difficult for policymakers to use the military instrument without full support of the American public," says retired Air Force Col. Sam Gardiner.

Retired US Naval Reserve Capt. John Allen Williams agrees.

"Rangel's bringing it up for political reasons," says Dr. Williams, a professor of political science at Loyola University Chicago. "But you know what? He's right. If we have some mechanism that links the military to civilian society in a way that spreads the burden around when you use the military, it's less likely to be used. On the other hand, once it is used it's more likely to be used in a total way - people are going to want to get it over with."

Military sociologist Moskos's answer is a three-tier system of required public service for all young men and women: uniformed military service, homeland security jobs (guarding borders, ports, nuclear plants, and other sites), or civilian tasks such as teaching in poor neighborhoods and helping the elderly.

No school loans or other education benefits should be awarded unless the recipient serves in one of those three areas for a year or two, says Moskos.

Still, at this point in a drawn-out war with no clear light at the end of the political and military tunnel, a return to the draft seems unlikely.

"It is too late to win popular support for conscription," says Loren Thompson, a national security expert at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va. "The public has turned against the war. Proposing a draft now will simply hasten the collapse of domestic support for the war effort."

No Sugarcoating 'Hunger' (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

It's Thanksgiving, a week since the U.S. Department of Agriculture released its annual hunger -- er, food security -- report, and it's likely that a few folks in the department are ready for a holiday break.

For the first time, the USDA's annual report on Americans' access to food omitted the word "hunger" in describing the condition of 11 million people who at times can't afford to feed themselves. These people, among a group of 35 million who had trouble keeping food on the table at least part of last year, shall heretofore, according to the government, be described as experiencing "very low food security."

DOJ_NMG_0097210

That raised hackles on the Hill, where Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.) initiated a letter to the USDA signed by 64 lawmakers, all but one of them Democrats, asking to "better appreciate your response" to the following questions:

"1. Before making the decision to replace the term "hunger" with "very low food [security]," did USDA consider the possibility that this decision might influence key nutrition policy debates, media perception, and/or philanthropic efforts?

"2. If so, who did the Department speak with? Were any legislators, policy experts, or anti-hunger advocates involved in this decision?

"3. And if these parties were consulted, what were their recommendations?"

The letter was sent Monday, and the agency has not responded.

Mark Nord, a USDA sociologist and the lead author of the report, repeated this week that "hunger" is not a scientifically quantifiable term. He had made that contention earlier in a Washington Post article, saying that the word was removed after a panel of scientists recommended doing so.

Nord said that the Post story was too "tongue in cheek, given the gravity of the issue," and that it suggested the agency was unsympathetic.

Far from it, he said: "USDA has more money in food assistance than in farming and forestry programs combined."

John Brennan, spokesman for Bread for the World, an anti-hunger advocacy group, said: "It's an issue that a lot of politicians have paid lip service to, but now since it's come front and center . . . it's an issue they're starting to embrace."

Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.), co-chairman of the Congressional Hunger Caucus and a signer of the letter to the USDA, said that especially in countries such as the United States, which grows more food than it needs, "hunger is a political condition." Calling hunger by any other name "makes it more difficult to get that political will and to get the action you need to deal with the issue," he said.

Nord has denied that removing the word from the report was a political act.

HHS Nominee Has Prescribed Birth Control (WP)

By Christopher Lee

Despite his work for a Christian pregnancy counseling group that opposes contraception, the physician who yesterday began overseeing federal family-planning programs has prescribed birth control for his patients, a Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman said.

Eric Keroack, a nationally known advocate of abstinence until marriage, served for more than a decade as medical director for A Woman's Concern, a Massachusetts nonprofit group that discourages abortion and does not distribute information promoting birth control. But HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday that most of Keroack's professional time had been devoted to his private practice of 20 years, not the group.

"When he was in private practice as a doctor, he did prescribe birth control," Pearson said. "And he did family planning with patients at their request as part of his private physician role." She said Keroack has prescribed contraceptives for both married and unmarried women.

Democrats and family-planning advocates have panned the Bush administration's selection of Keroack to oversee HHS's $283 million reproductive-health program and a $30 million program that encourages abstinence among teenagers because of his work with A Woman's Concern.

They said that Keroack is a poor choice to lead HHS's Office of Population Affairs, which funds birth control, pregnancy tests, counseling and screenings for sexually transmitted disease and HIV. Fourteen Democratic senators sent a letter yesterday urging HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt to withdraw Keroack's appointment. Seven House Democrats issued a similar call Monday. The job does not require Senate confirmation.

"Unfortunately, this appointment is another example of the administration allowing ideology to trump science, and it could jeopardize vital services on which large numbers of women and families depend," the letter said. Signers included incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who will be chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

Jackie Payne, director of government relations for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said Keroack's record opposing birth control speaks for itself.

"The fact that he's the medical director of an organization that takes that position is, at best, hypocritical if he's doing something different in private practice," she said. "That's not the kind of advocate for birth control that we need. We need someone to head up the family-planning program who is wholeheartedly for family planning."

Pearson also acknowledged yesterday that Keroack is not currently certified as an obstetrician-gynecologist. That is not a requirement for the job, but HHS officials had cited Keroack's expertise in defending his selection.

Keroack was certified by the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology in 1995, but that credential expired after 10 years.

"He inadvertently missed the recertification deadline and for 2006 is listed as board-eligible, meaning he is eligible to take the recertification exam," Pearson said. "He plans to seek recertification in the future."

Advocates Expect Democrats To Avoid Culture Wars (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Advocates for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights say they are thrilled by the Democratic takeover of Congress. Even so, they admit their issues aren't likely to be addressed early — or at all — during the legislative session that begins in January.

"I'm aware of political reality when you're coming up to a presidential election," says Caroline Fredrickson, Washington legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union. "I'm afraid (Democrats will) be a little too cautious."

Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who headed the Democratic campaign committee and is part of the leadership team setting the agenda for the upcoming term, says his party was "very clear" on its priorities: The Iraq war, ethics reform, health care, jobs and other economic concerns will come first.

That's not likely to deter liberal bloggers and groups such as MoveOn.org, says University of California-Berkeley political scientist Bruce Cain. Those groups will "keep the heat on," Cain says. He predicts they'll have little success. "The Democratic leadership will completely stifle" debate on issues that could hurt chances to retain the majority or take the White House in 2008, he says.

Vanderbilt University political scientist Bruce Oppenheimer agrees. "I do not expect either the Democratic House or Senate leadership to bring up things that are going to force members to take tough votes."

Many Democrats still recall 1993, when Bill Clinton, the first Democratic president in 12 years, tried to make good on a campaign vow to allow gays to serve openly in the military. Republicans seized upon the issue, forcing Clinton's compromise, the "don't ask, don't tell" policy. The next year, Republicans gained control of Congress for the first time in 40 years.

Among the liberal causes likely on hold:

•Abortion rights. Although she picked up 22 allies in the House and three in the Senate, Nancy Keenan of NARAL Pro-Choice America says federal efforts to reduce unintended pregnancies by promoting sex education and making contraceptives more available must wait. "We have some bigger issues to be dealt with early on," she says.

•Gun control: Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, says he has seen a list of the top 100 Democratic priorities; reinstating the now-expired ban on military-style assault weapons is "in the 90s." At least, he says, conservatives can't weaken gun-control laws.

•Gay rights. David Smith of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group, expects Democrats to push legislation to bar workplace discrimination against gays and amend the federal hate crimes law to include sexual orientation. Still, he says, those changes won't come until "much later" in the session.

"If champagne corks are popping from our perspective, it's because we're not going to be attacked," Smith says. Otherwise, "it's a much more measured can of Budweiser that's being popped."

Dodd's Balancing Act To Get Tougher (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

DOJ_NMG_0097212

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21—As Senator Christopher J. Dodd prepares to take over the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee while also considering a run for the presidency, lobbyists and lawmakers are all asking the same question.

"Does he become a populist champion on issues that broadly affect the middle class" asked Travis B. Plunkett, the legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, "or does he shrink from controversial issues that offend huge donors?"

It is a question facing not only Mr. Dodd, but the Democratic Party more generally as it assumes control of Congress.

In his case, Mr. Dodd has shown through a 25-year record in the Senate that he is adept at going both ways. He has, at various times, broken with big corporate interests in support of a principle. At other times, he has broken ranks with his more liberal party peers to advance causes associated with corporate patrons.

Mr. Dodd takes the gavel at a pivotal moment.

As Enron and WorldCom fade from the news, some of his constituents are seeking to water down the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002 to strengthen the role of corporate gatekeepers in response to a wave of scandals.

The accounting firms have been asking for limits on their legal liability. Large companies are battling against renewed attempts to give shareholders a greater say in corporate affairs and to ward off efforts to curtail high executive pay packages. Hedge funds are resisting calls for greater regulation and transparency.

How Mr. Dodd balances the competing interests of corporations and financial institutions with those of investors will define his chairmanship.

In a recent interview, Mr. Dodd said that he had hoped to be seen as unpredictably independent and willing to listen to both corporate interests and consumers.

Sounding as much like a presidential candidate as a new committee chairman, he said he planned to broaden the agenda of the committee. He proposes to look at issues of national security, including the way the administration reviews foreign investment in vital American companies, and prosperity, by examining everything from affordable housing to the loss of manufacturing jobs in the United States.

He also laid down some early markers for the new legislative session. He said he was satisfied with Sarbanes-Oxley, which he played a significant role in drafting. He said he had not yet reached the same conclusions as the Bush administration and some Democrats that the law, combined with excessive litigation, had driven companies to issue stock in overseas markets instead of on Wall Street.

"I'm open to listening," he said. "But if I get a sense that these new proposals are going to weaken transparency and stability and the competence in the system, then I'm going to be resistant."

A liberal Democrat on many social and foreign policy issues, Mr. Dodd, who is 62 and is the senior senator from Connecticut, has had a reputation for using his skills as a legislative deal maker to benefit many of America's most powerful corporate interests, who also happen to be from his home state. They include the insurers, accounting firms, hedge funds and military contractors that are responsible for making Connecticut the state with the highest per capita income in the nation.

The companies have returned the support, pouring millions of dollars into campaigns that have repeatedly returned Mr. Dodd to Washington, the last two times beating opponents by margins of greater than two to one. Over the last 20 years, he has received millions of dollars from Wall Street, the insurance industry and the largest accounting firms. But he has also taken on large corporate interests.

Mr. Dodd worked closely with consumer groups to battle the large banks and credit card companies in their ultimately successful attempt to overhaul the bankruptcy system. While Mr. Dodd and his allies failed to block the legislation, they managed to delay its passage by nearly a decade and to water down some of provisions that were especially tough on debtors.

"There was no payoff for opposing all of the bankruptcy amendments and in fact all of the money was on the other side and there was plenty of political cover to vote for them," recalled Professor Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School, a bankruptcy expert who fought the measure. "But Dodd led the push on the other side. He had an abiding interest in the gritty details of the financial instruments that slowly drive money out of the pockets of middle-class families."

In a more recent fight, Mr. Dodd and the consumer groups have promoted a measure to curtail high credit card fees. At a hearing this year, he said that credit cards increasingly were little more than "pocket-sized predatory loans" and he has proposed legislation that would curtail the ability of the companies to market credit cards to students who are not able to afford debt.

On the other hand, Mr. Dodd was on the opposite side from against consumer groups in the 1990s when he sponsored legislation that made it more difficult for investors' lawyers to sue corporations. In that fight, he also broke ranks with many Democrats, including President Bill Clinton, who vetoed the legislation but then did nothing to stop Mr. Dodd from marshaling enough votes to override the veto.

More recently, Mr. Dodd and consumer groups were at odds over a plan supported by the insurance industry to extend a federal terrorism insurance program.

More often than not, Senator Dodd is known for being effective.

"He's been a consumer champion on some issues and opposed to us on some issues," Mr. Plunkett said. "He is extremely effective, so you always want him on your side. When we see he is going to be in the opposition, we definitely wince."

More than a week after the election, Mr. Dodd still seemed surprised that the Democrats had recaptured the Senate and was just beginning to figure out in what direction he hoped to take the committee.

Mr. Dodd, who has formed a presidential exploratory committee and will decide early next year whether to enter the race formally, said a candidacy would help get him out of Washington to hear the views of a wider variety of people. "One of the advantages, if I do this, is that I know who I am," he said. "And I'm not going through some metamorphosis here. This is not a warm-up for something. For me to go around and become someone I'm not would be ridiculous on its face. I wouldn't be comfortable with it anyway."

He said he prided himself on not always taking positions that sided with either business or the consumer.

"We spent a lot of time on the credit card issue from a consumer perspective," he said. "Obviously I've got to pay attention to the provider side. I saw an article describing me and that said I wasn't allergic to business. That's true.

"I've got business interests I've got to pay attention to," he added. "But I also want to make sure that, in the process of doing so, that we recognize there is a consumer at the end of that product."

He said he wants to always be known for "maintaining independence in terms of approach."

"I don't ever want to be a predictable member of that committee," he said, "to be branded somehow, one way or the other, but to be fair and open and listen to arguments."

His support of his home state industries is hardly reflexive. Some of the biggest insurers in his state, for instance, have been lobbying hard for legislation that would permit them to be regulated by Washington instead of the states. But Mr. Dodd has not signed on. He said he was not convinced that Washington could do a better job than state commissioners had been doing.

"Dodd has been a question mark on the proposal," said Frank Keating, the former governor of Oklahoma who is the president of the American Council of Life Insurers. He said the issue of a federal charter for insurers is the single biggest one for the industry. "He has always been very open minded and a fair broker on the issues," Mr. Keating added. "But he's also a tough and questioning legislator."

Mr. Dodd's ascension to the committee chair comes at a moment of transition for the banking panel.

Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, the cerebral senior Democrat of the committee who was the most important lawmaker behind the landmark legislation that is named after him, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, is retiring. So is Mr. Sarbanes's top adviser, Steven B. Harris, who has been a senior Democratic aide to the committee for 20 years, and is widely credited with stewarding the legislation through Congress.

Mr. Dodd will oversee a committee loaded with both Democratic and Republican lawmakers who have also raised millions of dollars and supported the causes of the big banks, Wall Street and the major insurance companies. Some members have begun to publicly question important parts of the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

And the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, Barney Frank of Massachusetts, has said that he thinks regulators can make adjustments to the law so that it is less burdensome on small business.

Mr. Dodd's own imprint was on that law. Months before Mr. Sarbanes filed the legislation, Mr. Dodd and a Democratic colleague from the committee, Senator Jon Corzine of New Jersey (now New Jersey's governor), outlined their ideas for legislation over lunch, as Mr. Dodd describes it, "on a napkin in a Senate cafeteria."

"I came away thinking we'll plant a flag," Mr. Dodd recalled. Their proposal, to restrict accountants from offering both auditing and consulting work at the same companies, became a cornerstone of the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

Mr. Dodd said Sarbanes-Oxley had gone far to promote better corporate governance and transparency.

"I've always felt that the most important thing you have to worry about is investor confidence," he said. "I have no obligation whatsoever to guarantee that you're going to make sure that you are going to make money on your investment. But I feel a very strong obligation," he added, that "you didn't lose it because the system broke down. That to me is going to be very important when I listen to these arguments."

Spoils Of Prime Office Space Go To Democrats (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — Forget those pesky leadership fights. The folks who run Congress are now getting down to what really matters on Capitol Hill: dividing up the office space.

In something of a break with recent tradition, the incoming Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, is planning to expropriate the second-floor suite of offices now occupied by the current speaker, J. Dennis Hastert — a handful of rooms providing a spectacular view of the Mall.

That space has been in Republican hands for 50 years or so, even when Democrats were in charge. In fact, the main offices are so strongly associated with Republicans that they were officially designated the Robert H. Michel Rooms by the House in 1995 in honor of the popular former Republican leader.

While there might be some private grumbling by Republicans about the Democratic land grab, even Mr. Michel sees nothing wrong with Ms. Pelosi wanting to move into his namesake space.

"The speaker is the speaker," Mr. Michel said in an interview. "They reign supreme over on the House side, and they can pretty much do anything they want to."

While Democrats are moving up, Republicans are downsizing, abandoning their preferred spots and planning to squeeze into the current, tighter digs of the Democrats.

Even as Republicans were voting last week on their new leaders, a couple of top staff members from the office of the current majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, just happened to stop by Ms. Pelosi's office to visit with some Democratic friends — and take a peek at their likely new quarters. Mr. Boehner will be minority leader when the new Congress convenes in January.

And on Monday, the new Democratic majority leader, Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, toured Mr. Boehner's present offices on the first floor of the Capitol to see where his furniture might go. Note to President Bush: No word on whether any drapes were measured.

Vice President Dick Cheney might also come out a loser in this literal floor fight. Democrats have an eye on an office on the House side that Republicans granted to him as a kind of second home in the Capitol, to complement his office on the other wing of the building, where, by virtue of the Constitution, he presides over the Senate (he has no formal role in the House). Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, is interested in reclaiming Mr. Cheney's House space for the Ways and Means Committee.

Given the finite amount of space in the landmark building and the natural competitiveness of politicians, office space has always been currency in the Capitol. Lawmakers leverage their majority and seniority for the top views, the most convenience and suitably impressive surroundings to dazzle their constituents, supporters and even themselves. To many members of Congress and their equally status-conscious staffs, you are where you sit.

To Democrats, one of the chief fringe benefits of the coming takeover is that they will no longer be at the logistical mercy of Republicans. In fact, one of Ms. Pelosi's best applause lines during last week's leadership elections was when she raised the subject of a room for future Democratic meetings. "We can have any room we want now," she told her approving colleagues.

Even as it became apparent that Democrats could regain the majority, Republicans were starting to wonder if Ms. Pelosi might be interested in the speaker's rooms. On Monday she toured the offices that Mr. Hastert has called home, and aides said she was inclined to grab them.

Democratic aides say it is mainly a matter of needing more space, especially since the construction of a visitors' center on the east front of the Capitol cut into current Democratic space, including the offices that had been the center of House power when Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. ruled. Democratic leadership aides are scattered around the building, including a makeshift office in a renovated part of what had been the members' dining room.

"We have offices tucked away on four different floors," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Ms. Pelosi, who said the new offices would allow the staff to be consolidated.

But there are other perquisites. The office now occupied by Mr. Hastert faces the Mall and comes with a balcony that has been the scene of many a reception, staff party and occasional marriage proposal while providing great viewing of the Fourth of July fireworks.

Mr. Michel said the offices came under a long-term Republican lease back in the mid-1950s when Sam Rayburn of Texas decided that his Republican counterpart, Joseph Martin of Massachusetts, could stay there after he was ousted as speaker when Democrats regained control.

"When I first got elected in 1956, I went in to see Joe, and it was in one of those little anterooms," said Mr. Michel, who would later occupy the offices for 14 years.

Despite the appeal of the suite, Democrats in those days preferred their rooms along the East Front, closer to the House floor and the better to keep an eye on things before the days of C-Span and instant messaging. After Mr. Martin and before Mr. Michel, the rooms also housed the operations of the Republican leaders Charles Halleck, Gerald R. Ford and John Rhodes.

Republicans were surprised when Democrats did not eventually try to reclaim the offices, particularly when Thomas S. Foley became speaker in 1989. But he decided to stay in the offices he had had redecorated while he served as Democratic majority leader.

Then, when Republicans swept to control in 1994, the offices became the speaker's. Ms. Pelosi appears to believe they should remain that way. And several Republicans said they did not begrudge her the right.

"I am an old-fashioned guy and believe the spoils go to the victor if she wants it," said Representative Jack Kingston, Republican of Georgia.

The election did not set off the same office go-round in the Senate; the leaders there tend to retain their offices no matter which party is in charge.

In the House, the departure of lawmakers also set off a lottery for new quarters for their home-state Congressional offices in the adjacent office buildings. Even veteran lawmakers sought to upgrade their suites.

In fact, Ms. Pelosi received a new office there as well, taking the space to be vacated by Mr. Hastert's Illinois Congressional office when the outgoing speaker decided he needed more room since he would no longer have any in the Capitol.

Financial Crimes Chief Leaving Treasury (AP-Y)

The chief of a federal agency that plays a key role in trying to catch terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals is stepping down at the end of this year.

Robert Werner, director of the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, will take a job with Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc., the department announced Tuesday.

Werner, who took the helm of the network, known as FinCen, in March, also had served as director of the department's Office of Foreign Assets Control, which administers and enforces economic sanctions and is another important player in the administration's efforts to financially paralyze those who bankroll terrorist activities.

FinCen's deputy director, William Baity, will serve as acting director once Werner leaves.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Werner's leadership at FinCen "has paved new inroads in partnering with the financial community to safeguard against financial crime while promoting the free flow of capital."

A flap ensued earlier this year over a once-secret program the department uses to try to thwart suspected terrorist financiers. The administration insisted that news organizations' disclosure of the program, which gives the government access to a vast data base of international financial records, would hobble its efforts to catch terrorist financiers in the future. The program also stirred some concerns over privacy matters.

Senate Seeks Medicaid Review (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Senate Finance Committee is seeking a review of the District's Medicaid program, citing a "troubling" recent city audit of patient transport and reports of questionable billing.

In addition, the D.C. Office of the Inspector General is conducting two audits of the city's Medicaid transportation program -- one examining the background of providers and the other focusing on the legitimacy of claims being submitted by transport companies.

The federal and local scrutiny of the District's Medicaid transportation program follows a report last month in The Washington Times that noted long-standing lapses and concerns about the program.

Sens. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Max Baucus of Montana, the panel's ranking Democrat, sent a letter Friday to D.C. Inspector General Charles Willoughby seeking a confidential briefing on efforts to probe city Medicaid costs.

The letter cites a recent report by Mr. Willoughby's office that found the city's Medicaid transportation program had "a serious breach of basic internal controls."

Mr. Grassley and Mr. Baucus said transportation costs "are often overlooked and represent a major opportunity for abuse."

The letter also expressed concern about reports of transportation providers billing services to patients who were dead when the claims were submitted.

The Times first reported that neither the D.C. Department of Health, which oversees Medicaid, nor the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Commission, which licenses motor carriers, had conducted background checks of company officials in recent years.

A review of court records and other official documents of transportation companies on the D.C. Medicaid provider directory found company officials with criminal histories and others with numerous driving violations.

Last year, the District spent $22.3 million for nonemergency transportation of Medicaid patients -- slightly more than what the city paid for patients to see individual doctors, according to city records.

D.C. Council member David A. Catania, an at-large independent who has held hearings on the transportation problems, yesterday said that he's satisfied reforms are under way.

"I'm delighted we've taken the steps we've taken so that when this sit-down happens between our inspector general's office and the congressional representatives, they're going to be very impressed with some of the steps we've taken," said Mr. Catania, who has headed the council's health committee.

Medicaid, which provides health insurance for the poor, is funded by the federal government and the states, which also manage their programs.

An official with the D.C. Office of Inspector General yesterday said the office will meet with the Senate Finance Committee by the end of the month.

The Finance Committee letter requests updates on "all ongoing audits, evaluations and investigations that examine the Medicaid program in the District of Columbia."

The letter from Mr. Grassley and Mr. Baucus was similar to one the Finance Committee leaders also sent to the inspector general for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

DOJ_NMG_0097217

The federal government's watchdog on public health spending is conducting a nationwide review of Medicaid transportation costs.

According to its recently released 2007 audit plan, nonemergency transportation costs rose nationally by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion.

What's more, the Washington-based Community Transportation Association of America says the District trailed only Alaska in how much it has paid for transporting Medicaid patients.

Alaska encompasses more than 581,000 square miles; the District, 63 square miles. Commercial airfares account for more than 90 percent of Alaska's Medicaid transportation costs, while the District relies on a fleet of private van carriers, according to records.

The District pays companies up to $140 per trip. By comparison, a cab ride across the city would cost about $40, plus tip.

The Senate committee letter says previous federal audits have found numerous shortcomings with nonemergency transportation, including "unnecessary trips and excessive claims as well as billing Medicaid for trips never provided."

D.C. officials say they are now conducting background checks of providers.

Mr. Catania said that Robert Maruca, deputy director of the Medical Assistance Administration, has done "extraordinary work" in outlining new measures, including steps to ensure all trips are medically necessary.

"Everyone was disappointed that the controls did not exist and that money was lost and stolen," Mr. Catania said. "But going forward, I think we'll see a dramatic reduction in the fraud and abuse in the program."

IBM, Cray Win Pentagon Funds To Develop Next Supercomputers (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

A Pentagon research agency announced plans to spend nearly $500 million to develop next-generation supercomputers, funding ambitious design efforts at Cray Inc. and International Business Machines Corp.

The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency said it will award Cray $250 million and IBM $244 million under a new phase of a long-running development program, which hopes to create not only major advances in hardware but also new ways to program massive scientific machines.

Supercomputers have long been purchased by the government to handle complex computing chores, from cracking codes to calculating the trajectories of missile flights. The size of Darpa's research grants is unprecedented, IBM and Cray officials said, reflecting a determination to ensure the U.S. remains in the forefront of the field.

The contract award is particularly significant for Cray, a supercomputer specialist that reported total revenue in 2005 of about $201 million. Cray's Darpa proposal is based on a concept that it calls "adaptive" supercomputing, which involves creating a system with thousands of microprocessor chips of several different kinds that can be simply programmed with a single technique. "It's incredibly difficult to do," said Jan Silverman, a Cray senior vice president.

IBM plans to develop a system around the next generation of its Power chip line, along with a series of its own technologies to make programmers more productive. "This is not a project to serve a single customer or solve a single mission. It's an investment to significantly increase to total use of high-performance computing," said Dave Turek, who holds the title of vice president of "deep computing" at IBM.

An IBM system at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory is currently the world's fastest, operating at a maximum speed of about 360 trillion calculations a second -- or "teraflops," in industry parlance. The Darpa program is aimed at developing machines that operate at two to four "petaflops," or quadrillion operations a second, with prototype systems expected by 2010.

The one company left out by Darpa is Sun Microsystems Inc., which took part in earlier phases of the program with Cray and IBM. A Sun spokeswoman said the company had nonetheless benefited by the effort so far, developing technologies it will use in commercial systems.

Husband Of Trade Representative Dies (AP-Y)

AP, November 22, 2006

Curtis Carroll, husband of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, has died, Schwab's office announced Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0097218

Carroll, a professional magician, died Monday of kidney and liver failure, Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer said.

Schwab, former dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy, became President Bush's chief trade negotiator in June, succeeding Rob Portman, who was tapped to become White House budget director.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau will represent Schwab on Wednesday at the signing ceremony for a free trade agreement with Colombia, Spicer said.

Spellings Finishes 2nd On 'Jeopardy' (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says she studied hard to prepare for Tuesday night's airing of "Celebrity Jeopardy!"

"I didn't want to be the education secretary who didn't know how to spell potato," Spellings joked, describing how she read books and sought advice from a former show contender and her daughters.

In the end, Spellings said she thinks the effort was worth it. She came in second behind the actor Michael McKean, best known for his role as 'Lenny' on the television show "Laverne and Shirley" and for the movie "This Is Spinal Tap."

Placing third was actor Hill Harper, from the television show "CSI: NY."

"I think I held my own," Spellings said in an interview Tuesday, hours before the show aired. She noted McKean had an edge, having been on the show before.

Spellings was the first Cabinet secretary ever to appear on the popular quiz show. She said she'd like to return for another try.

She said she didn't realize how much skill went into hitting the buzzer at just the right moment after host Alex Trebek read a clue. She said she often hit it too early and as a result didn't get picked to tackle a category.

Spellings' strong subjects included international language and business.

She was asked to appear after the show's producer read a magazine article in which Spellings said she was a "Jeopardy!" fan.

Each celebrity earns at least $25,000 for the charity of his or her choice, and the winner gets $50,000 for a charity.

Spellings' winnings from the show, taped in New York last month, went to ProLiteracy Worldwide _ an international literacy organization.

Trebek said "Jeopardy!" picked the charity for Spellings to comply with government ethics rules.

The Admiral Charts An Unknown Course (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

It's a timeless scene: The old salt talking to youngsters, laying out his views about the lessons of war, about its cost and its sacrifices.

In this case, the salt is retired Adm. William J. Crowe Jr., who at 81, with hearing aids and stooped shoulders, is passing along his sea of wisdom to a classful of intense and intrigued midshipmen at the U.S. Naval Academy.

But rather than telling the class that he has all the answers, Crowe says, "I don't know the answer about how to get out of Iraq."

He does have some notions on how to avoid getting into another Iraq-like complication. Amid a growing chorus of antiwar pronouncements from the left and the right, presidential acknowledgment that the war is not going well, a pending report from the Iraq Study Group and a major Pentagon review, Crowe believes it's the perfect moment to craft guidelines that might be used the next time around.

Getting into just about everything -- from sports cars to marriages -- is easier than getting out of them. And Crowe (rhymes with wow), who has been teaching in the academy's political science department since 1999, hopes to engender a sense of caution and reason in the next generation of commanders and help keep the United States from entering unjust -- and unjustified -- interventions.

He knows something about military leadership. A 1946 graduate of the academy, he rose to the top shelf of service in the Navy. In the early 1980s, he was commander in chief of Allied Forces Southern Europe, then of the U.S. Pacific Command. From 1985 to 1989, he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff -- under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush. He retired in 1989. He says he is politically independent. He supported John Kerry in 2004.

His eyes are a wintry blue. His mind keen and quick. Distinguished in a green tweed jacket and gold-rims worn low on the nose, he is teaching "Security Decision Making," a popular upper-level seminar. It's a small class today -- 10 men and women are gathered around a table in a drab, windowless room in the Nimitz building on the waterfront campus in Annapolis.

His concern, he tells the students in their dark uniforms, "is what we are going to do in the future, when you people are going to be involved."

In most international rivalries, he says in a soft voice, "the supporting arguments of both sides normally have merits and flaws."

The factions are "driven by history and intense emotions and reason has little to do with resolving such issues."

But, Crowe believes that reason should have a lot to do with such issues. When a nation steps into another country's affairs, he says, there is a price to pay. "Bending another culture to your will can't be done on the cheap. Our resources are not unlimited and we should not be led to believe otherwise."

Every administration "underestimates the cost in time, money and casualties," Crowe says. "Voters should be die-hard cynics when evaluating such predictions."

In order for international interventions "to be successful in a reasonable amount of time, the whole republic should be involved," he says. "We may be dealing with small countries, but to them the stakes are big time and they are willing to make astounding sacrifices."

It's an idealistic approach. But he also knows he is preaching to idealists.

Michael Deboer, 24, of Cleveland, will be graduating in the spring. He hopes to be working on a submarine -- as Crowe once did -- in a couple of years. Deboer says Crowe has taught him that "interventions don't always go the way planners planned."

Deboer says, "I'm a detail-driven guy. He makes you look at the bigger issues."

Crowe "rewards careful thinking," says junior Fiona McFarland, 21, of New York. McFarland's mother, Kathleen Troia "KT" McFarland, was a Pentagon spokeswoman under Reagan and recently ran unsuccessfully as a Republican candidate for the Senate. Fiona McFarland wants to be a pilot. "He loves it when we take opposing sides," she says of Crowe. "He gets a little grin and a glint in his eye."

Next Phase Of White House Communications System To Begin (GCN)

By Nick Wakeman

Government Computer News, November 22, 2006

The completion of the transition of the White House's external communications system to an Internet protocol-based infrastructure will be done by General Dynamics Corp.'s IT business.

Under a $7 million contract from the White House Communications Agency, General Dynamics of Falls Church, Va., will use a Synchronous Optical Network backbone for connections between the White House and the outside world.

General Dynamics has been working with the White House Communications Agency for more than four years on various communications projects doing analysis, design and infrastructure upgrade work, said company spokesman Mark Meudt.

"This is just the next phase of that work," he said.

The work at the White House, including the most recent win, has been under contracts awarded by the Army Information Systems Engineering Command, which is tasked with supporting the White House Communications Agency, Meudt said.

"The communications capabilities for the White House must sustain critical day-to-day and crisis operations communications without fail," said Zannie Smith, senior vice president of Army solutions for General Dynamics IT, in a statement.

The White House Communications Agency provides the systems for the president, vice president, presidential emissaries, White House staffers and Secret Service. The systems include audiovisual, voice and data capabilities. The White House Communications Agency also supports the president when he travels.

House Staff Member Cleared In Inquiry On Leak Of Iraq Intelligence Estimate (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — A Democratic staff member of the House intelligence committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, committee officials said Tuesday.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff are analyzing the midterm elections and looking ahead to 2008.

More Politics NewsThe staff member, Larry Hanauer, was suspended last month from access to classified materials at the direction of the committee's chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan.

Mr. Hoekstra said at the time that he thought Mr. Hanauer might have been a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Mr. Hanauer had obtained a copy of the classified study at the request of a Democratic panel member, Representative John F. Tierney of Massachusetts, shortly before it was described in the article.

Democrats on the committee protested that the accusation was groundless and unfair and that Mr. Hanauer had merely properly responded to a routine request from a member.

They said Mr. Hoekstra's action was payback for a decision by the committee's ranking Democrat, Representative Jane Harman of California, to release a report by an outside counsel into actions on the committee by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican now serving a prison term for taking bribes.

A spokesman for the panel, Jamal D. Ware, confirmed that "the suspended staff member has had his accesses restored at the committee," a development first reported on Tuesday by The Washington Post.

A Congressional official who insisted on anonymity said the internal inquiry, conducted by committee lawyers, involved having Mr. Hanauer sign an affidavit and answer questions.

In a statement, Ms. Harman said, "All of us are pleased that our valued staff member is back at work and that this meritless inquiry is over."

Mr. Hanauer's lawyer, Jonathan Turley, said Mr. Hanauer had been vilified on the Web and by anonymous callers, some of whom threatened him, called him a traitor and said he should face a firing squad.

"We are grateful that this long nightmare for Larry and his family is now over," Mr. Turley said. "It is regrettable that it took this long, given the total absence of any evidence linking Larry to the New York Times articles."

The Times had previously reported that its article was based on interviews with more than 10 government officials and outside specialists.

Clothes No Longer Make Just The Man (AP-Y)

By Jocelyn Noveck

AP, November 22, 2006

"The emperor has no clothes," House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi once famously said about President Bush.

Well, actually he has some fairly decent ones, but it's been Pelosi's clothes — stylish, well-chosen and nicely cut, of the Armani variety — that have garnered attention since she became the most powerful woman in American politics earlier this month.

Why do we focus on Pelosi's clothes and not those of our president, or any male in Washington? Is it inherently sexist, detracting attention from her obvious accomplishments? Or is it merely a reflection of the obvious truth that, while clothes matter for both men and women, female attire is more noticeable, more expressive and more interesting?

It's an easier call when the fashion verdict is negative. Then, it can seem cruel: Recall the harsh response to Bush's one-time Supreme Court nominee Harriet E. Miers, whose attire, accessories and makeup were excoriated in the media. If she'd been a man and her standard navy blue suits were a bit dowdy, one can imagine, no ink would have been wasted.

One person who finds attention to Pelosi's clothes "over the top" is Eleanor Smeal, one of the country's most recognizable feminists.

"Yes, she dresses impeccably and wears clothes beautifully," says Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation. "But this is a very accomplished woman. Why wasn't there more attention to her achievement of breaking through the marble ceiling (and becoming the first female Speaker in history)? They're trying to keep us on the style pages, the old-fashioned way."

But there is one positive aspect to the attention, Smeal says: "At least it's introducing the speaker to the country. Imagine if they DIDN'T like her clothes!"

Pelosi, a 66-year-old grandmother, isn't the first powerful woman in politics to be put under the sartorial microscope. The choices of Hillary Clinton, perhaps the most visible woman in U.S. politics, have been deconstructed through time, from her changing hairstyles to her inaugural hat in 1993 to the constant dark pantsuits on the Senate campaign trail, often paired with a pink blouse. (Again, imagine her well-dressed husband being criticized for always choosing a dark suit.)

Of course it isn't just in politics: on the night CBS's Katie Couric debuted as the first female solo anchor of a network evening newscast, her short white jacket (post-Labor Day, some critics noted disapprovingly) was analyzed as much as her performance.

One scholar of journalistic ethics argues that a politician's attire is fair game in news coverage — but only under certain circumstances.

"As a society, we look much more carefully at women's appearance than men," says Kelly McBride, a faculty member at the Poynter Institute in Florida. "At the same time, the clothing options for women are so much greater. As journalists, I don't see how we can ignore this."

The task for the media, McBride says, is to do it in proper context, and in a way that doesn't reinforce stereotypes. "It's safer to say, here's the reality: in our society we judge women by different standards — and then dig in to the nuances of that," she says. What's wrong, though, is to inject casual references to Pelosi's clothes into every news story, "which would reinforce the notion that women SHOULD be judged on appearance."

One extensive analysis of Pelosi's clothing came from Pulitzer-prize winning fashion critic Robin Givhan of The Washington Post, who often writes about the attire of major Washington figures — including a much-noticed piece on Vice President Dick Cheney's casual outerwear at a Holocaust memorial service in Poland last year.

Of the blue-gray Armani suit that Pelosi wore at her post-victory news conference, Givhan wrote that she appeared "polished and tasteful in front of the cameras. It is tempting to even go so far as to say that she looked chic, which in the world beyond Washington would be considered a compliment." Of outgoing speaker Dennis Hastert, whose rumpled suits have also been noted in the press, she wrote that there was "nothing chic or particularly polished" about him.

The article appeared in the paper's Style section, not in the political coverage — the kind of context and placement McBride was referring to. By contrast, an example of troubling references, to Smeal for one, are comments by MSNBC host Chris Matthews, who referred in his election-night coverage not to the clothing of the Democratic speaker-in-waiting, but her female voice.

Pelosi, he said, was "going to have to do the big fight with the president over issues" like the minimum wage. "How does she do it without screaming?" he asked. "How does she do it without being grating?" He also compared the sound effect of Sen. Clinton's re-election victory speech to "fingernails on a blackboard."

To David Brady, professor of political science at Stanford University, attention to Pelosi's clothes is a bit silly, but harmless in the long run.

"The fact is she's an attractive woman and she wears nice clothes — and she's got money," said Brady, deputy director of the Hoover Institution. "There are men who dress well too," he said, singling out Presidents Clinton and Bush (who has his suits made by a French-born tailor in Washington.) "You've got a country where entertainment channels are more heavily watched than news shows, where people care about Kevin Federline and Britney Spears. This is a magnification of that silliness. In the long run it won't harm her effectiveness."

Greta Petty, a 35-year-old artist in Portland, Ore., agrees that attention to Pelosi's clothes is fairly harmless — if only because she believes that only women are interested in such coverage, anyway. "It's not an issue of sexism," she says.

Besides, she adds: "men's attire is just not that interesting."

Paulson May Find Sensible Doesn't Sell (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Hank Paulson, the new Treasury secretary, gave a splendid speech this week about the need to re-engineer the financial regulatory structure to make it more efficient and enhance the competitiveness of U.S. markets in the face of stiff new competition from London and Hong Kong.

Paulson is spot on about moving from a hyper-legal, "rules-based" approach to regulation -- with its detailed prescriptions and legal threat -- to a more "prudential" system based on broad general principles and backed by guidance from a regulator with plenary powers.

He's right about the need to throttle back on the rules requiring public companies to test their "internal controls" under the Sarbanes-Oxley reform law and focus only on processes having material impact on the accuracy of financial statements.

With all the consolidation in financial services, and new products that straddle the old regulatory boundaries, Paulson is right in suggesting a single regulator that might combine the work of the Federal Reserve's regulatory function, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

And he's certainly right about the toxic effect of shareholder lawsuits on the way companies are managed.

These aren't new issues for Paulson. In many aspects, his much-anticipated speech this week was simply a reprise of one he gave to the National Press Club in June 2002, in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals. Now, as then, his approach is reasoned, nuanced and pragmatic.

It is also refreshingly naive.

I say refreshing because Paulson comes at these issues as someone who is willing to take the facts and logic wherever they lead, even if it means offending friendly interest groups or running some sacred cows off the road. In speaking to business leaders at New York's Economic Club, or a couple of reporters in his sun-drenched corner office, he comes across as straightforward, candid, without guile.

What Paulson hasn't had time to master is the black art of Washington policy-speak -- and that is where the naive comes in.

When Paulson says implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley has gone too far, he is saying nothing that Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) and Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio) haven't themselves acknowledged, and that the SEC is now fixing. But to the ideologues at the Chamber of Commerce, such sentiments will be read as a tacit embrace of their view that government screws up everything it touches.

Similarly, when Paulson says our tort system amounts to a tax on shareholders, employees and consumers and weakens the competitiveness of U.S. business, he means just that. Unfortunately, those are the same lines used for years by the National Association of Manufacturers, whose real interest isn't in reforming the tort system but in castrating it.

When he points to the absurdity of having multiple state and federal agencies regulating the same company and competing to prosecute corporate misdeeds, Paulson means only to question the efficiency of our regulatory structure. But his old friends on Wall Street are surely interpreting that to mean that ambitious state attorneys general like Eliot Spitzer should never have been allowed to blow the whistle on tainted research and after-hours trading that had been going on for years, right there under the noses of federal regulators.

In time, I'm sure, Paulson will learn that in Washington, "risk-based" regulation is code for "self-regulation" and "materiality" is a moving target that allows executives to hide any embarrassing information from shareholders. And when someone calls for greater trust between the regulators and the regulated, it's really the regulators who are being asked to do the trusting. So if he means something different -- which I'm willing to believe he does -- then he needs a new way of expressing it.

In framing these regulatory issues in terms of international competitiveness, Paulson may also have fallen into the trap of confusing the public interest with the interests of Wall Street -- not surprising for a former head of Goldman Sachs. Certainly it is possible that financial services are moving offshore because of the greater hassles of U.S. regulation. But it is equally plausible that what we're seeing is the inevitable end to near-monopoly that has allowed U.S. financial firms to charge outrageous fees and earn outsized salaries and bonuses. A more seasoned Washington hand would have taken care to point out that if government has no business protecting the jobs of auto workers who price themselves out of world markets, it certainly has no business protecting millionaire investment bankers and hedge-fund managers.

Paulson also held Britain up as something of a model for the way financial services should be regulated. But he failed to note that, as part of that package, British corporations must get shareholder approval for executive pay packages and require directors to win support from at least half of all shareholders. By doing so Paulson could have sent a signal that he was really serious about improving corporate governance and protecting shareholder interests, not just carrying water for the Business Roundtable.

Paulson has brought a breath of fresh air to the stale partisan atmosphere of Washington. But if he wants to succeed as the honest broker, he'll need to crack the code on the Washington policy conversation and reassure Democrats and other skeptics that he's got something new to sell.

Capital Rules (WP)

TREASURY SECRETARY Henry M. Paulson Jr. spoke Monday on a subject he knows intimately: the health of U.S. capital markets. The United States has traditionally served as a capital market for the world. U.S. and foreign companies alike sought listings on U.S. stock exchanges so that they could tap into the world's largest and most efficiently managed pool of savings. But this has recently ceased to be true: Fewer companies are seeking U.S. listings; some foreign ones are delisting, preferring to trade on a stock exchange elsewhere; and many U.S. companies are turning their backs on stock exchanges altogether as private-equity funds acquire them. Some interest groups have presented these trends as evidence that the post-Enron reform of corporate governance, through the Sarbanes-Oxley law, overreached. Mr. Paulson rightly refused to swallow that simplification.

Companies are raising less money in the U.S. equity market partly because the alternatives have grown more attractive. Foreign markets are catching up in terms of the efficiency of their trading systems, so foreign companies have less of a need to come to the United States. Low interest rates have rendered borrowing cheap, which explains why private-equity firms can take out eye-popping loans to buy up companies' stock. Neither development is necessarily bad. Efficient equity markets in Asia and Europe will improve growth prospects in those regions, creating opportunities for U.S. exporters. And U.S. companies should be free to make their own judgments about shifting from equity to debt, although the fees earned by private-equity firms seem disproportionate.

The retreat from equity markets is only worrying if it reflects a decline in their efficiency rather than a rise in the appeal of other options. Mr. Paulson suggested that costs imposed by the U.S. tort system may deter companies from listing: As a share of gross domestic product, U.S. tort costs are twice those in Germany and Japan and three times those of Britain. Another deterrent comes from confusingly diffuse regulation. Equity markets are subject to oversight by the stock exchanges themselves, by self-regulatory bodies such as the National Association of Securities Dealers, by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, and by overlapping federal and state prosecutors. A third deterrent has been created by the Sarbanes-Oxley reform -- not by the law itself, but by its implementation.

Mr. Paulson said new legislation to amend Sarbanes-Oxley is unnecessary. Undoing corporate governance reform in the name of market efficiency would be perverse: Investors will only provide capital cheaply if they are offered reliable investment opportunities, and the scandals involving Enron and other companies demonstrated that company reports had ceased to be reliable. But auditors have insisted on an excessively burdensome implementation of now-infamous Section 404 of the law, which requires companies to check the management systems used to generate numbers on sales, inventory, costs and so on. What's needed is regulatory guidance to dissuade auditors from interpreting this requirement overzealously, particularly for smaller firms. Mr. Paulson has struck the right balance.

'Freedom' Is America's Truth, Sen. Webb -- 'Fairness' Is Subjective

In response to Jim Webb's Nov. 15 editorial-page essay "American Workers Have a Chance To Be Heard":

It is unfortunate, albeit not unexpected, that senator-elect Jim Webb makes the common mistake of using income inequality as a gauge of social injustice in this country. In a free market, income inequality is the inevitable result of individual productivity inequality, and of course productivity inequality exists due to variations in natural ability, industriousness, education, risk-aversion and dumb luck. The reason income equality has grown rapidly (although hardly "infinitely," as Mr. Webb hyperbolically asserts) is that productivity inequality has grown. And the reason productivity inequality has grown is that with the advance of technology and globalization, the impact of a good idea or exceptional performance can be leveraged dozens of times more than it could be even one generation ago. J. K. Rowling, the author of the Harry Potter series, has made more than $200 million for each book she has written. Is that too much? Absolutely not, when one considers the benefits that each book brings to tens of millions of children (and adults) around the globe. But the impact of J.K. Rowling's creativity and hard work, and the income she has earned from it, would have been perhaps orders of magnitude smaller 30 years ago.

Mr. Webb misses the point that one of the pillars of a free-market economy is that people should be allowed to earn in proportion to their productivity. To use government to do otherwise would be to impede productivity everywhere. In fact, my guess is that in most of the regrettable cases in which income vastly outstrips productivity, government intervention is probably to blame. The news that the three richest counties in the United States are clustered around Washington, D.C., certainly came as no surprise to me this morning.

In any case, a much better gauge of social injustice is consumption inequality. Of what relevance is it that there is large income inequality? Or wealth inequality for that matter? It only matters to the extent that it translates into unequal consumption of the country's resources, consumption being the true gauge of one's standard of living. I have not seen studies in this area, but my guess is that we are many times less unequal in our rates of consumption than in our levels of income or wealth.

Eric Meyer

Newton, Mass.

Blah, blah, blah. When are we going to actually hear something of substance from the Democrats? You would think they would've begun outlining how to deal with the "inequalities." People will start to think that they might not know what to do next.

Michael S. Woodard

Charlotte, N.C.

Mr. Webb forgets to mention in his diatribe against top wage earners that the top 5% band of earners pay 57% of the country's total income taxes. I guess that kind of data flew out of his mind when he switched sides.

Margaret McGirr

Greenwich, Conn.

Underneath the smooth rhetoric is a frightening message: "Fairness" is emphasized, but "freedom" not at all. Beware of any politician who places fairness over freedom. What is at jeopardy, in his hands, are your life, liberty and property.

Jim Brankin

Southlake, Texas

Mr. Webb asserts that the top 1% of wage earners "takes in" (not earns, mind you) "an astounding 16% of national income." IRS statistics for 2003 show the same top 1% pays a truly "astounding" 34.3% of all income taxes. If Mr. Webb could replace DNC talking points with some thinking and historical perspective, he might contribute rational problem solving rather then tired class envy and nostalgia for Great Society nostrums that led to Jimmy Carteresque stagflation.

Jay S. Haberman

New York

Nowhere does Mr. Webb actually outline what he'll do to benefit the American worker. All he provides is a list of Democrat buzzwords and phrases -- job outsourcing, CEO compensation, Rove, wage gap, Wal-Mart, etc. I have no problem with Democrats addressing issues they perceive to be hurting the American worker, but, please -- offer solutions.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston

DOJ_NMG_0097225

Mr. Webb is long on class envy and short on facts. Nowhere does he state what he would do to change the status quo. Senator, it is not the politics of the Karl Rove era that are distracting and dividing people -- it's you.

Joe Schroeder

Big Canoe, Ga.

Mr. Webb's rant is right in tune with the heart and soul of his new party. He sounds like Willy Stark.

Douglass M. Holmes

Louisville, Ky.

I'm so glad Mr. Webb opened my eyes to the fact that we mindless rubes, who are concerned only with the issues of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag," have merely been victims of seduction by the all powerful "Oz" -- Karl Rove.

Mark Rauschenberger

Washington

The country has changed in the 40 years since Mr. Webb "graduated from college in the 1960s," but apparently he has not. Today, the percentage of home owners has increased from under 20% to about 70%; the stock-owning investor class has increased from less than 10% to about 60%. The "top tier" that "has grown richer" has itself increased (as a definition of upper middle class and above) exponentially. All of this is under a program of steady decrease in taxation and regulation.

Lenny Toboroff

New York

If so many jobs are disappearing, as Mr. Webb would have us believe, why is unemployment at a historical low?

Patrick Duffy

Haddon Township, N.J.

Mr. Webb says "manufacturing jobs are disappearing." True. Contrary to his suggestion, though, this fact is unrelated to recent trends in globalization, corporate governance or tax policy. Manufacturing jobs as a percentage of the U.S. work force peaked in 1945 and have declined steadily ever since, even though manufacturing output continues to rise. Today this output is at an all-time high.

Donald J. Boudreaux

Chairman

Department of Economics

George Mason University

Fairfax, Va.

Mr. Webb's discussion of class structure implies that we are locked into a class and cannot escape, something that is simply not true in America. We can all move through various economic situations quite fluidly without any restrictions due to birth. Mr. Webb himself is a fine example: From his days working part time in college to becoming a best selling author to a senator, he has moved dramatically between various "classes" of earnings. Opportunity in America is distinctly classless.

Richard Noble

Eagle, Ind.

Jim Webb expresses a profoundly shocking un-American idea: From each according to his ability, to each according to his need. Our founding principle of individual rights recognizes the sovereignty of the individual in his thoughts and actions and the government as the protector of the individual's life, liberty, property and pursuit of his own individual happiness. The values he creates by his own efforts are his to dispose of as he chooses, not the property of the family, the tribe, or the state. There is no national income.

Great Plains Drought Is a National Disaster

Your Nov. 15 editorial "Fargonomics" misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease.

This country has always responded to disasters, whether hurricanes, wildfires or drought. To represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains.

You misrepresent the role of crop insurance. Yes, crop insurance is an important risk management tool for farmers and ranchers. But when those losses stack up year to year, as has happened as the drought conditions have worsened year after year, crop insurance loses its effectiveness -- the amount of crop loss covered goes down, while premiums go up. Crop insurance was never designed to cover repeated losses. Crop insurance isn't covering basic farm expenses, and the natural disasters depleting our farms and ranches are breaking the backbone of the Midwest economy.

Suffering in Africa Makes Us See (RED)

Your Nov. 10 editorial "Shopping for the Poor" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) made an astute observation: "Good charity" theory includes (in its DNA) the concept of sacrifice. You suggest that (Product) RED, our venture, is playing a part in questioning the hair shirt thinking. That was great. But alas, you then committed several interpretive misdeeds.

First, you say "too bad" that many (Product) RED items are not made in Africa. Give us a chance! We've been in business in the U.S. only five weeks. But within these weeks, we now have what we never had during our two years developing this project: objective proof that (RED) branded products produce a measured commercial advantage. Because we did not have that proof during development, could you really have expected us to persuade giant multinationals to source 100% of the (RED) products in Africa? That said, it is great that Gap has been producing there for years and that Motorola was able to purchase packaging materials in Lesotho.

Now that Gap has proved our theory, you will see many more products manufactured on the continent, not because we proselytized but because companies have seen the commercial advantage in doing so.

Second, you assert that because the Geneva-based Global Fund supports "a range of heath-related projects," our manifesto's assertion that (RED) money will not purchase AIDS medicines is incorrect. I am thrilled to confirm that the fund has accepted that money made by (RED) and will be used only for purchase and delivery of medicines to those suffering from HIV in Africa, with particular emphasis on women and children.

Third, you suggest that our energy might be better spent on promoting trade with poor nations. Because we have a lot of energy, we have made this exact idea part of our work at DATA, a public education/lobbying organization Bono and I co-founded in 2000. In fact, DATA is an acronym for "Debt Aids Trade for Africa" in return for "Democracy, Accountability and Transparency for Africa." Along with many others, we have supported new trade initiatives, including the Millennium Challenge Corp., change to customs regulations and AGOA, the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows tremendous new investment and trade between the U.S. and Africa. Our sister entity, one.org, works on trade issues in a grassroots manner.

We created (RED) to bring the marketing brilliance and the budgets of the private sector to bear on the greatest human health-care crisis in history. To make this happen, we needed a device, a brand that would enable the bravest and smartest companies to invest and to make money on that investment. (RED) is that brand.

Gap's campaign has proved our idea not only by its genius advertising and products, but by that fact that all Gap employees have been trained to explain this crisis to customers. In malls across America, young Americans are explaining AIDS to their customers and selling them T-shirts made in Lesotho and denim made in America from African cotton. As success builds on itself, more products will be sourced in Africa.

In addition, Motorola has launched its (Product) RED phones with Sprint and US Cellular -- wait until sales people in Sprint stores are telling stories about the positive effects of America's medicines and the opportunities for investment in Africa. Wow.

The Democrats' Economy Wars (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

DOJ_NMG_0097227

When voters went to the polls this month, they registered not only a revulsion with the Republican regime but also a profound -- almost un-American -- anxiety about the nation's future. They ousted incumbents who wanted to stay the economic course, choosing instead Democratic challengers who questioned free-trade orthodoxy. In the exit polling, a plurality said they believed that life for the next generation of Americans would be worse than it is today.

All wings of the Democratic Party seem to understand the extent of America's economic problem. The architects of Bill Clinton's economic and trade policies, as well as their more liberal critics, all agree now, in the words of Clinton Treasury secretary Lawrence Summers, that "the vast global middle is not sharing the benefits of the current period of economic growth -- and that its share of the pie may even be shrinking." The era of globalized free trade that Summers and his iconic predecessor at Treasury, Robert Rubin, sped on its way, Summers admits, has benefited many Asians and, here at home, has been "a golden age for those who already own valuable assets. . . . Everyone else has not fared nearly as well."

Concerned that the American dream is fading for the middle class, and fearful that said middle class may turn against the global free-trade order he helped erect, Rubin has created the Hamilton Project, which, in the spirit of its namesake, our first Treasury secretary, proposes a series of enlightened Tory solutions to address these conundrums. The project has called for greater public investment in education, health care, research and development, and infrastructure; balancing the budget; and wage insurance for workers compelled to take lower-paying jobs in our Wal-Mart-ized economy.

But are these solutions remotely adequate to the problem, which is ultimately that of wage convergence in the globalized economy? Even its proponents seem not to think so. "Let us be frank," Summers wrote in a Financial Times column. "What the anxious global middle is told often feels like pretty thin gruel. . . . [More] education [can't] be a complete answer at a time when skilled computer programmers in India are paid less than $2,000 a month."

When Rubin was pressed by the Nation's William Greider in June as to whether he thought the project's proposals would arrest or offset the global convergence of wages, he said, "I don't know the answer to that. I would guess that the answer to that question is no."

For the Democrats who now run Congress, not to mention those planning to run for president, the fact that the party's economic gurus have devised a policy that they themselves believe isn't up to the challenge at hand can't be greatly heartening. Happily, this is not the only project whose work the Democrats will be able to access. This June, in response to the Hamilton Project's creation, a group of some 50 liberal economists loosely affiliated with the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) began work of their own. Their project, yet to be named (its founders have resisted the temptation to call it the Aaron Burr Project), will be unveiled in January.

The fundamental difference between the two projects -- that is, between the two primary schools of Democratic economics -- is that Rubin's largely believes the rules of the market to be immutable and sound (though it's precisely the rules of the market that are depressing American incomes), while EPI's, in the words of economist Mark Levinson, "rejects the notion that what has happened to this economy is inevitable. Policy can turn this around." (Full disclosure: Levinson is an old friend.)

For starters, EPI's project will call for a pay-or-play health insurance system (employers can cover their own employees in private plans or pay taxes into an expanded version of Medicare that will cover everyone else) and for a retirement system in which employers can offer their employees pensions or, with their employees, pay into a system administered by Social Security. It will suggest a series of policies to decouple globalization from downward pressure on wages -- adding some enforceable labor standards, for instance, to the rules of the World Trade Organization.

Less cosmically, economist Jeff Faux pointedly asks, "Why should middle-class taxpayers fund Harvard to dream up new products that will be made overseas? We need to condition greater R&D funding to production here at home."

Over the next two years, both projects will barrage the Democrats with their ideas. At times their perspectives may converge. (Rubin seems to be edging closer to acknowledging a need to reestablish workers' rights to join unions, long a priority of the EPI crowd.) But the creation of EPI's project balances the scales in the Democratic universe. The Hamilton Project is the policy voice of the party's largest business donors. In the project to be unveiled in January, the party's voters get a policy voice, too.

ABC News, citing unidentified law enforcement reports, reported on its Web site Tuesday that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were taken while she was dining in a Buenos Aires restaurant.

La Nacion newspaper, citing anonymous government sources, said in its online edition early Wednesday that one of Bush's daughters had her purse taken Sunday afternoon in the popular tourist district of San Telmo.

A pair of thieves removed the purse from under a table while Secret Service agents stood guard at a distance, La Nacion reported. La Nacion said its sources did not reveal which of the Bush daughters had her purse stolen.

Argentine police told The Associated Press they had no complaint of any such incident on file, and the U.S. Embassy in Buenos Aires said it would have no comment. In Washington, the White House, Secret Service and State Department also declined comment.

CNN cited a law-enforcement source who was briefed on the incident as saying that "at no point were the protectees out of visual contact and at no point was there any risk of harm."

Argentina's largest-circulation daily, Clarin, ran an online report citing the government news agency Telam as saying that Barbara Bush had her purse taken along with a cell phone that was inside it. Telam cited an official source who did not wish to be identified by name and who provided no other details.

Barbara's twin, Jenna, visited neighboring Paraguay last month to take part in a UNICEF program for young professionals.

One Syllable Of Civility (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

If he wanted to, President Bush could change the tone in Washington with a single syllable: He could just say "ic." That is, he could stop referring to the opposition as the "Democrat Party" and call the other side, as it prefers, the Democratic Party.

The derisive use of "Democrat" in this way was a Bush staple during the recent campaign. "There are people in the Democrat Party who think they can spend your money far better than you can," he would say in his stump speech, or, "Raising taxes is a Democrat idea of growing the economy," or, "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

But even as he promised to work to change the tone in Washington after the elections, the president couldn't manage to change his language. In his day-after-the-elections news conference, Bush employed this needling locution five times. "This morning, I spoke with Republican and Democrat leadership in the House and Senate," he began, adding, "it is clear the Democrat Party had a good night last night." That was followed by references to "Democrat leaders," "Democrat leadership" and "Democrat votes," as in, "We got some tax cuts passed with Democrat votes." Geez, you'd think he'd at least give them the -ic when they vote for his tax cuts.

The president isn't alone in his adjectival aversion to "Democratic" when it comes to the party. The provenance of the sneering label "Democrat Party" stretches back to the Harding administration. William Safire traced an early usage to Harold Stassen, who was managing Wendell Willkie's 1940 campaign against Franklin D. Roosevelt. A party run by political bosses, Stassen told Safire for a 1984 column, "should not be called a 'Democratic Party.' It should be called the 'Democrat party.' "

Democrat Party was used, pardon the phrase, liberally by Wisconsin Sen. Joseph McCarthy. According to the Columbia Guide to Standard American English, " Democrat as an adjective is still sometimes used by some twentieth-century Republicans as a campaign tool but was used with particular virulence" by McCarthy, "who sought by repeatedly calling it the Democrat party to deny it any possible benefit of the suggestion that it might also be democratic." The word also achieved a prominent run with Bob Dole's especially ugly reference to "Democrat wars" during the 1976 vice presidential debate.

But Democrat-as-epithet has seen its fullest flowering -- on talk radio, among congressional leaders and, more than with any of his predecessors, from the president himself -- during the recent Republican heyday. As Hendrik Hertzberg pointed out in the New Yorker in August, the conservative Web site NewsMax.com takes pains to scrub Associated Press copy "to de-'ic' references" to the party.

There is, I concede, a trivial, sticks-and-stones quality to this linguistic bickering. "Two thousand, eight hundred, forty-seven votes in Montana may break your control," the Democrats might taunt the GOP, "but names will never hurt us." As any parent who's ever had to mediate between squabbling siblings could tell them, "He's only doing it because he knows it bothers you. If you don't respond to him, he'll stop." After all, Democrats, what's so terrible about being called Democrat, small "d" or large?

But as a matter of simple politeness -- something the Bush family is famously good at -- it's rude to call people by a term that makes them bristle, even a seemingly innocuous one. There's also something grating and coarse-sounding about this abbreviated appellation, like saying "Jew" instead of "Jewish." It is, conservative wordsmith William F. Buckley wrote in National Review in 2002, "offensive to the ear."

And with reason: It's intended to be. Republican -- Publican? -- politicians drop the -ic both to annoy the opposition and to diminish the big-D Democrats' claim to the small-d democratic virtues. " 'Democrat Party' is a slur, or intended to be -- a handy way to express contempt," Hertzberg wrote. "At a slightly higher level of sophistication, it's an attempt to deny the enemy the positive connotations of its chosen appellation."

In the few weeks since the election, the president has followed up his syrupy rhetoric of cooperation with a series of face slaps: pushing the doomed nomination of John Bolton to be ambassador to the United Nations, resubmitting the equally doomed nominations of a quartet of offensive judicial selections and naming a physician to head the federal family planning program who works for clinics that refuse to offer birth control.

So it's probably naive to give any credence to the presidential happy talk and blue ties. But if, just maybe, the president wants to do more than pay lip service to the notion of a new tone in Washington, he could start by just paying lip service.

White House Cuts GDP Outlook Amid Slump In Housing Market (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House said it expects somewhat slower economic growth this year and next than it forecast six months ago, partly because of a slump in the housing market. It also said it expects a slight increase, both from its earlier forecast and from this year, in inflation in 2007 and 2008.

In an updated economic forecast, the administration said it expects inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, the value of all the goods and services produced in the economy, to increase 3.1% this year, down from its June forecast of 3.6%. Economic growth is expected to slow to 2.9% in 2007, down from its previous estimate of 3.3%.

As for inflation, a decline in record-setting energy prices prompted the White House to lower its 2006 estimate for consumer-price-index growth to 2.3% from its June forecast of 3%. But the administration is predicting a slight increase to 2.6% in 2007 and 2008.

The new economic-growth forecast, on which the president's new budget will be based, is largely in line with private-sector estimates. Private forecasters are predicting GDP growth of 3.4% this year and 2.6% in 2007. On the inflation front, the private sector is less sanguine about 2006, estimating 3.5% CPI growth and 2.5% in 2007.

Administration officials said the economy is still strong and that they saw no signs for concern about economic growth or inflation. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a statement, said the revised forecast suggests the economy is "moderating to more sustainable growth levels, firmer labor markets and steady inflation rates."

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

The Bush administration's lowering of their 2006 and 2007 economic forecast2 is an official confirmation of the housing sector's impact on the economy, John Harwood reports.

Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, said much of the downward revision in growth was due to a faster-than-expected decline in the housing market, which, he said, "has been hit harder than most of us had expected. Most forecasters were expecting a slower decline."

Administration officials pointed to revised forecasts of unemployment as a sign that the economy is going strong, saying they expect the economy to create about 129,000 jobs a month going forward. They now expect the unemployment rate in 2006 to average 4.6%, down from the previous 4.7%. They forecast unemployment will remain at 4.6% in 2007 and rise to 4.8% in 2008.

US Labour Market To Remain Tight In 2007 (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

The US labour market will remain tight next year, the White House predicted Tuesday, raising hopes that ordinary Americans will start to feel more of the benefits of the country's economic expansion.

Issuing its twice-yearly economic forecasts, White House economic advisors said unemployment would average about 4.6 per cent in 2007, only a slight bit higher than the present 4.4 per cent.

Jobs growth would average about 129,000 a month – fewer than anticipated in June, but enough to keep unemployment low due to the falling number of people joining the labour market.

Ed Lazear, the chairman of the council of economic advisors, said, "I would anticipate that we will have positive and strongly positive real wage growth in the next year."

The White House forecasts came as Kevin Warsh, a governor of the Federal Reserve, warned that inflation remains "uncomfortably elevated" in spite of the recent deceleration in core inflation.

Mr Warsh said financial market prices suggested that inflation would decline slowly, but added, "There remain, I believe, clear upside risks to that outlook."

After growing slowly for much of the economic cycle, real average hourly wages for non-supervisory workers are up 2.8 per cent year-to-date, taking into account the benefit of the sudden drop in energy prices.

Mr Lazear said Tuesday that providing energy prices now stabilise, real wages will grow strongly into 2007. Critics, though, say the most recent gains are a one-off result of lower oil prices, and will not be sustained.

The White House cut its forecast for economic growth this year, next year and in 2008. Mr Lazear blamed the reduction on a sharper-than-expected correction in the housing market.

However, he said there were few signs that the slowdown in housing was spilling over into the rest of the economy, citing robust figures for consumption and retail spending.

The sharpness of the retrenchment in housing so far could point to a better than expected recovery ahead, he said.

Mr Lazear declined to speculate as to whether the housing market would bottom out this quarter or next, but said he thought growth in the fourth quarter would be stronger than in the third.

The White House raised its estimate for inflation next year, to 2.6 per cent from 2.4 per cent as measured by the consumer price index.

Mr Lazear played down the significance of this increase, highlighting recent favourable readings of headline, core and producer price inflation.

Nonetheless, if the forecast combination of higher than earlier anticipated inflation, plus a stronger than earlier expected jobs market were to materialise, it is hard to see the Federal Reserve in vigorous interest rate-cutting mode next year.

Slower Economy Growth Forecast (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday predicted slower but steady economic growth over the next year, revising estimates downward because of a sluggish housing market.

Administration officials also said inflation should remain at a manageable pace, while unemployment has now dropped to 4.4 percent and will remain at 4.6 percent as an annual rate for 2006 and 2007. The forecast was one of the periodic updates released by the administration, and will be the basis for President Bush's 2008 budget he will send to Congress early next year.

In reviewing the numbers, Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said they showed a "strong, growing economy, steady growth, good numbers on inflation in the sense that they're lower again."

The gross domestic product is now expected to grow by 3.1 percent in 2006, down from the 3.6 percent growth predicted in June.

"That's primarily a reflection of the housing market, which as most of you know, has been a bit slower than expected," said Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

But he said the slump seems to be contained in the housing market and hasn't affected other parts of the economy. He said one example is construction, in which nonresidential activity has increased, so construction jobs have shifted there from home building.

In 2007, the White House is now expecting the economy to grow by 2.9 percent -- also lower than its previous forecast for 3.3 percent growth. And, in 2008, the White House is projecting a 3.1 percent growth rate, slightly less than its old forecast for a 3.2 percent growth rate.

"The economic forecast clearly reflects the fact that the U.S. economy is moderating to more sustainable growth levels, firmer labor markets and steady inflation rates," said Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson.

Yesterday's forecast does not cover federal revenue, which has surged in recent years, helping reduce the deficit. Revenue grew 11.8 percent in fiscal 2006 and 14.5 percent in 2005, but analysts have said those increases will be difficult to match in the future.

The upcoming budget process will already be challenging for the White House because Democrats will control both houses of Congress for the first time with Mr. Bush as president.

Lower energy prices have also helped on the inflation front. The forecast put the Consumer Price Index for 2006 at 2.3 percent, down from an earlier prediction of 3 percent and well below 2005's actual rate of 3.7 percent. The 2007 forecast is for a 2.6 percent increase.

The forecast was a joint effort by the Treasury Department, the Council of Economic Advisers and OMB.

White House Lowers Forecast For Growth (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 (AP) — The White House on Tuesday lowered its forecast for economic growth this year and next, reflecting the drag from the housing slump.

The Bush administration is also predicting that the unemployment rate will turn out to be slightly lower than previously thought.

Under the administration's new forecast, gross domestic product will grow by 3.1 percent, as measured from the fourth quarter of last year to the fourth quarter of this year. That is down from a projection of 3.6 percent in early June.

Still, the new forecast would represent decent growth, especially given the strain on overall economic activity from the housing slump.

The housing market has been hit harder than the administration had expected, Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters.

Gross domestic product measures the value of all goods and services produced within the United States and is the best measure of the country's economic standing.

The White House is now expecting the economy to grow by 2.9 percent in 2007 — also lower than its previous forecast of 3.3 percent growth.

The nation's unemployment rate, which averaged 5.1 percent last year, is expected to dip to 4.6 percent this year — a slight improvement from the administration's previous forecast for an unemployment rate of 4.7 percent this year.

Nasdaq, S& P Both Manage 2006 Records (USAT)

NEW YORK — Stocks crept higher Tuesday as rising oil prices partly smothered euphoria over shares of Internet wunderkind Google cracking the $500 barrier (story, 1B).

The Nasdaq composite and Standard & Poor's 500 indexes, which include Google among their components, both set 2006 highs: The Nasdaq was up 2.12 points to 2454.84 and the S&P was up 2.31 points to 1402.81. The Google-free Dow Jones industrial average rose 5.05 points to 12,321.59 that left it 21 points shy of its record close on Friday.

Google was the Wall Street story of the day as it rose $14.60 to $509.65 and breached $500 for the first time. But there was plenty else to influence traders, including oil, which rose $1.37 to $60.17 on news of temporary trouble with an Alaskan pipeline and a couple of U.S. refinery outages.

Another factor was the approach of the Thanksgiving holiday Thursday and a shortened trading day on Friday.

"We've been seeing a slow down-trickle in volume over the past few days because of the holiday," says Scott Fullman, director of investment strategy for Hapoalim Securities USA. "The market is just holding here, trying to work off a little bit of its overbought conditions that resulted from the rise that we've had over the past month or so."

Richard Cripps, chief market strategist for Stifel Nicolaus, says choppy market conditions are common at this point in the year. "I won't go so far as to say investors should cancel holiday plans with the family to watch the final tick on Wednesday," he says, "but I'd say this week still presents fresh opportunities. Friday will obviously be much less."

Highlights:

Medtronic gained $4.60 to $53.55 after the biggest maker of heart defibrillators reported earnings above projections late Monday.

•Apple Computer rose $2.13 to $88.60 and set another all-time high amid bullishness about the potential for iPod sales in the holiday season.

•Boeing added $1.98 to $91.10 and also set an all-time high. Korean Air placed an order for 25 Boeing aircraft.

•Spirit AeroSystems closed at $29, up $3.19, or 12%, from the $26 at which it sold 55.1 million shares in an initial public offering. Spirit is a former Boeing unit that makes commercial jet fuselages and wing parts and is now controlled by Canadian buyout firm Onex.

•Brown Shoe gained $6.22, or 16%, to $45.77. The operator of the Famous Footwear chain posted a bigger-than-expected 36% jump in third-quarter profit and raised its full-year forecast.

Weighing In On Wages (NYT)

Nearly every month for the past two and a half years, inflation has eaten up whatever wage gains most American workers have managed to eke out. In August, however, the cost of living started to moderate, thanks largely to falling energy prices. As a result, wages outpaced prices substantially in September. And in October, according to a government report last week, average hourly earnings were 2.8 percent higher than a year earlier, after adjusting for inflation — the biggest annual increase since 1998.

A real increase is something to cheer for a broad swath of working Americans — non-managers who make up 80 percent of the labor force and whose wages up until now have not reflected their impressive productivity over the past several years. But behind the headline numbers, the wage picture — and what it says about the economy — is still cloudy.

The gains of September and October were due to declining inflation, not faster wage growth. And with most economists predicting a slower economy through the middle of next year, it's unlikely that American workers will get a sustained pay boost any time soon.

In other words, Americans' purchasing power now depends almost entirely on the up and down of energy prices. That's not encouraging for anyone worried about America's dependency on the countries that produce most of the world's oil. It's also not likely to make for a confident consumer in an economy that has long depended on enthusiastic borrowing and shopping to fuel growth. And sure enough, retail sales have been disappointing even as gas prices have declined. An economic analysis released this week by Merrill Lynch shows that fatter paychecks in September fed into just three spending categories: music, clothing and eating out, rather than big-ticket categories like cars or appliances. In October, consumers backed off even more, with most all of the "extra" pay going into groceries and pharmacy items.

The coming holiday shopping season will be the true test of consumer resiliency. But the modesty of recent purchases — in the face of the best real wage growth in eight years — does not bode well.

There are early signs that Americans, untypically, may choose to pay down debt in the weeks and months ahead, rather than spend their money. The savings rate, though still negative, has improved of late, while bank lending to households has flattened.

Debt reduction would help families clean up their balance sheets, but it risks slowing the economy even further as spending winds down. That may be an inescapable bind. Working Americans, who have yet to participate fully in the Bush-era economic expansion, may not be ready or able to rev up the economy out of its current slow pace.

Re-election Assured For 2 Republicans (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, Nov. 21 (AP) — More than a week after Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, claimed a razor-thin election victory, her Democratic challenger conceded Tuesday, saying that a recount would cost too much and that there was no guarantee it would reverse the result.

In the Second Congressional District of Ohio, Representative Jean Schmidt, a Republican, clinched re-election Tuesday. Additional ballot counts gave her an insurmountable edge of about 3,200 votes over her Democratic challenger, Victoria Wulsin.

In New Mexico, Ms. Wilson, a five-term congresswoman, won by 875 votes, with 105,921 votes to 105,046 votes for the Democrat, Patricia Madrid, the state attorney general.

Giuliani Files To Explore Run For President (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York has filed papers with the Federal Election Commission to create a presidential exploratory committee, joining a fellow Republican, Senator John McCain of Arizona.

Mr. Giuliani's filing, hand-delivered to the commission on Monday, says he is still "testing the waters," meaning that for now, he can raise and spend money on polls and travel but not declare himself a candidate or build a substantial war chest.

Mr. Giuliani, 62, who was mayor from 1994 to 2001, created a political committee in New York State on Nov. 10 called the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee. But he stopped short of filing federal papers, leading to speculation that he had doubts about even weighing a run.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, declined to comment.

John H. Gross, a litigation partner and the chief of the insurance coverage practice at Proskauer Rose, a New York law firm, is the treasurer of Mr. Giuliani's federal campaign organization. It has the same name as the New York organization, where Mr. Gross is one of three directors.

On Nov. 15, Mr. Giuliani met in Manhattan with supporters who could form the core of a national fund-raising effort, including Thomas O. Hicks, the owner of the Texas Rangers; Mel M. Immergut, the chairman of the New York law firm Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy; and William E. Simon Jr., an investor who ran for governor of California in 2002.

Mr. Giuliani crisscrossed the country this year, visiting 25 states to campaign with or raise money for Republican candidates, according to his political action committee, Solutions America. But political analysts say his liberal views on social issues like abortion and gay rights could be a liability in a Republican primary.

"Everyone I've talked to keeps dismissing him for one reason or another: that he's from New York, that he's moderate, that he's wrong on one social issue or another," said Frank I. Luntz, a Republican pollster who worked for Mr. Giuliani in his 1993 and 1997 mayoral campaigns. "They don't know Rudy Giuliani, and they don't understand the electorate. The public is demanding intelligent leadership and is far more focused on personal attributes of the candidates than on specific policy issues."

Mr. Luntz said he believed that the midterm elections, which cost Republicans control of Congress, would lead party members to consider an unorthodox candidate like Mr. Giuliani.

“There’s a great fear among the G.O.P. — and it’s a legitimate fear — that they could end up losing everything,” he said. “In times of genuine crisis, leadership matters a heck of a lot more than anything else.”

McCain Defiant As Iraq Fires Early 2008 US Vote Talk (AFP-Y)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, November 22, 2006

As Americans wonder when the troops will come home from Iraq, Republican White House hopeful John McCain is laying his first big bet of the 2008 campaign: demanding more soldiers for the war.

The US entanglement in Iraq is already driving the run-up to the next presidential polls, and barring a miracle peace, or abrupt US retreat, looks certain to become an even more potent issue.

Potential candidates are putting up trial balloons, as a committee of veteran Washington policymakers and a White House panel probe possible changes in US strategy as violence rages in the occupied country.

At first sight, McCain's position appears to jar with political logic, after the rout of his Republican Party in congressional elections two weeks ago, which exit polls showed were heavily influenced by dismay over Iraq.

It also contrasts sharply with the call of victorious Democrats for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

"He doesn't necessarily believe that the signal that was sent in the mid-term elections was an endorsement of withdrawal, per se, as much as it was an endorsement of doing something differently," said Jamie McKown, professor of government at Maine's College of the Atlantic.

"That is a fine line to walk."

McCain, 70, set Washington abuzz with a speech to a Republican political action committee Thursday, just over a week after the elections and on the day he took the first formal steps toward launching a campaign.

"Without additional forces, we cannot win this war," the former Vietnam War prisoner said.

A day earlier, McCain used a congressional hearing to dress down General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think the status quo and the rate of progress we're making is acceptable. I think most Americans do not," McCain said.

Abizaid said a 20,000-troop increase in the 144,000-member US force would have a temporary effect on violence, but warned the pool of available combat troops was not large enough to sustain such an increase.

On Sunday, McCain was asked on ABC if it was "immoral" to ask US troops to stay in Iraq, when in his view, they were undermanned.

"Yes, it is," McCain answered. "We've got to ask ... some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no ... Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can."

As Democrats demand a phased withdrawal of US troops, McCain says more men must be poured in to flush out insurgent strongholds, crush militias and sectarian violence and to train Iraqi forces.

He has already differentiated himself from fellow 2008 hopefuls.

Former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, a possible Republican candidate, said he was waiting for the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group to report on possible options, though was quoted last week as saying the United States needed to be "steadfast in Iraq."

Democrat front-runner Senator Hillary Clinton last week warned "hope" was not a strategy in Iraq. Senator Barack Obama, a rising Democratic star also considering a run, Monday called for a phased withdrawal of US troops.

McCain may be tailoring his message to hawkish, pro-military conservative voters who will decide the Republican nominee in primary elections.

"I don't think it dooms him in his primary process. He has a hard right primary he has to go through. My guess is that's part of the calculation," Democrat Senator Joseph Biden, mulling his own White House run, told NBC Monday.

This is merely the latest in a string of maverick stands by McCain, which include challenges to his own party over corporate financing and to the White House over torture.

The downside to his bet appears to be that if he wins the nomination, he may have trouble selling his message to voters nationwide in the 2008 elections.

"If things are getting worse and there is more of a consensus to say bring the troops home, he has to find a way to do that," said McKown.

McCain appeared on NBC last week showing the first signs of a possible exit route.

"So we're at a decision point. We either set up a plan for withdrawal, or withdraw, or whatever it is that is going to prevail," McCain said.

Asked if he would advocate withdrawal without more troops, he replied: "I think that that's pretty much my position."

Romney Forges On, Heedless Of GOP Losses (AP-Y)

By Glen Johnson

By almost any measure, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — a would-be presidential candidate — should be hanging his head right now.

He was chairman of an association supposed to elect Republican governors, but they lost 20 of 36 races on Election Day, which saw widespread GOP losses.

Then, in an issue critical to the GOP's conservative base, the Massachusetts legislature balked at his request to let state voters decide on an anti-gay marriage amendment, forcing him to petition the state's highest court.

In addition, two of his potential rivals, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, jumped out and announced they were forming presidential exploratory committees.

Yet true to the business training that earned him hundreds of millions of dollars, Romney has a plan and he's sticking to it.

The 59-year-old former venture capitalist, who gained fame resurrecting the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics, is proceeding on a methodical course of fundraising, staff-building and outreach.

If successful, Romney would be the first Mormon elected to the White House.

He plans to file papers establishing some sort of presidential committee by mid-December, one top aide said, so he will be ready to start raising money for it on New Year's Day.

Romney himself said as recently as last Friday that should he decide to run for president — and nearly all his travel and daily events are focused on such a run — he would announce his decision in early 2007. His term as governor ends Jan. 4.

"I have not seen an individual approach this situation with a greater degree of structure or by compiling such a vast database for making it, both on the personal and political sides," said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire political operative who has advised former Republican candidates such as Bob Dole, George H.W. Bush, Lamar Alexander and George W. Bush.

The son of George Romney, the former governor of Michigan and a 1968 presidential candidate, Romney has worked assiduously to position himself as the top alternative to McCain.

A University of New Hampshire poll last month had the Arizona Republican in first with 32 percent, Giuliani second with 19 percent and Romney third with 15 percent.

Romney sought and won the chairmanship of the Republican Governors Association, allowing him to spend this election year traveling the country and dispensing cash to his party's gubernatorial candidates.

He raised a record $20 million and was especially generous with governors association money in early presidential states like Iowa, Florida and his native Michigan. While Republicans surrendered the nation's gubernatorial majority to the Democrats on Election Day, Romney had a ready explanation.

"The job of Republican Governors Association chairman is to raise money," he said. "We're not going to take the credit for any wins we get, nor are we going to take the blame for losses we suffer."

As for his party's broader losses, he — as did McCain last week — blamed his party for straying from its roots.

DOJ_NMG_0097236

"We must return to the common sense Reagan Republican ideals of fighting for hardworking Americans," Romney said in a postelection statement.

Where Romney may take some heat, especially from the social conservatives who are instrumental in early primary voting, is over his positions on gay marriage and abortion.

Romney ran as a moderate during his 2002 gubernatorial campaign. Despite saying he personally opposed abortion, he not only pledged to leave the state's abortion laws intact, but noted his mother, Lenore, ran for U.S. Senate in 1970 as a supporter of abortion rights.

He now stresses his opposition to abortion in speeches across the country.

In 2002, Romney's supporters also handed out fliers with well wishes from him and his running mate during Boston's annual Gay Pride Parade. He was endorsed by the Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party activists. In 2003, he signed a proclamation hailing a gay youth parade.

Nonetheless, Romney has insisted his opposition to gay marriage has been unflinching. He has lambasted the Supreme Judicial Court for its November 2003 decision making Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage.

He also chastised the Democratically controlled Massachusetts Legislature for voting earlier this month to recess without acting on a proposed constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between one man and one woman.

Some 170,000 people signed petitions to get the question on the ballot in 2008.

"The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the constitution," he said Sunday during a rally on the Statehouse steps. "Let us not see the state, which first established constitutional democracy, become the first to abandon it."

The Rev. Jerry Falwell, an evangelical who founded the Moral Majority, said he expects Christian conservatives will focus more on Romney's personal morality and his current views than his past statements or his faith.

"We're not trying to find a Sunday school teacher in chief; we're trying to find a commander in chief," said Falwell, who traveled to Massachusetts last month to meet with Romney. Also attending the meeting were Franklin Graham, Gary Bauer, Lou Sheldon, Richard Land and other conservative social and religious leaders.

"Where he goes to church will not be a factor; how he lives his life will be," said Falwell.

Romney's political action committee, the Commonwealth PAC, raised $8.75 million and gave away $1.3 million in the most recent election cycle — virtually the same dispensed by McCain's much older "Straight Talk America" committee.

The governor's top political advisers, meanwhile, tend to be Bush-heavy. They include Ron Kaufman, the former White House political director under President George H.W. Bush; Alex Castellanos, a media consultant for President George W. Bush; Jan van Lohuizen, a pollster for the president and Republican National Committee, and Alex Gage, a "microtargeting" expert who helped Bush pinpoint pockets of support in the 2004 presidential campaign.

"The governor expects in the next couple of months he will have an announcement about his future," said Eric Fehrnstrom, Romney's gubernatorial spokesman. "Until that time, he will continue to travel and meet with people as he decides about what is ahead of him."

Brownback To Put Feet To His Faith (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON | Sam Brownback's post-Thanksgiving schedule: an HIV test and reporting to prison.

No, that's not the set-up for a tasteless joke involving the conservative U.S. senator from Kansas. It's further evidence that, as Brownback nears a possible formal announcement he will explore a run for president, he is determined to stake out a unique position in a crowded Republican primary field.

Typically pigeonholed by political analysts as the candidate of the religious right, Brownback hopes to be more.

By highlighting issues like the plight of prisoners and poverty in developing nations, Brownback is trying to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives, a powerful force in Republican primaries and his base of support.

It's an effort to show that compassionate conservatism is not an empty motto — that his faith is calling him to deal with such issues.

"There's this great coming together taking place, left and right, on Africa, on global health issues," Brownback said.

"This could be a moment where a broader vision can catch on among people of faith, and among political activists, the further left the better. They care deeply about these issues. Here's a chance to have a broad public basis of support. It's a beautiful moment if we don't mess it up."

On Dec. 1, Brownback and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a possible Democratic presidential candidate, will be at Saddleback Church in Southern California, pastored by best-selling author the Rev. Rick Warren, for the Global Summit on AIDS and the Church. The summit will bring together major faith-based relief organizations, government officials, and church officials from several denominations to discuss responses to the AIDS epidemic, especially in the developing world.

Brownback and Obama will get HIV tests to "de-stigmatize the test and the information" and discuss working across party lines on such issues.

On Dec. 8, Brownback is set to spend the night at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, popularly known as Angola. Since its dark history as one of America's toughest prisons, Angola has emerged as an example of enlightened prison management.

He hopes his visit will highlight the success of faith-based programs. Six evangelical churches work inside the prison walls, and more than 120 prisoners have earned degrees in Christian ministry.

Noting that the U.S. recidivism rate is about 67 percent, Brownback said that "we're not being successful in addressing their problems and needs" and that faith-based initiatives could play a role in helping.

For Brownback, the unifying theme of his post-Thanksgiving trips is simple, if unusual, in the context of a presidential campaign: "Every soul is unique and precious, a child of the living God and should be treated as such, whether they're in prison or suffering from AIDS."

It's not a new notion for Brownback: He has worked with Obama and others, including Hollywood liberal George Clooney, to bring Western attention to — and try to prod action on — the genocide in Darfur, including winning passage of a $50 million emergency aid package for Darfur refugees.

On Tuesday, he and Sen. Richard Durbin, an Illinois Democrat, urged governors to divest state pension funds of investments with companies doing business with Sudan.

Brownback also has introduced legislation urging drug companies to produce drugs that would cure diseases disproportionately affecting the developing world. He helped pass legislation to crack down on human trafficking.

He remains best known for his close association with religious conservatives, and his related stances against abortion rights, embryonic stem cell research, and same-sex marriage.

Linking that social conservatism with calls to action on issues like AIDS and poverty will be part of "fleshing out what a pro-life agenda is," he said.

"That may be the thing he does to set himself apart," said Joe Aistrup, a political scientist at Kansas State University.

Brownback said he would announce within a month whether he would form a presidential exploratory committee.

If, as expected, he does, he will need something to overcome the challenges of money and fame he will cede to frontrunners like U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Highlighting his unorthodox policy approach may be his best shot.

"Sometimes these approaches fit the mood of the country, and that's why they're successful," Aistrup said, citing Jimmy Carter's post-Watergate, grassroots campaign of 1976.

One Religious Group Drops Plans For Wal-Mart Boycott (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

DALLAS -- A religious group that had rallied members to boycott Wal-Mart Stores Inc. this weekend backed off the pledge on Tuesday.

The American Family Association, a Tupelo, Miss., group claiming nearly 3.5 million members, had urged its followers to stay away from Wal-Mart on the Friday and Saturday following Thanksgiving to protest the retailer's recent ties with homosexual groups, including its decision this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses. Another religious group, Operation Save America, intends to "proclaim the Gospel of Jesus Christ at more than 300 Wal-Mart stores" on Friday.

Yet, after Wal-Mart issued a statement on Tuesday outlining its policies on corporate donations and its stance against discrimination, the American Family Association declared itself "pleased" and withdrew its call for a boycott.

In a statement on its Web site, the association credited its decision to withdraw its boycott to Wal-Mart's announcement Tuesday that it will not "make corporate contributions to support or oppose controversial issues unless they directly relate to their ability to serve their customers."

Wal-Mart spokeswoman Mona Williams said the retailer recently made a "clarification" to its policy on corporate giving but the change was not related to the potential boycott. "We are trying to be more thoughtful and focused in our giving," spokeswoman Mona Williams said. "We will not support controversial issues but will continue to partner with a broad range of diverse organizations on individual projects. For example, we will not support issues we do not take a position on, such as same-sex marriage. But I can see us partnering with the same organization on individual initiatives such as one that supports workplace equality or fights against hate crime."

The American Family Association and other groups are up in arms over Wal-Mart's decision earlier this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses, as well as for its donations to other gay and lesbian groups. Wal-Mart on Tuesday issued a statement on the matter on one of its Web sites, www.walmartfacts.com1. The retailer also distributed it to its 1.3 million U.S. employees.

"We take pride in the fact that we treat every customer, every supplier and every member of our individual communities fairly and equally," the statement reads. "We are working hard to make our corporate contributions reflect the values of our customers, communities and associates."

Wal-Mart, Bentonville, Ark., already faces an organized media campaign from one of its biggest critics -- the United Food and Commercial Workers union's WakeUpWalMart.com2 -- to dissuade shoppers from visiting its stores this weekend. And the retailer already anticipates a challenging start to the holiday season: It predicts it will post no gain in same-store sales -- or sales at stores open for at least a year -- for November.

Wal-Mart has made one change that might appeal to Christian groups. It intends to make "Merry Christmas" a prominent theme in its marketing and in-store signs this year, as opposed to the "Happy Holidays" that some retailers have used in the past to the ire of Christian groups.

John Fleming, Wal-Mart's chief marketing officer, said in an interview on Monday that the retailer's "single greatest portion of customers celebrates Christmas, and it is important to them." For example, the section in Wal-Mart stores including Christmas lights and other decorations is now labeled a Christmas shop rather than a holiday shop.

"This is really about listening to our customers and our associates," Mr. Fleming said of the "Merry Christmas" theme. "As one of our associates pointed out last year, 'Why do we call it a holiday shop when it has Christmas trees in it? It's a Christmas tree. We should call it a Christmas tree."

Wal-Mart, which operates nearly 4,000 stores in the U.S. and more than 2,700 abroad, logged more than $312 billion in revenue last year.

Birthrate Among Teenagers Drops To Record Low (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, November 22, 2006

The birthrate among U.S. teens, which has been falling since its peak in 1991, dropped to an all-time low in 2005, according to preliminary data released Tuesday by the National Center for Health Statistics, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Among Hispanic teens, though, the birthrate is twice as high as the overall teen birthrate.

Overall, the preliminary 2005 rate for females ages 15-19 was 40.4 births per 1,000, down from 41.1 in 2004 and 61.8 in 1991. The Hispanic rate for teens 15-19 was 81.5, down from 82.6 in 2004 and 104.6 in 1991.

Abstinence and contraceptive use “are still driving factors” behind the declining teen birthrate, says demographer Stephanie Ventura, co-author of the report.

Fear of contracting a sexually transmitted disease has helped spur teens to use condoms or delay having sex, says Bill Albert, deputy director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, a non-profit group based in Washington.

“AIDS has a way of getting a guy's attention in a way pregnancy did not,” Albert says.

Some highly effective contraceptives weren't available in 1991, Albert notes. One, Depo-Provera, requires one shot every three months, he says.

Still, Albert says, citing the Hispanic teen birthrate, “there are some hints here that the impressive progress that the nation has made may be slowing down.”

Language and cultural differences may partly explain why the gap between the Hispanic teen birthrate and the overall teen birthrate is as wide as ever, he says.

To help narrow the gap in Washington, Mary's Center for Maternal and Child Care runs programs for teens and preteens, says Vanessa DeCarbo, director of advocacy and communication.

Program goals include motivating young people to consider the impact a baby would have on their families and on their economic futures, DeCarbo says.

Other record findings in the preliminary 2005 births data:

•The proportion of births to unmarried women rose to 36.8% — or more than 1.5 million babies — in 2005, up from 35.8% in 2004. “It's not a teenage issue,” Ventura notes, “which was the case 20, 30, 40 years ago.” About 40% of unmarried women who had their first baby in 2005 lived with the father. “It's not the same as marriage, but at least it suggests some stability,” Ventura says.

•The proportion of preterm babies — those born at less than 37 weeks of gestation — rose to 12.7%, up from 12.5% in 2004. The preterm birthrate has increased 20% since 1990. In addition, the percentage of low-birth-weight babies rose 8.2% — the highest level since 1968 — up from 8.1% in 2005. That rate has increased more than 20% since the mid-1980s.

•The U.S. C-section rate — up 46% since 1996 — hit an all-time high of 30.2%, an increase of 4% over 2004. “It's really going through the roof,” Ventura says. Rates were up for all age groups and all race and Hispanic-origin subgroups.

Assassination Increases Tensions With Syria, Iran (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

President Bush blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination of Christian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq.

While the president stopped short of blaming Syria for the killing, he warned that the United States remains "fully committed" to supporting Lebanon's democracy despite attempts by Damascus, Tehran and their allies in Lebanon "to foment instability and violence." During remarks to U.S. troops in Hawaii, he also charged that the regime of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad is in violation of two U.N. resolutions for its ongoing meddling in Lebanon.

For the past 21 months, the Bush administration has tried to steer the Mediterranean country toward democracy and away from the grips of long-standing Syrian and Iranian influence. As Iraq imploded, the Bush administration hoped that Lebanon might prove an alternative model for the flowering of freedom in the Middle East.

The massive Lebanese protests during the Cedar Revolution last year -- when more than 1 million Lebanese turned out to demand Syria's withdrawal after the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri -- eventually brought down a government and forced Syria to end its 29-year occupation. Elections two months later put in place a parliament dominated by anti-Syrian forces.

But the assassination yesterday of Gemayel, who was a member of the third generation of Lebanon's most prominent Christian political family, signals that the battle for Lebanon is far from over, said U.S. officials and regional experts.

And having the United States as an ally is no protection. "The assassination highlights to what extent the United States is in a position of weakness in the region. . . . It doesn't matter what statements the U.S. makes about coups and assassinations, it still happens," Emile el-Hokayem, an expert on Lebanon at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a defense think tank, said in an interview from Beirut.

Indeed, the bullets that raked Gemayel's car also fired on U.S. policy, analysts say.

"The bullets were meant for an outspoken critic of Syria. The Cedar Revolution is seen as an extension of American power, so the assassination of Gemayel was by extension a way of striking the U.S. as well," said Augustus Richard Norton, a former U.N. peacekeeper in Lebanon and now a professor at Boston University.

Added Lebanese columnist Rami Khouri, currently on a speaking tour in the United States: "This is the new Cold War."

U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said Gemayel's assassination brought new attention to the danger that Syria and Iran are attempting, through Lebanese allies such as Hezbollah, to conduct a coup d'etat against the pro-Western government led by Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

Over the past week, Hezbollah has threatened to hold large protests to demand more cabinet seats for a bloc that also includes the followers of Christian Michel Aoun.

In an interview with MSNBC, Bolton came the closest of any administration official to blaming Damascus. "One pattern we discern in these political assassinations of Lebanese leaders -- journalists, members of parliament -- they are all anti-Syrian. So I suppose one can draw conclusions from that," he said.

Bashar Jaafari, Syria's U.N. ambassador, denied that his government had a hand in Gemayel's killing. "Syria has nothing to do with this," he said, adding that Damascus condemned the assassination as a "horrible" crime.

In an emergency session yesterday, the U.N. Security Council condemned Gemayel's assassination, expressing "grave concern" that it could undermine Lebanon's effort to consolidate its fledgling democracy.

The council also formally approved plans to create an international tribunal to seek justice for the assassinations of Hariri and other prominent political targets. Most of the killings have been widely linked to Syria.

The tribunal has been a growing flash point between Syria and the international community, as well as among Lebanese. Many U.S. experts say that the recent political turmoil, including the resignation of six Shiite cabinet ministers in an attempt to bring down the government, appears to have been orchestrated by Damascus as way to force a deal with the outside world -- possibly including the survival of the Lebanese government in exchange for dropping the idea of a tribunal that might attempt to try senior Syrian officials.

Staff writers Michael Fletcher, in Hawaii with the president, and Colum Lynch in New York contributed to this report.

Leaders Condemn Assassination Of Lebanese Cabinet Minister (NYT)

By Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — The assassination of the Lebanese cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel was widely condemned today as an act of terrorism that threatens to upend not only Lebanon's stability, but also tentative moves to engage Syria in talks on regional peace initiatives.

"It's going to complicate U.S. efforts both in Lebanon and with Israeli-Palestinian peace and in Iraq," said Hady Amr, a Brookings Institution fellow of Lebanese descent.

Britain, France, Egypt, the European Union and the United States issued powerful condemnations of the killing. King Abdullah of Jordan called it "a cowardly act that targets the security and stability of Lebanon."

Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state, described the killing as an act of terrorism and intimidation. "We believe it's the responsibility of all countries to support the Siniora government and to oppose those who would try to divide Lebanon or return violence to political life in Lebanon," he said, referring to Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister.

The killing was also condemned today by Syria, which is widely believed to have played a role in the February 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, and by spokesmen for Hezbollah, the pro-Syrian Shiite Muslim party and militia in Lebanon, which is pressing for more power in the government there. Hezbollah's demands, and the resignation of its cabinet members when talks over them broke down Nov. 11, have precipitated a political crisis in Beirut.

Many in Lebanon reacted with anger and frustration over the killing of Mr. Gemayel, and pointed accusing fingers at Syria. Among them is Saad Hariri, the son of Rafik Hariri, whose death sparked an enormous outpouring of anti-Syrian anger among Lebanese, dubbed the Cedar Revolution, that helped force Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon last year.

Mr. Hariri said the killing would make the Lebanese people more determined to embrace an international tribunal the United Nations wants to establish to investigate his father's death and conduct trials in the case.

The American ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, spoke with visible anger about the killing. Asked by a reporter whether the tribunal should now be delayed to avoid fanning instability, he said sharply: "How incredibly wrong that would be.

"Instability? They're killing people in Lebanon, they're assassinating political leaders. Not the time to seek justice?"

Mr. Bolton said he hoped the United Nations would now move quickly to set up the tribunal.

Bernard Reich, a professor of international relations at George Washington University who studies terrorism, suggested that Syria has been trying to keep its apparent involvement in Mr. Hariri's death out of the spotlight.

"Syria clearly is trying to deflect attention from these reports, by virtue of Hezbollah actions, the link to Iraq, the connection to Iran," he said, referring of recent diplomatic moves by the regime in Damascus. "I think this just makes the entire situation far more complicated."

The killing, Mr. Reich continued, was "a bullet not just into Gemayel, but into Lebanese political stability and political cooperation."

"I see nothing good, nothing positive, in this action for any of the major issues that affect U.S. policy or Lebanon or Israel."

James Steinberg, who was a deputy national security adviser to President Bill Clinton, said that Syria was only one possible suspect in a region where politics amounts to "wheels within wheels within wheels."

"There are so many potential candidates who might have played a role," said Mr. Steinberg, who is now the dean of the school of government at the University of Texas. "If you look at it rationally, the Syrians are on a semi-roll now, so why would they do something like that? It doesn't make sense for government policy, but could it be a rogue element? Yes. Gemayel's had a lot of enemies. Could it be one of them? Could there be a Hezbollah role?"

Still, he said, the presumption of a Syrian role is likely to be so widespread that unless Damascus moves strenuously to establish its innocence, the recent push by Britain and by several prominent figures in Washington to engage Syria in talks with the United States on stabilizing Iraq could be disrupted.

What immediate impact the Gemayel assassination will have on the internal situation in Lebanon was unclear.

"I wouldn't rule out the possibility that it could re-rally the forces of moderation," Mr. Steinberg said. "They may be saying, 'The time has come to stiffen our spines again.' "

Mr. Amr, the Brookings fellow, predicted that the pro-Western Siniora government o would "dig in its heels and say, 'This is a sign that we cannot give in to terror.' "

But Mr. Amr, interviewed by telephone in Doha, Qatar, where he had just spent hours on the phone with Lebanese friends, said he was worried about the popular response.

"The real crisis is not going to be initially in the government side, but in how do the Lebanese people respond," he said. "Are we going to see mass anti-Hezbollah demonstrations and mass pro-Hezbollah demonstrations? I fear there's a potential for that.

"It's clear that Lebanon is in big trouble."

Mr. Bolton, pressed by a CNN reporter on the possibility of conflict erupting in Lebanon, responded, "Don't you think that assassination amounts to civil conflict now?"

U.S., Bush Denounce Slaying In Lebanon (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

DOJ_NMG_0097242

President Bush denounced Tuesday's assassination of a Lebanese leader as "the vicious face of those who oppose freedom" and said that Syria and Iran are trying to undermine the democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

From Washington, the State Department called the murder of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel, a foe of Syrian involvement in the country, an act of terrorism and intimidation.

Bush and other U.S. officials stopped short of specifically blaming Iran or Syria for the assassination, although the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, raised the possibility. The president called for a full investigation to identify "those people and those forces" behind it.

"We support the Saniora government and its democracy and we support the Lebanese people's desire to live in peace," Bush said after having breakfast with U.S. troops stationed here. "And we support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country."

An intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity about the evolving situation in Lebanon, said it's not yet clear who is responsible for the assassination. There is no evidence now to substantiate Syrian involvement, although the country remains a suspect. "Nothing is being ruled out," the official said.

Bush said the U.N. Security Council must move quickly to establish a special tribunal to investigate the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The Security Council is facing a deadline to approve a letter endorsing an agreement with Lebanon to create a tribunal.

"I strongly believe that the United Nations Security Council ought to act today," Bush said sternly. "For the sake of peace, the free world must reject those who undermine young democracies and murder in the name of their hateful ideology."

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters the administration was shocked by the assassination.

"We view it as an act of terrorism," he said. "We also view it as an act of intimidation."

Burns took note of recent statements by Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and others that he said are meant "to destabilize Lebanon and to divide the country."

Nasrallah has urged his followers to prepare for mass demonstrations to topple the U.S.-supported government headed by Saniora if it ignores Hezbollah's demands to form a national unity Cabinet. Hezbollah, an ally of Syria, gained political strength in the country as a result of the war it fought last summer against Israel.

The U.S. has accused Syria and Iran of plotting to topple Saniora's government, which is dominated by politicians opposed to Syrian influence in Lebanon.

Referring to an investigation into the assassination in 2005 of Hariri, who also tried to limit Syrian influence in the country, Bolton told reporters: "I think people can draw their own conclusions."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Saniora with condolences and to reiterate U.S. support for democracy in Lebanon, Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said.

Burns praised Saniora's 20-month old government, seeing it as a step toward returning Lebanon "to a position of real sovereignty, freeing it from Syria's influence and from "the politics of violence and assassination."

"We believe it is the responsibility of all countries to support the Saniora government," he said. "We will give full support to the Saniora government in the days and weeks ahead."

In brief remarks at the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said of the killing, "It is certainly a tragedy for Lebanon and for those in Lebanon and that part of the world that believe in peace and representative systems."

Lebanon Official Critical Of Syria Is Assassinated (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 21 — Pierre Gemayel, a Lebanese cabinet minister and strong opponent of Syrian influence in Lebanon, was gunned down in his car here on Tuesday afternoon, jolting a nation already paralyzed by political conflict that threatens to topple the government.

The killing of Mr. Gemayel, the 34-year-old scion of a prominent Maronite Christian family, inflamed tensions between the anti-Syria coalition trying to hold its government together and the Syrian-allied opposition, led by Hezbollah. An Iranian-supported Shiite group, Hezbollah has threatened street protests if it is not given more power. The demonstrations were expected Thursday — now, there will be a funeral instead.

Lebanese radio reported that shots were also fired Tuesday into the Beirut office of Michel Pharaon, a Greek Catholic member of the ruling coalition and minister for parliamentary affairs.

Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, vowed in a televised speech that his government would hold firm. "I pledge to you that your blood will not go in vain," Mr. Siniora said. "We will not let the murderers control the fate of Lebanon and the future of its children."

In truth, his government may already be on life support. Last week, six pro-Syria ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned after a failed effort to gain greater control over the government. A seventh minister resigned earlier in an unrelated conflict. With Mr. Gemayel's death, there may now be too few ministers to pass any measures, and it appears that if the government were to lose one more minister it would automatically collapse.

The prime minister's political allies in the so-called March 14 coalition — a pro-Western group of Sunni Muslims, Druse and Christians — blamed Syria for Tuesday's killing. "We believe the hand of Syria is all over the place," Saad Hariri, the son of the assassinated former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, said shortly after Mr. Gemayel was pronounced dead.

Officials in Damascus and Syria's allies in Lebanon condemned the killing.

Mr. Gemayel, the industry minister, was the fifth anti-Syria figure to be killed since Mr. Hariri's assassination rocked Lebanon in February 2005.

The killing reverberated far beyond Lebanon. Condemnations poured in from Britain, Germany, Italy, France, the European Union, Jordan, Egypt and the United States.

President Bush suggested in a statement that the assassination was part of a plan by Syria, Iran and its allies to "foment instability and violence" in Lebanon.

The United States is heavily invested in the survival of Mr. Siniora's government, which has offered Washington a chance — however faded — to thwart the spread of Iranian influence in the region.

The killing also is likely to complicate any American effort to enlist Syria's help to stabilize Iraq. The United States withdrew its ambassador from Damascus after Mr. Hariri was assassinated nearly two years ago and suspicion fell heavily on Syria. Now the White House is under pressure domestically and abroad to engage with Syria and Iran to quell the violence in Iraq.

But the suspicion that Syria is behind the efforts to destabilize Lebanon will make it nearly impossible for Washington to send a full ambassador back to Damascus without appearing to have abandoned the Siniora government.

At the same time, any allegation of Syria's involvement is likely to antagonize Syrian officials — and make them even more reluctant to back off of a military, political and economic alliance with Iran.

For a time, after the initial occupation of Iraq and the assassination of Mr. Hariri, Syria's ruling elite felt threatened, vulnerable and isolated. Syria was humiliated when it was forced, after the Hariri killing, to withdraw its military forces from Lebanon.

But in recent days, Syria has found its strategic stature in the Middle East bolstered by the surge of violence in Iraq, and the suggestion that the United States might soon ask for its help. While it has denied any role in any of the Lebanon violence, it has not denied its desire to reinsert itself as the primary force in Lebanese affairs.

"This is a crime against Lebanon, all of Lebanon," Hassan Khalil, a pro-Syria member of Parliament and member of the Shiite Amal party, said in a television interview. "This is a crime that we condemn."

In the complex and shadowy world of Lebanon's long-warring factions, conspiracy theories can cut both ways. Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies said the only beneficiaries of Mr. Gemayel's death were anti-Syria forces. They also argued that the newly inflamed environment would make it impossible for Hezbollah to follow through anytime soon with its promised protests.

The United Nations Security Council, spurred by Mr. Gemayel's killing, on Tuesday approved a proposal by Secretary General Kofi Annan for the creation of an international tribunal to try those accused of Mr. Hariri's assassination.

The tribunal still has one major hurdle to clear before it can go to work: it must be approved by the government of Lebanon, which is deeply divided over its existence. Moreover, no one has yet been charged in Mr. Hariri's killing.

While young, Mr. Gemayel was a third-generation politician from a family that founded a far-right, nationalist party called Phalange. The party fielded the largest militia during Lebanon's civil war and sought to unite Christians against all other groups. The party today is very small, yet Mr. Gemayel stood as a potent symbol to a portion of Lebanon's Christian community that is frightened and angered by its loss of primacy in Lebanon's political arena.

"He is not powerful in himself," said Elie Fawaz, a Lebanese political analyst. "But his uncle was president, his father was president, his grandfather founded the Phalange. He's a symbol of all that history much more than he is a power on the streets. This is a great blow to Lebanese Christians in general."

The latest assassination to scar the Gemayel family — Mr. Gemayel's uncle, Bashir, was also killed — occurred in broad daylight, in a brazen attack even for a country weary of political killings. While other anti-Syria figures have been killed in the past two years, Mr. Gemayel was the first to be shot in the head and not blown up with a bomb.

Mr. Gemayel was in the passenger seat of his own silver Kia, driving through the Christian neighborhood of Jdeideh, which he represented in Parliament. At about 4 p.m., a car rammed into Mr. Gemayel's and three gunmen rushed his car, spraying it with bullets from silencer-equipped automatic weapons, Lebanese security officials said. The driver, who was not injured, drove to St. Joseph's Hospital, where Mr. Gemayel was soon declared dead.

Crowds of supporters gathered outside the hospital, weeping, waving their fists and screaming anti-Syria slogans even before the death was confirmed.

Mr. Gemayel's father, Amin, tried to calm tensions. Shocked and drawn, the former president stood in the street outside the hospital, speaking to reporters and supporters.

"I would like to ask those who love Pierre to preserve the cause," he said. "We don't want to do anything instinctively. He was serving the cause, and he died for Lebanon, for freedom and for humanity. And we should not desecrate his memory by any irresponsible acts."

While there was anger in the streets, there was also palpable anxiety. The city slowed down, as it might before a storm. Shops closed early in downtown Beirut; the army began patrolling the streets.

In a cafe in Hamra, a predominantly Muslim neighborhood in western Beirut, the manager went around to each table, quietly telling guests the news and urging them to go straight home and stay off the streets in case there were demonstrations.

On the campus of the American University of Beirut, hundreds of students gathered near the main gate, discussing the news in hushed tones. Ali Hamadeh, 18, a first-year civil engineering student, voiced the fears of many students in describing his anxieties about the future.

"We think it may lead to another civil war," Mr. Hamadeh said. "It's a disaster for Lebanon, on the level of the Hariri assassination. The people will go to the streets — and at the very least the government will change."

Latest Political Killing In Lebanon Stirs Fears Of Wider Power Struggle (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The assassination of a prominent Christian cabinet minister inflamed a political crisis in Lebanon, threatening to further destabilize a country buffeted by Washington's struggle for regional influence with Syria and Iran.

The murder of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel -- who was killed by gunmen who rammed his car and then shot him through its window -- sharpens the divisions between factions backed by Washington and those supporting Hezbollah, the armed militia and Shiite Islamist social movement that fought a war this summer with Israel. Iran and Syria both support Hezbollah -- which, buoyed by what it terms a "victory from God" over Israel, has been gearing up in recent days for big protests to press demands for a new government.

The killing also complicates the policy debate about Iraq in Washington, where some foreign-policy experts have urged the Bush administration to reach out to Syria and Iran in an effort to curb Iraq's violence. Mr. Gemayel was an outspoken critic of Syria, and his allies immediately blamed his murder on Damascus.

While groping for an alternative strategy for Iraq, Washington is also wrestling with a wider issue roiling the entire Middle East: the rise of Shiite Islam. Iran and Hezbollah, the Lebanese militia it helped set up in the 1980s, are predominantly Shiite. Syria's regime, though largely secular, is dominated by members of the Alawite sect, an offshoot of Shiite Islam.

Since spring, say U.S. officials, Washington has been trying to bolster ties with Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Sunni Arab allies in the Middle East. These efforts range from developing joint maritime patrols to a regional missile-defense shield for these countries. Washington has also given strong backing to Lebanon's government, in which Sunnis and Christians hold most senior posts.

Yesterday's murder in Beirut jeopardized the stability of this government and stirred fears that Syria is seeking to sow chaos. "Their aim is to kill every free person," said parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, who interrupted a presentation to announce news of Mr. Gemayel's murder. The audience shouted in anger. He later told CNN that "the hand of Syria is all over the place." 1

Mr. Hariri's father, Rafik Hariri, was murdered in a bomb attack early last year that a United Nations investigation has linked to Syrian officials. Syria denied involvement in the Hariri killing and yesterday's as well. Along with Hezbollah, it condemned the assassinations.

Washington stopped short of directly blaming Syria for the 34-year-old Mr. Gemayel's killing but said it underscored the need to accelerate the U.N. probe into the Hariri murder. President Bush condemned what he called "Syria's refusal to cease and desist from its continuing efforts to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government," adding that the U.S. would "resist these efforts." The U.N. Security Council issued a statement expressing grave concern at the possible impact of Mr. Gemayel's assassination on efforts "to solidify democracy" in Lebanon and condemning "any attempt to destabilize Lebanon through political assassination or other terrorist acts."

U.S. officials said a U.N. tribunal being set up to judge Mr. Hariri's killers should also investigate yesterday's slaying. The U.N. Security Council condemned the murder yesterday and also approved an agreement with the Beirut government that formally establishes the guidelines governing the Hariri tribunal. U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton bristled at suggestions by some at the U.N. that the Hariri probe should be slowed to reduce the risk of further instability in Lebanon. "They're assassinating political leaders. [It's] not the time to seek justice?" Mr. Bolton said after a meeting at the U.N. "There may be those on the Security Council who say it. Let them step forward and say it."

The flurry of accusations against Syria comes as Damascus has been trying to expand its role as a regional player. Its foreign minister visited Baghdad this week to re-establish diplomatic relations with Iraq after a break of more than two decades, and its regime has worked closely with Iran in recent years.

Pressure meanwhile has mounted on the Bush administration to engage Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch the sectarian violence consuming Iraq. Robert Gates, the recently nominated U.S. secretary of defense, has called in recent months for dialogue with Tehran. And former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton are heading a commission studying the Iraq war that is expected to recommend talking directly with Syria and Iran.

Lebanon's current round of political turmoil began earlier this month when Hezbollah and its allies withdrew from an otherwise pro-American cabinet. The move was widely seen by Hezbollah's critics as an attempt to derail the Hariri tribunal's formation. When the government approved the tribunal despite the walkout, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah told supporters to prepare for mass protests to topple a government he derided as a U.S. puppet.

The political showdown between Hezbollah and the government has shattered a brief period of national unity over the summer, when Israel's bombardment of Lebanon enraged and united most of the country's feuding groups. "This is going to be a very difficult period....People expected demonstrations, but not a return to assassinations," said Riad Tabbarah, a former Lebanese ambassador to Washington who heads a Beirut research center. "How far it will go, I don't think anyone knows."

Mr. Gemayel's murder is the fifth of a prominent public figure in Lebanon in the past two years. Several other assassination attempts have left their victims badly injured. Most victims have been opponents of Syria. Mr. Gemayel died in the hospital after gunmen opened fire on his car as he drove back from a visit to a church north of Beirut.

The murder stunned Beirut and led to small, scattered protests. The Lebanese army deployed in force on the streets of the capital, manning roadblocks and reinforcing positions around the houses of leading politicians. Beirut's mobile-telephone system, overloaded by calls, spluttered. Politicians mixed calls for calm with angry accusations.

The youngest member of the Lebanese cabinet, Mr. Gemayel wasn't a political heavyweight. But he belonged to one of Lebanon's most powerful and divisive political dynasties. His grandfather, also called Pierre, opposed French colonial rule of Lebanon but, after independence, cultivated close ties with France and other Western states, which he regarded as bulwark against the rising tide of Arab nationalism. He founded the Christian Phalange Party, and served as both a cabinet minister and National Assembly member.

The younger Mr. Gamayel's uncle, who headed a Christian militia that sided with Israel during its 1982 assault on mainly Muslim West Beirut, was murdered. His father, Amin Gemayel, is a former president who battled sectarian foes during Lebanon's civil war with help from U.S. forces sent by President Reagan. The U.S. withdrew from the conflict after a suicide-bomb attack in Beirut killed 241 Marines in 1983 -- which the U.S. blames on Hezbollah.

Today, Washington again is deeply embroiled in Lebanon's volatile political struggles -- and the wider regional rivalries that shape them. The U.S has no troops on the ground, but has boosted financial and military assistance to Lebanon's military as means to build a counterweight to Hezbollah, which Washington condemns as a terrorist organization and wants disarmed. The U.S. has also played an unusually public role in Lebanese domestic politics. Last week, the American Ambassador to Lebanon, Jeffrey D. Feltman, met with Amin Gemayel to assure him the U.S. would back Lebanon's increasingly beleaguered government.

U.S. support for the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, a former banker, has met with mockery from Hezbollah, which repeatedly reminds supporters the U.S. helped arm Israel for its attacks on Lebanon this summer and resisted calls for an early cease-fire. "It is the government of Feltman, not of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora," Mr. Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, announced at a rally during the weekend. He vowed protests to either bring down the government or force early elections.

Bracing for trouble, Beirut residents last night retreated to their homes, leaving streets largely deserted. "At the moment we will listen to our leader's call for calm, but it is going to be very, very difficult," said Sami Haddad, a 22-year-old student, "But I can't guarantee what will happen later. Are we expected to just stand by?"

Killing Seen As Bid By Damascus, Tehran To Hit U.S. Role In Mideast (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The brazen assassination yesterday of Christian Cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel has pushed Lebanon's fragile democracy, heralded by the United States as a model for the region, to the brink of collapse.

Coming amid moves by Syria and Iran to improve relations with Iraq, the killing also was seen by analysts as part of a coordinated attempt to push the United States out of the Middle East.

"This is part of a broader effort on the part of Syrians and Iranians in their own isolation to prove they have leverage over events in the region and to minimize the role of the U.S. in the region," said former U.S. ambassador to Morocco, Marc Ginsberg.

Suspicion immediately focused on Syria, which stands to be deeply embarrassed by a proposed international tribunal that would investigate its suspected role in the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005.

The U.N. Security Council approved plans for the tribunal hours after the killing yesterday, but it must still be approved by a weakened Lebanese government.

"We can add this to the list of Syrian killings of anti-Syrians in Lebanon," said David Schenker of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. Mr. Gemayel was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years.

"There is obviously a concern that a U.N. investigation would be so thorough and comprehensive it will get to the bottom of who killed Hariri and the other murders in Lebanon, and obviously there are some people very nervous about that," Mr. Schenker said.

Syrian officials denied any involvement in the latest assassination, which rattled a Lebanese government already battered by a wave of Cabinet resignations and the threat of street demonstrations by Hezbollah.

"Syria had nothing to do with this," said Syria's U.N. Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari.

But Amal Mudallali, foreign affairs adviser to the head of Lebanon's largest parliamentary faction, said Mr. Gemayal's killing had been carefully planned.

"The assassination is aimed at stopping the international tribunal," she said. "It is the second time they have killed a Lebanese politician when the U.N. Council was meeting on Hariri -- it is not a coincidence. ...

"This is a struggle for the future of Lebanon and it is being written today and the Lebanese people are writing it with their blood," she said.

Following the walkout of five Hezbollah and one Christian minister on Nov. 11, the death of Mr. Gemayal leaves the anti-Syrian Cabinet with just one member more than the minimum to maintain a constitutional quorum.

"In Lebanon you are getting very close to bringing this government down," said Mr. Schenker. "Only two more people out of 17 have to die."

In broader terms, analysts saw the killing as part of a concerted effort by Iran and Syria to flex their muscles just as pressure is mounting in Washington for President Bush to seek their help in stabilizing Iraq.

Syria yesterday formally established diplomatic relations with Baghdad for the first time in 20 years, while Iraqi President Jalal Talabani is expected to travel to Tehran for talks as early as this weekend. Syria may also be represented at that meeting.

"Iran is projecting its power in the region and sending a message to the U.S.," said Robert Rabil, director of graduate studies at the political science department at Florida Atlantic University.

"It is an assertion of Shi'ite politics, and the Islamists, led by Iran, are using Syria to project their power in the region. So now Iran has a say in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and in Iraq now they have a strong say."

Mr. Bush, in Honolulu on his way home from an Asian summit, stopped short of specifically blaming anyone for the assassination but pledged to defend Lebanon's democracy "against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Washington viewed the murder as "an act of terrorism. We also view it as an act of intimidation."

Hezbollah and its supporters quit Lebanon's Cabinet on Nov. 11 after their demands for a larger role in the government were rejected. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has vowed to take the group's cause to the streets and bring down the government.

Mr. Ginsberg said it would be a fallacy to think that Sheik Nasrallah was acting for strictly domestic reasons.

"He is a pawn of Iran," Mr. Ginsberg said. "It is like watching a chess player -- Iran -- begin playing some very good matches. We had better stop playing checkers or we are going to wind up handing the Middle East over to our adversaries."

Fears Of Civil Strife Rise In Lebanon (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

BEIRUT, Nov. 21 -- One of Lebanon's most pronounced political crises in a generation slid into bloodshed Tuesday when assailants showered gunfire on a car carrying an anti-Syrian politician and scion of the country's most prominent Christian family, killing him and a bodyguard and pushing Lebanon a step closer to civil strife.

The assassination of Pierre Gemayel, a divisive figure in a country riven by sectarian tension, underlined the lack of red lines in the escalating struggle over Lebanon's political future that has followed this summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. The struggle is crucial not only to the often zero-sum calculations of Lebanese politics but also to the regional ambitions of the United States, Iran, Syria and Israel.

"We will not allow assassins to control Lebanon's destiny and its people's future," Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said.

The shots along a busy street that killed Gemayel, the industry minister, reverberated across Beirut as dusk fell. In the city's Shiite Muslim south, where Gemayel was among the most reviled of Christian politicians, occasional gunfire erupted in celebration and some residents expressed satisfaction at his death. Across town, in Christian East Beirut, his supporters set fires in protest along usually busy intersections, sending smoke eddying over emptied streets. At the hospital where he was taken, scores gathered in the lobby and parking lot. Some hurriedly spoke into phones. Their eyes red, women sobbed and men wailed with grief.

"We want revenge!" a few shouted. "We want revenge!"

"I have one wish," Gemayel's father, former president Amin Gemayel, told them after nightfall, "that tonight be a night of prayer to contemplate the meaning of this martyrdom and how to protect this country. I call on all those who appreciate Pierre's martyrdom to preserve his cause and for all of us to remain in the service of Lebanon. We don't want reactions and revenge."

As he left, the crowd shouted, "Amin, don't frown! If you want soldiers, we'll don their uniforms."

Gemayel, a 34-year-old father of two and an up-and-coming politician, was killed when his car was ambushed by men from one or two cars that collided with it in the suburban neighborhood of Jdeideh. At least three gunmen opened fire with automatic weapons equipped with silencers, hitting him in the head and chest, officials said. Television footage showed the tinted driver's-side window pocked with at least eight shots and the glass on the passenger's side shattered. The silver sedan's hood was crumpled from the collision.

Doctors said Gemayel was dead when he arrived at the hospital, and his bodyguard later succumbed to his wounds.

Foreign leaders and officials across the Lebanese divide were unanimous in condemning the assassination. President Bush called for an international investigation to "identity those people and those forces behind the killing."

Gemayel's allies were quick to put his killing in the context of a series of assassinations that followed the death of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in a car bombing in February 2005, a turning point in Lebanese politics that led to the departure of Syrian troops from the country. Gemayel's supporters blamed Syria for his death, as they did with Hariri's and the subsequent assassinations of three other anti-Syrian figures. Gemayel, though, was the first killed since Hariri to have an organized and fervent following.

The Syrian government, in a statement carried by its news agency, denied any role in Gemayel's death, as it has in the previous killings.

Lebanon has been locked in a cold war of sorts since Hariri's assassination and the protests that ensued over Syria's 29-year presence here. The largest demonstration, which took place in Beirut's Martyrs' Square on March 14, 2005, was organized by a coalition of Sunni Muslim, Druze and Christian politicians who would take control of the government in parliamentary elections. The event built momentum for the Syrian withdrawal.

Six days earlier, though, a pro-Syrian protest was convened by Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim movement that fought Israel this July and August and remains the most powerful ally here of Iran and Syria. Since then, Lebanon has been symbolized by those two protests -- divided by sect, outlook, ideology and foreign policy.

The simmering struggle flared this month when Hezbollah and its Christian ally, Michel Aoun, demanded greater representation in the cabinet. Four rounds of talks failed, and two Hezbollah ministers, three other Shiites and an allied politician resigned on Nov. 11, depriving the cabinet of its Shiite representation and the symbolic sectarian consensus on which Lebanese politics depends.

Two days later, the depleted cabinet endorsed a U.N. proposal for an international tribunal to try suspects in Hariri's death, a step Syria has adamantly resisted. This weekend, in another escalation, Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah insisted that the government resign or hold early parliamentary elections. Otherwise, he said, his followers would conduct days, even weeks of protests to bring the government down.

Gemayel's killing was sure to recalculate the arithmetic of the crisis. Some speculated that, given the tension the killing has unleashed, Hezbollah might pause in its threats to begin protests as early as this week. Nasrallah has called sectarian strife unacceptable, and in a statement Tuesday night, Hezbollah warned of repercussions over the killing.

"There is no doubt that those who carried out this crime want to push Lebanon into chaos, loss and civil war," it said.

Since Nasrallah pressed his demand for a greater share of power in late October, Lebanese have been faced with what amounts to a long wait: sensing that something might happen, but not sure what or when. Last week, a hard-line Christian leader, Samir Geagea, predicted that assassinations might be ahead. Others warned that killing three ministers would deprive the cabinet of one-third of its members and, by law, force it to resign, as Hezbollah has demanded. Partisan television stations have railed at one another, streets are awash with politically loaded posters and emigration is the stuff of everyday conversation.

But the turn to violence Tuesday seemed to scare leaders as much as it angered them. Walid Jumblatt, a Druze leader and one of Hezbollah's most outspoken foes, showed up at St. Joseph's Hospital, where Gemayel's body was taken. He spoke briefly to Gemayel's father, who served as president from 1982 to 1988, then turned to the crowd. "Beware," he said. "Let's not give the opportunity to the killers to lead us to civil strife."

Lebanese television broadcast statement after statement appealing for calm from officials in both camps. Aoun, whose alliance with Hezbollah has deeply split the Christian community, appealed for restraint.

"We call on all blocs to practice wisdom and to not fall into what the perpetrators seek," he said.

Gemayel, a rising star in the right-wing Phalangist Party founded by his grandfather and namesake, was expected to carry the mantle of a family that ascended from humble beginnings to become one of the country's most prominent Christian clans. During Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war, the party fielded the largest Christian militia and was allied with Israel. His uncle, Bashir Gemayel, was elected president in 1982 but was assassinated days before he was to take office in an explosion many blamed on Syria.

Pierre Gemayel was elected to parliament in 2000 and again in 2005, emerging as a pivotal player in the anti-Syrian coalition and winning a reputation as one of the most hard-line of Christian leaders. He was a vocal critic of Hezbollah and its ally, pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud. Even today, many Shiites recall an interview Gemayel gave to a Christian-owned television station in spring 2005 in which he was dismissive of the Shiites' standing as Lebanon's largest group.

"They threaten with quantity of people," he said. "We have the quality."

As during the protests in March 2005, Beirut on Tuesday was of two minds over Gemayel's assassination.

At the hospital, his supporters desperately called on cellphones before word of his death was announced.

"Did you see the body?" one onlooker asked. Another approached an ally of Gemayel's and member of parliament, Elias Atallah, and asked, "Is he dead?" Atallah didn't answer.

News quickly spread, unleashing grief. "Only two days ago I was hugging you," one man cried as he beat the wall. A woman standing outside shouted: "There's nothing left to live for. All that remains are Syrian dogs." Every once in a while, others chanted, "All of us are Pierre Gemayel."

Sentiments soon turned to anger, as the crowd shouted obscenities about Aoun and Nasrallah. Others, huddled in knots, talked about marching on Aoun's headquarters, the presidential palace in Baabda or Nasrallah's stronghold in south Beirut.

Supporters lit fires outside the Phalangist Party headquarters near downtown Beirut and at a nearby intersection. Other fires were lit in trash dumpsters along a street that trailed from Sassin Square, where a monument stands to Gemayel's uncle.

"This is the fire in our hearts," said 50-year-old Yusuf Badawi, as he watched five tires burn.

Down the street, Michel Sangari, a 19-year-old draped in the flag of the Phalangist Party, was bleaker. "A war's going to happen," he said. "Our brothers are prostitutes."

Across town in Haret Hreik, a predominantly Shiite neighborhood, sporadic bursts of gunfire pierced the sky, a traditional show of celebration. They upset Anwar Macki, a 45-year-old pharmacist.

"They say, 'Who cares, let him die. There's one less of them.' " He shook his head in dismay. "If you're against him, it's okay, but you don't have to be happy about it."

He cleared the counter of stray boxes of antibiotics and prepared to close, as his son and daughter waited for him near the door. "Really, the future is obscure," he said finally. "You can't see anything."

Beirut Murder Puts Spotlight On Damascus (FT)

By Roula Khalaf , Guy Dinmore And Dan Dombey

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Moves to bring Syria back into the diplomatic fold were dealt a blow on Tuesday by the killing in Beirut of a prominent anti-Syrian Christian government minister.

The assassination of Pierre Gemayel, the 34-year-old minister of industry who hails from one of Lebanon's most prominent Christian families, plunged a tense and divided country into deeper turmoil. Mr Gemayel was shot in his car in a Beirut suburb.

The killing drew strong condemnation from George W. Bush. Though the US president did not say who he blamed for the killing, Mr Bush said the US supported Lebanese government efforts to "defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence".

The UN Security Council "unequivocally" condemned the assassination, describing Mr Gemayel as a "symbol of the political independence of Lebanon".

Mr Gemayel's assassination was part of a cycle of killings that Lebanon's parliamentary majority, which controls the government, has blamed on Syrian agents. The assassins first struck in February 2005, killing Rafiq Hariri, the former prime minister and a fierce opponent of Syria.

Supporters of Mr Gemayel gathered on Tuesday night at the hospital in the Christian area of Beirut where his body was kept. His funeral was due to be held in Beirut on Thursday morning. Smaller groups burnt tyres at the roads into Christian districts, near what was the front line in Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war.

Saad Hariri, head of the parliamentary majority and son of the murdered former leader, immediately blamed Damascus – a charge that Syria denied.

Damascus condemned the killing as a "heinous terrorist act". Its embassy in Washington said the murder would undermine international efforts to promote engagement with Syria.

The Gemayel murder came just hours after Syria re-established diplomatic relations with Iraq. A senior US state department official suggested that Mr Gemayel had paid the price for trying to rid Lebanon of Syrian influence. The US stopped short of directly accusing Damascus.

The murder threatens to destabilise a government struggling for unity following the month-long summer conflict between Israel and the Hizbollah militant group. The Shia organisation, backed by Syria and Iran, has been seeking to capitalise on its declared victory against Israel by demanding a greater say in government. Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, condemned the Gemayel killing, saying the perpetrators "want to push Lebanon into chaos and a civil war".

Beirut has been bracing for street demonstrations called by Hizbollah with the announced aim of bringing down the government or forcing new elections.

Lebanon's anti-Syrian coalition has warned that ministers could be assassinated as a way of bringing down the cabinet. The government has already been undermined by the resignation of six ministers who belonged to Hizbollah and allied parties.

Western governments have been alarmed by the prospect of the collapse of the Lebanese government at a time when thousands of UN peacekeepers are deployed in the country following the ceasefire that ended the war between Hizbollah and Israel.

Anti-Syrian leaders in Beirut also accused political rivals of seeking to derail plans for a special international tribunal to bring Hariri's killers to justice. Plans for the tribunal were approved by the cabinet last week and are being finalised by the UN.

Key Lebanese Politician Assassinated (AP)

By Zeina Karam And Sam F. Ghattas

AP, November 22, 2006

Pierre Gemayel, scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family and a leading opponent of Syria, was gunned down Tuesday in a brazen daytime hit. The assassination threatened to intensify Lebanon's power struggle between the U.S.-allied government and the Syrian-backed Hezbollah.

Gemayel, 34, was leaving church when he fell into a well-coordinated attack: One vehicle cut off his car from the front, another rammed him from behind, then gunmen burst out and sprayed a dozen bullets into his passenger-side window.

The killing sent tensions spiraling at a time when Lebanon was already facing a worsening political crisis. The Shiite Muslim guerrilla group Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies have threatened massive protests — as early as Thursday — aimed at bringing down Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's government unless it gives them greater power.

President Bush condemned the assassination and accused Syria and Iran of seeking to undermine Saniora's government. Bush stopped short of specifically blaming them for Gemayel's death, though the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, raised the possibility.

Anti-Syrian politicians in Lebanon, however, directly pointed the finger at Damascus, and some Gemayel supporters demanded revenge against Syria's Lebanese allies.

Bands of young Christians broke car windows and burned tires and garbage cans in their areas of Beirut and the Gemayel family's mountain hometown of Bikfaya to the northeast. But Lebanese troops quickly stopped the unrest and set up checkpoints to prevent demonstrations in the coming days. A funeral was set for Thursday in downtown Beirut, with the anti-Syrian factions calling for mass participation.

Politicians from all sides scrambled to contain the fallout of the assassination, urging calm amid fears of an outbreak of the brutal violence between Lebanon's sharply divided communities that marked the 1975-90 civil war.

A stunned-looking former president Amin Gemayel — Pierre's father and leader of the Phalange Party — urged his supporters to observe a night of "prayer and reflection."

"We don't want an outburst of emotions and revenge," he said outside the hospital where his son died. "He was martyred for the cause of Lebanon, and we want this cause to triumph. ... To all those who love Pierre, we should not be driven by instinct."

Bush called the slaying "the vicious face of those who oppose freedom" and vowed support for Saniora's government.

"We support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country," Bush said after having breakfast with U.S. troops stationed in Hawaii.

Saniora's government is dominated by opponents of Syria. Many see the demands by its opponents as a bid by Damascus to restore its influence in its smaller neighbor — and by Hezbollah to boost its power, riding on increased popularity among Lebanon's Shiite Muslim population following this summer's war with Israel.

Pierre Gemayel, an outspoken opponent of Hezbollah, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years and the first member of the Saniora government to be slain. Many in Lebanon have accused Damascus in the previous assassinations, including the 2005 bomb blast that killed former prime minister Rafik Hariri, a claim Syria has denied.

Saniora went on national television to call for unity and warned that "sedition" was being planned against Lebanon. He linked Gemayel's slaying to the issue that sparked the recent crisis with Hezbollah: a plan for an international court to try suspects in the Hariri assassination. He said Lebanese should rally behind the government's backing for such a court.

"I pledge to you that your blood will not go in vain," Saniora said, eulogizing Gemayel. "We will not let the murderers control the fate of Lebanon and the future of its children."

Syria and Iran both condemned Gemayel's slaying, and Syria's Information Minister Mohsen Bilal denied Syria had any role. "Those who are accusing Syria in this sick way ... do not have an iota of truth or credibility," he said on Al-Jazeera.

Tuesday's hit came hours before the U.N. Security Council endorsed a draft document creating the international court to try suspects in the Hariri murder, in which an U.N. investigation has implicated several Syrian officials. The document then goes to the Lebanese government for final approval.

With the possibly explosive atmosphere following Tuesday's assassination, it was not clear whether Hezbollah would go ahead with its threat to hold massive anti-government demonstrations. If it does, it would throw Lebanon deeper into turmoil, putting it into confrontation with many Gemayel supporters now itching for a fight.

Gemayel, the industry minister, was the rising star of his Maronite Christian political family, which has seen four other members killed in the past three decades of Lebanon's violence.

Past attacks on Gemayel's family have sparked brutal reprisals. A 1975 assassination attempt against his grandfather, also named Pierre, prompted Phalangists to attack a busload of Palestinian refugees in what became the spark of a 15-year sectarian civil war. After the killing of Amin Gemayel's brother, Bashir, in a 1982 explosion, his militia supporters stormed Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut, killing hundreds of unarmed civilians in one of the worst atrocities of the Lebanon conflict.

On Tuesday, Gemayel was traveling through his mainly Christian constituency of Jdeideh when a vehicle in front of his slammed to a stop, causing his car to ram into it, security officials said. Witnesses said Gemayel's car was also rammed from behind.

Three gunmen stepped out of the other vehicles and shot Gemayel at point-blank range with automatic weapons fitted with silencers, security officials said.

Video showed Gemayel's car, which apparently had been shot at from both sides: The passenger-side window was shattered and the driver's-side window was dotted with about a dozen bullet holes, and the front hood was crumpled.

Gemayel's driver and another person in the car were wounded. They were rushed to a hospital where Gemayel was pronounced dead. The driver died later Tuesday. The attackers fled.

"We want revenge from Hezbollah and the General (Aoun)!" young men shouted, shaking their fists in the air.

Other Phalange supporters, including women, screamed and wept. They called on supporters to march to a nearby Shiite neighborhood and Aoun's residence in a Christian suburb east of Beirut.

"Nasrallah, Aoun and Lahoud, they killed him," shouted Antoine Shaaya, a man in his late 20s who wore a large cross around his neck. "And we won't be silent after today."

Lebanese Cabinet Minister Shot And Killed In Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A Christian Cabinet minister who had stood against Syrian meddling in Lebanon was shot dead Tuesday, stunning and infuriating a war-haunted nation already teetering on the edge of violence.

Pierre Gemayel, the 34-year-old minister of industry, was gunned down in as he drove through a crowded intersection in the predominantly Christian outskirts of the capital. Witnesses said that at 3:30 p.m. gunmen walked up to the side of the car and shot Gemayel point blank, according to local news reports.

The assassination dealt a hard blow to anti-Syrian leaders, who are struggling to maintain control of the government. To many Lebanese, it was also a symbolically loaded strike against the Christian community.

Gemayel was political heir to one of the most influential — and controversial — Christian dynasties in Lebanon; his family name was shorthand for Christian claims on Lebanon.

As condemnations poured in from Washington, Europe and even Damascus, grave-faced Lebanese leaders took to the airwaves to encourage their people to stay calm — and out of the streets.

"The hand of killers will not terrorize us. Murderers will not control the destiny of Lebanon," Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said. "I call on all Lebanese to unite and cling together, to defend the security and safety of their nation and be careful of this conspiracy to create strife."

The assassination stirred visceral rage at a time when the menace of street fights shadows Lebanon. As word of Gemayel's death raced through the Christian neighborhoods, furious men filled the darkening streets, chanting obscene slogans against Hezbollah; setting fire to garbage bins; attacking a Syrian laborer and a Syrian taxi.

"I hit him and I don't care. What are we waiting for?" a young man shouted hysterically in the darkened street in the Christian neighborhood of Achrifiyeh. He was defending his right to have taken part in beating up a Syrian laborer. "I hit him and anybody who defends Syria is a dog like him."

The other men quieted him down and led him away quickly.

Lebanon was already embroiled in a crisis over who should rule the country. The powerful Hezbollah and its Christian allies have been demanding a greater stake in the government, accusing the anti-Syria government of ruling unconstitutionally and hijacking the country for U.S. and European interests.

Just last week, Hezbollah and its allies quit the Cabinet and declared the remaining government illegitimate. This increasingly outspoken opposition has threatened to stage massive street protests in coming days to topple the government. Many here fear the gatherings could degenerate into brawls and further destabilize a fragile nation.

But it now seems the anti-Syria bloc could well beat Hezbollah into the streets. Late Tuesday, the coalition called upon mourners to turn out en masse for Gemayel's funeral.

Gemayel's death leaves the government dangling on a thread. According to Lebanese law, if one more minister quits, dies or is otherwise unable to work, the Cabinet will automatically lose its right to govern.

Some analysts warned that those seeking to shake the anti-Syria coalition out of power might conspire to eliminate enough ministers to force their downfall.

"This plot started with the resignation of the ministers," said Antoine Haddad, a political analyst affiliated with the anti-Syrian bloc. "It's a bloody game. It's a criminal game."

Patrick Haenni, a Beirut-based analyst with the International Crisis Group, also warned of more political violence.

"We are not far away from the quota that should cause the government to fall," he said. "The continuation of political assassinations should be considered as a possible scenario."

Gemayel's father and uncle were both presidents of Lebanon. His grandfather founded the Kataeb Party, also known as the Phalangist Party.

The family history is a dark one and assassinations of the Gemayels have proven disastrous. After his uncle Bachir was assassinated, the Phalangist militia massacred Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Beirut's southern suburbs. The rampage at the Palestinian camps remains one of the most notorious massacres in Lebanon's long and bloody civil war.

But Tuesday, Lebanese leaders seemed desperate to keep the streets quiet. Amin Gemayel, his face pale and slack, made his way slowly through hordes of mourners to the hospital where his son had died. He paused to beg for calm, speaking with his head tilted and his eyes falling shut.

"I have one wish: That tonight be a night for prayer," Gemayel said. "That we think of the value of martyrdom, and think of how we can protect this country from vengeance. We don't want revenge. We want the Lebanese cause to win."

Despite the talk of Lebanese unity, both sides have been hardening their stances. Even as Gemayel's death fueled their sense of outrage, the "anti-Syria" bloc had shown little willingness to bend to the demands of Hezbollah and its allies.

Just as news of Gemayel's death was spreading through a nerve-shot capital, parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri was sitting before reporters in his mansion — and accusing his enemies of trying to start a "war."

"They say, 'Just do what I say or I will go to the streets,' " Hariri said. "This is a war. They are trying to take us to a war."

Hariri's father, former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, was the most famous in a string of Lebanese who tangled with Damascus and were assassinated. The Syrian regime was widely blamed in all of the slayings, but it was the elder Hariri's death in a car bomb in 2005 that unleashed a decisive crush of anti-Syria sentiment.

Enormous, angry street demonstrations and international outrage forced Damascus to withdraw its soldiers and end de facto military control over Lebanon.

Saad Hariri, backed by the United States, has been pushing the United Nations to establish an international tribunal to prosecute Hariri's killers. He has also accused Hezbollah and its allies of quitting the government in an effort to block the court, which is awaiting a United Nations vote.

Anti-Syrian Minister's Slaying Stuns Lebanon (USAT)

By Andrew Mills Special For

BEIRUT — The assassination Tuesday of an anti-Syrian Cabinet minister who was the son of a former president threatened to ignite a confrontation between rival Lebanese factions.

Pierre Gemayel, 34, the scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family, was gunned down at point-blank range in his car near Beirut. Gemayel, industry minister in the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in Lebanon in the past two years. He was the son of former Lebanese president Amin Gemayel.

Anti-Syrian politicians, including Saad Hariri, blamed Syria for Gemayel's murder. A United Nations probe has focused on possible Syrian involvement in the 2005 bomb blast that killed Hariri's father, former prime minister Rafik Hariri.

DOJ_NMG_0097254

Lebanon has been on edge since this summer, when the armed radical Shiite movement Hezbollah fought a 34-day war with Israel. The country's anti-Syrian factions — Sunni, Druze and Christian — sat out the war, as did Lebanon's army.

In recent weeks, Hezbollah has threatened to bring down the government unless its allies get a greater share of power, including enough Cabinet seats to veto key decisions.

Speaking to U.S. troops in Hawaii, President Bush reiterated his support for Saniora's 20-month-old government. "We support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies, to foment instability and violence in that important country," he said

U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton noted that the White House had warned nearly two weeks ago that Syria and Iran, acting through Hezbollah, might attempt a coup in Lebanon. "One has to wonder whether this despicable assassination is not the first shot," Bolton told CNN.

Six pro-Syrian ministers resigned from Saniora's Cabinet this month. With Gemayel's death, the departure of two more ministers would bring down the government.

Last month, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah threatened to call demonstrations to force the Lebanese government to resign and create a new government giving Shiites more power and Cabinet posts. Such protests could provoke unrest and a return to civil war. Various Lebanese factions fought from 1975 to 1990, and many groups including Hezbollah remain armed.

Nasrallah on Sunday reissued his call for protests. The first was scheduled for Thursday.

Kamal Salibi, a Lebanese historian, warned that street demonstrations by Hezbollah now would "make immediate war with the Christians."

Gemayel was a member of the coalition of Sunni Muslim, Christian and Druze members that governs Lebanon. It is known as the March 14 Coalition for the day in 2005 when anti-Syrian protests prompted the withdrawal of Syrian forces after 29 years in Lebanon.

Syria's troop withdrawal followed massive protests in response to Hariri's assassination. The United Nations Security Council on Tuesday approved the creation of an international court to try suspects in Hariri's death.

Saad Hariri pinned blame for Gemayel's killing on Syria. "We believe the hands of Syria are all over the place," he said.

Gemayel's funeral was set to be held Thursday in downtown Beirut. Anti-Syrian factions called for mass participation, which could spark protests and violence.

"What's most likely now is that the forces from March 14 will have an angry demonstration of their own, pre-empting the protests that Hezbollah was planning," said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Beirut.

Several hundred Gemayel supporters stormed through the streets of Christian East Beirut after the shooting. They overturned dumpsters, lit small fires and tore down posters of Michel Aoun, a prominent Christian allied with Hezbollah and pro-Syrian forces. Thousands of Lebanese forces deployed across the city and manned checkpoints on all major routes.

"We are ready. We need clashes," said Roger Nehme, 19, a computer science student and Gemayel supporter.

Rob Malley, Middle East director for the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization that seeks to prevent conflicts, said the assassination of Gemayel is part of a struggle for power that crosses sectarian lines.

Shibley Telhami, a Middle East expert at the University of Maryland, questioned the accusations against Syria and Hezbollah in Gemayel's death. He noted that both benefited from Hezbollah's summer war with Israel. Telhami suggested Gemayel may have been a victim of infighting among Christian factions. "Don't rush to judgment," he said.

Saniora appealed for calm: "Lebanon will be a master of its destiny. You have not died in vain, Pierre."

Anti-Syrian Lebanese Christian Official Slain (WT/AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT -- Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian politician and scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family, was gunned down yesterday in his mainly Christian constituency of Jdeideh, a suburb of Beirut, heightening a growing sense of crisis in the fragile democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0097255

An outspoken opponent of the Syrian-allied militia Hezbollah, Mr. Gemayel, 34, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years and the first member of the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to be slain.

The industry minister and Phalange Party member had just left a church and was traveling through Jdeideh when a vehicle in front of him slammed to a stop, causing his car to ram it, security officials said. Witnesses said Mr. Gemayel's car was also struck from behind.

Three gunmen stepped out of the vehicles and shot Mr. Gemayel at point-blank range with automatic weapons, security officials said.

Video showed Mr. Gemayel's car, which apparently had been shot at from both sides: the passenger-side window was shattered and the driver's-side window was dotted with about a dozen bullet holes, and the front hood was crumpled.

Mr. Gemayel's driver, who was wounded but survived, rushed the gravely injured politician to a nearby hospital. Soon afterward, Voice of Lebanon -- the Phalange-run radio station -- reported Mr. Gemayel was dead, the fifth member of his family to die in violence.

Damascus' opponents in Lebanon have accused Syria of being behind previous assassinations, particularly that of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed in a bombing in Beirut in February 2005. Syria has denied those claims.

A stunned Amin Gemayel, the slain lawmaker's father and Lebanon's former president, urged his supporters to observe a night of "prayer and reflection over the meaning of martyrdom."

"We don't want an outburst of emotions and revenge," he said outside St. Joseph's hospital, where his son died. "He was martyred for the cause of Lebanon and we want this cause to triumph."

Hundreds gathered at the hospital, and supporters railed against Hezbollah and Michel Aoun, a Hezbollah-allied Christian leader who is a rival of the Phalange.

Wael Abu Faour, an anti-Syrian lawmaker, told Al Jazeera: "We directly accuse the Syrian regime of assassinating Gemayel and hold [Syrian] President Bashar Assad responsible for this assassination ... aimed at sending Lebanon into a civil war."

In an interview with CNN, Saad Hariri, the slain prime minister's son and leader of the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, implicitly blamed Damascus, saying, "We believe the hand of Syria is all over the place." He said Mr. Gemayel was "a friend, a brother to all of us" and appeared to break down after saying: "We will bring justice to all those who killed him."

Mr. Gemayel's death came hours before the U.N. Security Council voted to endorse an agreement with Lebanon to create a tribunal to prosecute suspects in Mr. Hariri's killing.

Four Lebanese generals, top pro-Syrian security chiefs, have been under arrest for 14 months, accused of involvement in Mr. Hariri's slaying.

Pierre Gemayel had been expected to carry the mantle of his political family. Amin Gemayel, his father and the current Phalange leader, was Lebanon's president between 1982 and 1988. His grandfather, Pierre Gemayel, led the right-wing Christian Phalange Party that fielded the largest Christian militia and was allied with Israel during the 1975-90 civil war between Christians and Muslims.

Amin Gemayel's brother, Bashir, was elected president in 1982 but was assassinated days before taking office. Two of Amin Gemayel's nephews and Bashir's daughter were killed in the 1970s and 1980s.

The slain Pierre Gemayel was a prominent figure in Lebanon's anti-Syrian bloc, which dominates the Cabinet of Mr. Siniora and the parliament -- and which is now locked in a power struggle with the Muslim Shi'ite Hezbollah and its allies. He was elected first in 2000, then re-elected in 2005.

Assassins And Diplomacy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Former Secretary of State James Baker has been saying that, when it comes to diplomacy, you don't "restrict your conversations to your friends" -- shorthand for the view that the U.S. should engage Syria and Iran to find solutions in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. But yesterday's murder of Lebanese Minister Pierre Gemayel might remind even Mr. Baker and his Iraq Study Group what some of those non-friends are all about.

"The hand of Syria is all over" Gemayel's assassination, said Saad Hariri, the leader of the parliamentary bloc that helped evict the Syrian army in the spring of 2005. Mr. Hariri knows whereof he speaks: His father, former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, was blown up with 22 others in February 2005, and the preliminary U.N. investigation offered a trail of evidence pointing to Damascus as the culprit.

A who's who of anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians and journalists have also since been targeted for assassination. In June 2005 journalist Samir Kassir was blown up by a car bomb. Three weeks later, politician George Hawi was killed the same way. The following month, Defense Minister Elias Murr narrowly survived a car bombing; Mr. Murr was considered pro-Syrian but claimed he had been threatened by Rustom Ghazali, the longtime chief of Syrian intelligence in Lebanon.

In September 2005, TV anchorwoman May Chidiac lost her left leg and arm in a car-bombing. Three months later, Gibran Tueni, a former publisher and editor of the An-Nahar newspaper, was also killed by a car bomb. He had been calling publicly for Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon for nearly six years and had recently been elected to parliament. Tueni's murder coincided with the release of the interim U.N. report on Hariri's murder.

Curiously, Gemayel was killed just as the U.N. agreed on the composition of an international tribunal to try the case. It is no secret that Syrian President Bashar Assad has been pulling out all the stops to quash the trial. Six pro-Syrian politicians in the Lebanese cabinet recently resigned en masse in an attempt to cripple the government, and Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has been threatening huge demonstrations to bring down the anti-Syrian Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who is also backed by the U.S. and France. Killing Gemayel removes another obstacle to Syrian dominance in Lebanon.

Which brings us back to Mr. Baker and the rest of the U.S. foreign-policy establishment now urging a new entente with Damascus. It's true that every Administration must deal with the world as it is. But when it comes to Syria, do the sages of the Iraq Study Group really want the Bush Administration to seek the benediction of a country that stirs such mayhem in Beirut?

2 Abducted Red Cross Workers Released (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, November 22, 2006

Two Italian Red Cross workers kidnapped Tuesday afternoon were released shortly after midnight, Palestinian security officials said.

Just before their release, the Red Cross said it was suspending its activities in the Gaza Strip, fearing for the safety of its workers.

The abductions — the latest in a series of kidnappings of foreigners in the chaotic territory in recent months — dealt a serious blow to aid efforts in the impoverished zone.

Iyad Nasr, a spokesman for the Red Cross's Gaza office, said the organization had ceased all field operations and would intervene only "in matters of life and death." Workers have been ordered to stay in their offices because of fears for their safety, he said.

Over the past two years, there has been a rash of kidnappings of foreign aid workers and journalists in Gaza, usually by groups or families pressing the government for money or job guarantees. In most cases, the hostages were quickly released. None have been seriously harmed.

The Red Cross facilitates movement of ambulances and emergency supplies in the violence-wracked territory. The open-ended suspension of its activities means further hardships.

The Red Cross said Claudio Moroni, 36, and Gianmarco Onorato, 63, were abducted in Deir el-Balah in central Gaza after their car was stopped by gunmen. Palestinian security officials said one of the Red Cross workers was traveling on a Canadian passport. It was not known which one.

There was no immediate word on the conditions of the released aid workers.

Prior to their release, Palestinian security officials said they searched for the two and mediation efforts were carried ouit.

In Rome, Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema said he had been "constantly informed" about the developments in the kidnapping of the two.

He said in a statement he had given orders to "activate all possible channels" to obtain the release of the two men, and had taken some "personal initiatives" in that direction. He did not elaborate.

West Bank Settlements Often Use Private Palestinian Land, Study Says (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 21 -- An Israeli advocacy group has found that 39 percent of the land used by Jewish settlements in the West Bank is private Palestinian property, which the organization contends is a violation of international and Israeli law guaranteeing property rights in the occupied territories.

In a report released here Tuesday, the Settlement Watch project of Peace Now also disclosed that much of the land that Israeli officials have said would remain part of the Jewish state under any final peace agreement is private Palestinian property.

That includes some of the large settlement blocs inside the barrier that Israel is building to separate Israelis from the Palestinian population in the West Bank. The report states that 86 percent of Maale Adumim on Jerusalem's eastern edge sits on private Palestinian land. A little more than 35 percent of the settlement of Ariel, which cuts deep into the northern West Bank, is also on private property.

Peace Now is an advocacy group that supports the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel and contends that Jewish settlements in the West Bank, where roughly 250,000 Israelis live, represent a major obstacle to achieving one.

Israel's government has long maintained that the settlements, developed in large part with public money, sit on untitled property known as "state land" or on property of unclear legal status. Israeli courts have ruled that unauthorized outposts erected on private Palestinian property must be razed, although those orders are rarely carried out.

The 38-page report offers what appears to be a comprehensive argument against the Israeli government's contention that it avoids building on private land, drawing on the state's own data to make the case. Israeli officials said Tuesday they are studying the findings.

The report's authors, Dror Etkes and Hagit Ofran, note that "it is difficult to assess all of the political and legal implications" of their findings. But "it is clear," they write, "that the settlement enterprise has, since its inception, ignored Israeli law and undermined not only the collective property rights of the Palestinians as a people, but also the private property rights of individual Palestinian landowners." The report states that the settlements occupy a total of 15,271 acres of private Palestinian land.

The report draws on maps and data from the Civil Administration, the military authority Israel established to govern the West Bank following the 1967 Middle East war. Its findings were reported first in Tuesday's New York Times.

The database was also used by a state commission, headed by Talia Sasson, a lawyer, that issued a critical report last year on the expansion of unauthorized Jewish outposts in the West Bank. Peace Now officials said they were leaked the information after Israeli courts delayed a hearing on their petition for the data earlier this year.

The Israeli government did not annex the West Bank after the 1967 war -- keeping the Palestinian population there from voting in the Jewish state -- and soon began sponsoring settlement construction in the territories. International law has been widely interpreted to prohibit civilian settlement or construction on land occupied during war.

As the report notes, the West Bank has been under Ottoman, British, Jordanian and Israeli control over the past century, leaving a highly complicated land registry and murky title in many cases.

The report defines private property in the West Bank as land registered by Palestinians before 1968, when Israel stopped the process, and cultivated land that Israel recognizes as private under Ottoman law. It focuses on the West Bank and does not examine property in East Jerusalem, whose annexation by Israel is not recognized internationally.

Of the land occupied by the settlements, the report found, 54 percent is so-called state land while nearly 6 percent is designated "survey land," meaning its legal status is unclear. The report notes that 1.3 percent of the settlement areas is "Jewish land."

The report says Israel most commonly seizes private land citing "military purposes." That designation leaves the land in the name of its Palestinian owners but gives control to the Israeli army for a period that can be extended indefinitely. In other cases, Palestinians are offered compensation by the Israeli government, something they usually refuse in protest.

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said Tuesday that the government would comment on the report's methods and findings once officials have had time to review it. Olmert won election in March on a pledge to withdraw Israel from much of the West Bank, while holding on to the settlement blocs inside the wall.

"We have to read the full report to understand it," Eisin said. She added that "even if it turns out only 5 percent is private land, that is something we must take note of."

In another development, Israeli troops pushed into the Gaza Strip early Tuesday and killed two Palestinians in fighting near the village of Zeitun. One of them was identified as Ayman Daif Allah, 25, a senior commander of the governing Hamas movement's military wing. Palestinian medical workers said Saadiya Herez, 70, was also killed by gunfire.

The operation is part of Israeli military efforts to stop Palestinian rocket fire into southern Israel that has spiked in recent days. At least four rockets fell Tuesday in and around the Israeli town of Sderot, fatally wounding a factory worker. The U.N. high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, was visiting Sderot at the time of the attack.

Court Says Israel Must Register Same-sex Marriages (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Supreme Court touched off a fresh controversy over gay rights Tuesday when it ordered the government to register same-sex marriages performed abroad.

The ruling by a seven-judge panel, though limited in scope, reignited a debate over the rights of homosexuals in Israel after ultra-Orthodox religious leaders led protests that resulted in the cancellation of a gay pride parade this month in Jerusalem.

The 6-1 decision was praised by rights advocates as a political advance for gays and lesbians, who have won previous court decisions granting them broader rights in survivor benefits and inheritance. It also was cheered by those who support legalizing civil marriages in Israel, where only religious ceremonies are allowed.

"I am glad we won and got what we wanted to achieve in this petition, which was the basic right to be registered as married by the Israeli Ministry of Interior, just as any couple marrying abroad does and takes it for granted," Joseph Bar Lev, a 39-year-old dance instructor who was one of the petitioners, told Israel Radio.

"At the same time, this is still the beginning of the road, because the real aspiration is that civil marriage will be possible in Israel too."

The ruling did not legalize same-sex weddings in Israel, where religious authorities by law hold a monopoly on authorizing marriages and divorces.

"We hope that one day any couple who wants to marry in Israel, whether homosexual or heterosexual, will be able to do it," said Yoav Loeff, spokesman for the Assn. for Civil Rights in Israel, which represented two of the five gay couples in the case.

The male couples had wed in Canada, but when they returned to Israel, the Interior Ministry refused to change their marital status from single to married.

The ministry said same-sex marriages were not legally valid in Israel and could not be listed in the government's registry. In its ruling Tuesday, the court ordered the government to register same-sex marriages that are legal abroad.

Activists said that being registered as married could help gay spouses assert the right to decide about medical care for their partners and make it easier for a spouse to gain Israeli citizenship.

Religious conservatives criticized the decision as an erosion of Israel's status as a Jewish state and said it undermined moral teachings.

Some conservatives urged the Israeli parliament, or Knesset, to examine the possible effect on Israeli society.

"This ruling is nothing short of idolatry," Zevulun Orlev, a Knesset member from the National Religious Party, said on Israel's Channel 10 television. "Only 10 days ago we read the weekly Torah portion about Sodom and Gomorrah. How exactly does this ruling reconcile with Israel being a Jewish state? What culture considers people of the same sex to be a family? Not the Jewish one."

Ultra-Orthodox Jewish religious leaders, joined by some Muslim and Christian clerics, protested the gay pride parade as an affront to Jerusalem's sacred standing. For days, protesters rioted, set fires in the streets and vowed to block the gathering.

In the end, parade organizers agreed to hold their rally in a stadium after police expressed concern about their ability to protect marchers. The event proceeded peacefully with a large police presence.

Secular Israelis have long complained about the broad authority wielded by the country's leading Orthodox rabbis. Many couples travel overseas to marry in civil ceremonies, a practice that has spawned a matrimonial cottage industry in the nearby island nation of Cyprus.

The issue of civil marriage is important among emigres from the former Soviet Union, many of whom are not Jewish or can't prove their heritage to the satisfaction of rabbinical authorities in Israel. Several candidates in national elections last spring promised Russian voters that they would try to make it easier for them to marry in Israel, though no reforms have been passed.

The lawyers in the same-sex marriage case cited as a precedent a Supreme Court decision from the 1960s that ordered the government to register civil marriages performed abroad, Loeff said.

Religious liberals said the ruling could help them cut into the clout held by rabbinical leaders in matters of marriage and divorce, as well as in conversions to Judaism.

Members of conservative and reform strains of Judaism have sought for years to have non-Orthodox conversions recognized by Israel's top rabbis.

Although the groups have made inroads in getting official recognition for non-Orthodox conversions done abroad, they are awaiting a court ruling on similar recognition for conversions carried out in Israel.

"The Supreme Court of Israel is the grand hope all liberal Jews have" to check the power of the Orthodox leaders, said Anat Hoffman, a former member of the Jerusalem City Council who directs the Israel Religious Action Center, which advocates religious pluralism in Israel.

Hoffman campaigned in support of the gay pride parade, and said she was appalled by the tone of the protests by religious leaders from all three major faiths.

She said the court's ruling simply recognized the legality of same-sex marriages granted by countries that allowed them.

"If the Canadians recognize these people as a family," Hoffman said, "we can't turn around and say that Israel, as a member of the family of nations, does not."

U.S. Seeks Greater Access To India In Farm Trade (WSJ)

By Sameer Mohindru

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

NEW DELHI -- The U.S. is seeking greater market access in India for its agricultural commodities, such as wheat, to ensure balanced farm trade between the two countries, U.S. Agriculture Department Secretary Mike Johanns said.

"We are working on a number of issues...both tariff and nontariff...on commodities such as wheat, edible oils, dairy products...and pet food," Mr. Johanns said in an interview. "There is a trade imbalance in favor of India: It sells more to us.

"We would love to sell wheat to India," he said. India's federal government has imported 5.5 million metric tons of wheat in 2006 amid a decline in local output and granary stocks.

Mr. Johanns said the U.S. hasn't been successful in selling wheat to India despite being a large exporter world-wide, because of stringent sanitary and plant-health norms in India. He favored an approach where India's plant-health norms are protected and wheat trade occurs with the U.S.

He added that discussions on plant-health-related issues are going on so that India will be able to export its mangoes to the U.S. by the next harvest in April.

"We need to be flexible and examine the possibility of how to fit together [issues relating to domestic support, subsidies and market access] to achieve the promises of the Doha round" of global trade talks, he said.

A list of special and sensitive products -- in which countries will be allowed tariff protection -- needs appropriate treatment so that it doesn't slip into an endless list of items, he said. A long list of special or sensitive products can nullify reductions in tariffs of some of the items.

India And China Work On Building Trust (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

DOJ_NMG_0097260

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

BANGALORE, India, Nov. 21 — India and China established a 10-point strategy on Tuesday to strengthen economic relations and ease mistrust, agreeing that there is room enough for both to grow.

President Hu Jintao of China was at the start of a four-day visit to India, only the second by a Chinese president. As he and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India came face to face on Tuesday, there was evidence that they were trying to define the Asian version of globalization.

At a joint media briefing with Mr. Hu on Tuesday, Mr. Singh said there was enough space for the two countries, which account for a third of the world's population, to grow in a mutually beneficial manner "while remaining sensitive to each other's concerns and aspirations, as befits good neighbors and partners."

The two countries said they would work to double their trade to $40 billion by 2010, which some see as a sign that centuries of Western dominance in global trade may be ending.

The countries also signed 13 pacts covering joint scientific initiatives, tourism promotion and the opening of new consulates.

Despite the symbolism that is typical of such visits, however, there were no breakthroughs at the leadership level on the first day of talks.

As India and China try to broaden their trade with each other and expand their influence in Asia, there is growing anxiety in India that allowing the entry of China's often subsidized manufacturers could send its own industries into oblivion.

As a prelude to Mr. Hu's visit, Sun Yuxi, China's ambassador to India, appealed to India not to discriminate against Chinese companies.

The ambassador said he understood that every country had security concerns, but added, "If you allow other foreign companies in the area, Chinese companies should be treated equally because we are friends and partners."

China wants its companies to be allowed to invest in sectors like ports and telecommunications, which India considers sensitive and regulates tightly.

As a signal that all is not "Hindi Chini Bhai Bhai," an old slogan that translates as "Indians and Chinese are brothers," even routine business relations have been challenging.

For instance, the Chinese telecommunications company Huawei Technologies said its Chinese employees were not being allowed to work at its Indian unit because the government was reluctant to grant visas.

"For the last nine months, no employment visa has been granted," said Gilbert Millicent Nathan, a spokesman for Huawei Technologies India. Mr. Nathan said employment visa applications were pending without explanation.

Huawei currently has 50 Chinese working at its Indian unit, half of them on employment visas and the rest on business visas.

Its marketing subsidiary for telecommunications equipment, Huawei Telecommunications India, based in the northern city of Gurgaon, is facing restrictions imposed by the Indian government on Chinese companies that sell equipment in sectors deemed sensitive.

This year, India rejected proposals from Hutchison Port Holdings, based in Hong Kong, to build container ports in India.

Political antagonism between India and China dates to 1962, when China soundly defeated India in a brief war that began as a border dispute. It has not been eased since then by India's growing relations with the United States and China's continued closeness with Pakistan. In fact, Mr. Hu is scheduled to head to Pakistan directly after his visit to India.

Clyde V. Prestowitz, an Asia specialist, said he did not expect a partnership to come out of the Hu visit, but perhaps "less hostility, suspicion and confrontation." Mr. Prestowitz, a trade adviser to the Reagan administration, is president of the Economic Strategy Institute in Washington.

"India, China and the rest of Asia will eventually wrest dominance of world trade away from the West," he said, "though not tomorrow."

Vietnam Signs Deals With Cnooc And PetroChina (WSJ)

BEIJING -- China National Offshore Oil Corp. and PetroChina Co. have signed deals to ramp up investment in Vietnam as leaders in Beijing and Hanoi set aside a long-running maritime border dispute to forge closer energy ties, state media reported yesterday.

Cnooc signed an agreement with Vietnam Oil & Gas Corp., or PetroVietnam, on Friday to begin exploring for oil in the Gulf of Tonkin in the South China Sea on a 50-50 basis. The exploration period is expected to last three to five years, China Oil News said on its Web site, without specifying when the project would begin or the size of the investment involved.

Expectations of oil and gas finds are high, because the area is ringed by proven natural-gas finds, including Vietnam's Nam Con Son gas project to the west, and oil-rich areas being pumped by Malaysia and Brunei to the south.

Steven Knell of London consultancy Global Insight said the joint venture had been in the cards since August, when China and Vietnam issued a joint communique paving the way for a resolution of the dispute over the maritime border, notably around the Spratly Islands. Military clashes between the two countries took place in 1988 and 1992 over the maritime border.

"A final settlement on the matter of the boundary is expected in 2008, but that will not stand in the way of exploration-and-production work in the meantime," Mr. Knell said.

Separately, PetroChina signed a $432 million deal to become the contractor for a fertilizer plant in Vietnam, representing the largest individual project in terms of investment by a Chinese company in the country, according to China Oil News. This project will produce 320,000 metric tons of synthetic ammonia and 560,000 tons of urea annually as well as involve the construction of a 36 megawatt power station. It is expected to begin operation in about 3½ years.

The deals were concluded during Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Vietnam last week for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

China Buildup Seen Aimed At U.S. Ships (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

China's military buildup includes new missiles and naval weapons designed to sink U.S. aircraft carriers and deny U.S. forces access to the Asia-Pacific region, a congressional commission official said yesterday.

Daniel Blumenthal, a former Pentagon defense policy-maker and now a member of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission, said China's military is building up forces to "deny the United States the use of the commons -- the sea, the air, cyber and space."

"The Chinese have been quite successful ... in the area of sea denial, meaning that if we sent a carrier to or outside the [Taiwan] Strait as we did in 1996, it would be a lot riskier and a lot costlier to the United States," Mr. Blumenthal said at a conference held at the Heritage Foundation.

The comments followed disclosure last week that a Chinese submarine sailed undetected to within five miles of the aircraft carrier USS Kitty Hawk near Okinawa, Japan, and surfaced close enough to fire wake-homing torpedos or anti-ship cruise missiles, according to U.S. defense officials.

The Navy said in response to the surprise encounter that it is reviewing anti-submarine warfare defenses for the carrier battle group. The carrier was engaged in exercises when the Song-class submarine surfaced Oct. 26.

China's government denied that the submarine encounter took place, but Adm. Gary Roughead, commander of the Navy's Pacific Fleet, said Friday in Beijing that Chinese military leaders he met told him the submarine was in international waters when it was near the carrier.

Mr. Blumenthal, commenting on the release of the China commission's latest annual report, said Chinese weapons include 10 different types of ballistic and cruise missiles and up to 800 missiles aimed at Taiwan, five different types of submarines and 15 types of new warships.

"This is a very concerted and sophisticated, diversified effort to build up a military whose goal is the United States and its ability to meet its own commitments and interests," he said.

Beijing's military also is experimenting with new attack concepts, including land-based attacks on ships "through multiple entry concepts" in what Mr. Blumenthal called "a very serious effort to try to basically sink a carrier or battle group."

The commission report, while mainly focused on economic issues, included a chapter on China's military that said China's military buildup is closing a gap with U.S. forces. The trend shows "a window of vulnerability for the United States between 2008 and 2015" before newer U.S. weapons are fielded, the report continued.

The report revealed that China's new DF-21C ballistic missile is being configured with a guidance system that will allow it to attack ships at sea and defeat shipborne missile defenses. The "development efforts are being pursued vigorously," it stated.

The report stated that China's warships and submarines could delay the arrival of U.S. Navy forces called on to defend Taiwan, but they lack integrated command and control needed for "effective joint targeting of a carrier battle group."

In China, Growth At Whose Cost? (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

BEIJING -- China's economic miracle has lifted hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, but the country is showing signs that its poorest citizens are falling further behind.

The success of China's transformation into a manufacturing powerhouse has allowed Beijing to dismiss criticism of the downside of Chinese-style economic reform: a dismal environmental record, a repressive political climate and the breakdown of the country's health-care system.

As long as the country's newfound wealth eventually trickled down to everyone, the reasoning went, the benefits outweighed the problems.

But now, as the Chinese government worries about social stability and amid questions about the social costs of China's rapid growth, new figures suggest the poorest of the country's 1.3 billion people are getting even poorer.

From 2001 to 2003, as China's economy expanded nearly 10% a year, average income for the poorest 10% of the country's households fell 2.5%, according to an analysis by the World Bank that has been presented to the Chinese government. Those roughly 130 million Chinese earn $1 a day or less, the World Bank's global benchmark for poverty.

Meanwhile, the nation's total income rose sharply, and other income groups saw gains, suggesting that the rich are getting richer at the expense of the poorest.

The reason for the income decline at the bottom isn't clear. The World Bank hasn't completed its analysis and its conclusions haven't been published. Even so, the data call into question an economic model that economists have held up as an example for other developing nations.

"This finding is very important. If true, it sheds doubt on the argument that a rising tide lifts all boats," said Bert Hofman, the World Bank's chief economist in China.

China's roughly 10% annual growth in the years since it has opened up to foreign trade and investment, dismantled or privatized state-run companies and encouraged entrepreneurship has made it the world's fourth-largest economy. Those gains have helped to persuade development experts that growth is the surest cure for poverty.

But the widening of China's income gap raises questions about the bargain its government made three decades ago when it agreed to accept a measure of social inequality as long as it improved the nation's welfare overall.

Many observers place part of the blame on the way China dismantled its social-welfare system as it phased out state control of the economy -- without building up much to replace it. Health care has become a point of particular concern, as costs shoot up without any widespread system of medical insurance to cover them. Patients who can't pay often-large sums in cash are frequently refused treatment at Chinese hospitals.

"Before the reform period, China's system of social security was already fragile. Now, after the reforms, it has almost entirely disappeared," said Li Zhining, a retired scholar in Beijing. That gives the government few tools to address the income gap, he said. "I think that the disparity between rich and poor in China will be impossible to resolve in a short time."

The World Bank's Mr. Hofman says the bank's analysis shows the majority of China's poorest 10% appear to be only temporarily poor, thrown down by some setback like sudden illness, the loss of a job or the confiscation of land. That suggests that a basic social safety net, like medical insurance or unemployment benefits, could help move them back out of poverty. Only about 20% to 30% of the poorest appear to be long-term poor, and even they have some savings.

It isn't clear what impact the World Bank data might have on Chinese policy. The World Bank and others are already recommending that China spend more on pensions, health care and other welfare programs.

Still, for the ruling Communist Party, which has staked its legitimacy almost entirely on its ability to make people richer, evidence that incomes are falling could be devastating. During its reform era, China has pulled off one of the greatest economic feats in history, bringing some 400 million people out of poverty in 25 years.

That era dates back to 1978, when former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping abandoned the egalitarian principles of his Communist predecessors and inaugurated the world's biggest experiment in trickle-down economics. He famously declared that for China to rise out of poverty, some people would be allowed to get rich before others.

Mr. Deng's formula did work: While the manufacturing hubs on the country's south and east coasts got rich first, and are now much better off than the rest of China, average incomes nationwide have risen by about 7% a year since 1978, according to official figures.

In recent years, however, incomes in urban areas have outstripped those in the rest of the country, with city dwellers recording average annual gains of 8% to 9%, compared with less than 5% for rural households. Now, if a large segment of Chinese society has ceased to benefit from economic reforms, it weakens the rationale for continuing down that path.

Other, published figures have also shown that income inequality is rising in China. Its Gini coefficient, a widely used measure of income distribution that starts from zero at perfect equality and tops out at one, last year hit 0.4, up from 0.3 in 1981, according to the Asian Development Bank. That puts socialist China at a level of inequality similar to that of the unabashedly capitalist U.S.

The gap between the highest and lowest incomes is expanding whether one looks at rural and urban residents, inland and coastal cities, or even just high- and low-paying jobs, according to the ADB's analysis of Chinese data.

The rise in inequality has fueled a growing debate among China's intellectuals and politicians about whether the country has swung too far toward capitalism and is leaving behind the Communist Party's core constituency of workers and peasants.

Recognizing that corruption and inequality threaten its authority, China's central leadership has made addressing those issues its top priority. President Hu Jintao's signature slogan is the drive for a "harmonious society" -- one that would bridge the widening income gaps and ease the strains that are causing social unrest.

The World Bank's Mr. Hofman emphasized that the bank's findings, which are based on data collected through a massive household survey by China's National Bureau of Statistics, aren't definitive. For one thing, the survey compares snapshots of the lowest tier of Chinese society at two different points, rather than tracking the same of group of households over time. So, it doesn't necessarily mean that the people who were in the poorest 10% of society in 2001 were all 2.5% worse off in 2003.

Moreover, the World Bank started its analysis in 2005, and so didn't have access to complete figures from that year or 2004. More recent data could help determine whether the decline has continued or was just an isolated phenomenon.

Serving The Nation In Sunny South America (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Feeling that blast of winter these past few days? Want a quick trip to sunny climes courtesy of the taxpayers? Then hurry, hurry, hurry. There may still be some seats on an excellent codel to South America right after Thanksgiving. There's chatter that even Rio, where highs are expected to be in the 80s, might be one stop.

Outgoing House Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) is leading a group of about 10 committee members, plus spouses, military aides and assorted staff -- perhaps up to 40 folks in all -- on this fine journey with stops in several countries down there.

"The delegation will be meeting with various business and government officials in the region," committee spokeswoman Alise Kowalski tells us, "to discuss agricultural trade -- specifically focusing on expanding U.S. agricultural exports."

We asked for an updated itinerary and passenger list, but she told us that, "for security reasons," the committee did not release such information before the trip. (It was not readily apparent how knowing who was onboard would affect security issues, but never mind.)

Depending on the type of military jet being used, move quickly if you want to go. An early list showed that Goodlatte; incoming Chairman Collin Peterson (D-Minn.); Republican Reps. Frank Lucas (Okla.) and Jerry Moran (Kan.); and Democratic Reps. Bob Etheridge (N.C.), Tim Holden (Pa.), Rick Larsen (Wash.), Leonard Boswell (Iowa), David Scott (Ga.) and Stephanie Herseth (S.D.) had made tentative bookings, but these things are fluid. There's always someone dropping off or hopping on, so get moving.

Note to new members of Congress who become codel-eligible next year: You might ask yourselves, "Why would I want to wander for maybe 10 days going from one boring meeting to another on trade issues?" Well, first, it could be theoretically of importance to your farm constituents.

More important, between meetings, there'll surely be ample time to squeeze in trips to top agricultural sites. For example, during a five-day trip in 2003, a Goodlatte delegation found time to stop at Iguazu Falls, not heretofore known as a major farming site, and trek to the major ecotourist and rain-forest area around Manaus.If No One Publishes a Watchdog's Letters . . .

One went to the Chicago Tribune to take issue with a columnist; another to U.S. News and World Report about what Smith said was a "fairly egregious error" that "requires a correction"; and a third, by press aide Bryan Whitman, notes that USA Today "mischaracterizes" an Army general's comments.

The news outlets did not publish the letters. Undaunted by rejection, Smith self-publishes his views at the top of the Bird, a compilation of news clips distributed throughout the military.

Going South Populism Loses Appeal For Voters In Latin America (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador -- The populist political tide that seemed to be sweeping through Latin America earlier this year is sputtering.

Although disappointment with free-market reforms still runs deep through the region, voters have been choosing presidential candidates who tap into a more powerful force: economic stability. Across Latin America, inflation has been on a steady decline for the past decade, and has dropped to the low single digits for the first time in decades in Mexico, Peru, Ecuador and Brazil. Economic growth, while far from spectacular, has been solid for the past five years.

With that stability, more working-class voters have been able to buy homes, take out loans and obtain their first credit cards. As voters get a stake in the economic system, they become wary of risking it all on populist nostrums -- debt repudiation, deficit spending, state ownership of industries -- that in the past produced economic disasters and left them worse off.

This dynamic has played out in election after election across the volatile region this year, despite high-profile efforts by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez to fuel anti-U.S. sentiment. In February, Nobel Prize winner Oscar Arias won the presidency of Costa Rica against a candidate who wanted to scuttle a free-trade deal with the U.S. In June, onetime populist Alan García regained the presidency in Peru by embracing free trade and open markets -- and by playing off voter fears of Mr. Chávez's growing influence. In Mexico a month later, the populist former Mexico City mayor, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, lost after failing to find support among the working classes of fast-growing central and northern cities.

And while longtime socialist politicians won in Brazil and Chile, they did so by championing market-friendly policies. This month in Nicaragua, former Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega won the presidency, but even he positioned himself as a candidate of stability and reconciliation. He used John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" as a theme, not Vladimir Lenin's economics. The sole presidential candidate who looks likely to win this year on a platform of state intervention, income redistribution and anti-American foreign policy is Venezuela's President Chávez, who has billions of dollars in oil wealth to hand out to supporters.

"We haven't achieved [politically] what we thought was going to be achieved at the beginning of the year," says Efren Andrades, a former agriculture minister in Mr. Chávez's government, who now teaches at the University of the Andes in Mérida, Venezuela.

The diminishing electoral appeal of candidates promising radical economic and political change is on display here in Ecuador, ahead of this Sunday's presidential election. Early this fall, Rafael Correa, a telegenic university professor, leapt ahead of his rivals by wrapping himself closely with Venezuela's Mr. Chávez and vowing to dissolve Congress, redo the constitution and renegotiate the foreign debt. During rallies, he snapped his belt to show how he planned to lash the country's rich into submission to help the poor.

But as voters grew wary of his showmanship, Mr. Correa retreated to the middle. In campaign stops, he now rarely mentions his plans to redesign the economy or rewrite the constitution. Instead, he focuses on issues that even his conservative opponent, banana magnate Alvaro Noboa, embraces, such as improving housing. After moderating his stance, Mr. Correa has regained his footing and is now in a virtual tie with his conservative rival. "Ecuador's economy isn't sustainable," says Mr. Correa. "I am talking about changes to create jobs [and] create productive industries."

Populism is far from dead. Latin America remains fertile territory for politicians who promise a heavy government hand and a retreat from market economics. That's because the benefits of recent economic growth have flowed disproportionately to elites, sustaining income inequality rivaled only by sub-Saharan Africa. Resentment simmers among the working class and poor.

Mexico's conservative president-elect, Felipe Calderón, who won by less than a percentage point, is likely to be dogged during his term by Mr. López Obrador, who claims the election was stolen and swore himself in on Monday as the "legitimate" president. In Argentina, President Nestor Kirchner, who slashed foreign debt payments, set price controls and spent heavily, is the early favorite to win a second term next year.

"Voters are opting for stability, but it would be a big mistake to interpret that as a ringing endorsement of politics as usual in Latin America," says Michael Shifter, vice president of the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "There is still a lot of frustration in the region."

Even so, the electoral failure of populists so far has been good news for foreign investors and businesses. U.S. companies such as Citigroup Inc. and Wal-Mart Stores Inc. have poured billions of dollars into the region in the past decade on the expectation that economic stability and growing consumer wealth would expand local markets. U.S. officials can also breathe easier because Mr. Chávez hasn't managed to form a potent anti-U.S. economic and political bloc in Latin America.

There are also powerful constraints on governments seeking to govern as populists. In December, leftist Indian leader Evo Morales won Bolivia's presidential election and set about nationalizing the country's oil and gas industry. But the staunch Chávez ally hasn't been able to complete the nationalizations because the state lacks the managers and resources to run privately owned fields.

Ecuador, an oil-rich nation of 13 million, illustrates the rise and ebb of radical politics in Latin America this year. Even in a region known for instability, this Colorado-size country stands out. It has had seven presidents in the past 10 years, three of whom where exiled, jailed or both. In 1997, Abdalá Bucaram, who recorded a record album -- "The Madman Who Loves" -- during his presidency, was deposed by congress for "mental incapacity."

The economic situation has been equally volatile. A fierce rivalry between the Sierra mountain dwellers and residents of the muggy coast has made it difficult for the Quito government to work out necessary compromises that could limit government spending. Instead, the Central Bank printed more Ecuadorian sucres to pay for salary increases, public-works projects and repeated bank bailouts -- short-term fixes that boosted inflation. Between 1979 and 2000, the sucre plummeted from 25-to-the dollar to 25,000-to-the-dollar, wiping out savings and prompting the government to default on its debts twice.

As in all Latin American currency crises, the working and middle classes suffered especially sharp declines. In the mid-1990s, Nelson Rivadeneira, an auto-parts salesman in Quito, owned a home and two cars, and hoped that his son, who attended an inexpensive private school, would climb higher up the economic ladder.

Then the sucre plunged, interest rates soared, and he lost his job as the economy nosedived. Facing bankruptcy, he sold his cars. One went to pay his loans and the other to pay his son's tuition.

As the country's banks started to fail, Mr. Rivadeneira and thousands of other Ecuadorians lined up at teller windows to withdraw their savings. Burger Kings started selling Whoppers for dollars, setting their own exchange rates as the sucre lost about 65% of its value. A newspaper printed photos of financiers boarding planes to Miami. To stem a run, the government froze deposits and allowed banks to issue savers like Mr. Rivadeneira promissory notes. These proved to be worth less than their face value, since confidence in the banking system had vanished.

The economy hit bottom in 2000. Desperate to halt inflation, the Ecuador government dumped its own currency and adopted the U.S. dollar. Although many economists criticized the move because it limited the government's ability to manage the economy, the tactic succeeded in slashing inflation, which now runs about 3% annually -- Ecuador's lowest ever. Interest rates have plunged as well.

Over the past few years, consumers have benefited. Home builders are pouring money into projects in the working-class area south of Quito, where a shopping mall called El Recreo has doubled in size. The highway that climbs a mountain pass to connect the southern neighborhoods with jobs in the city center is crammed with traffic each dawn for the first time in memory.

Banks are handing out credit cards, spurring a consumption boom. Sales of television sets and major appliances are growing at a 35% annual clip at Comandato, one of Ecuador's biggest retailers. Spurred by financing, General Motors Corp.'s annual sales of cars and trucks in Ecuador have quadrupled to 87,000 since 2000.

Against this economic backdrop, Mr. Correa mounted his populist campaign. He played on his close ties to Venezuela's Mr. Chávez and on a nationalist backlash against a U.S. military base used to fight Colombian drug lords. Also a big theme: the growing wealth of the elites who escaped much of the hardship of the late 1990s economic crisis.

A 43-year-old economist, with a doctorate from the University of Illinois, Mr. Correa had considered a presidential run since his university days, his colleagues say. He burnished his populist credentials during a four-month stint last year as finance minister when he declared that half of the oil revenue the government set aside in a "rainy-day fund" for debt reduction could instead be spent now on welfare for the poor.

That prompted a fight with the World Bank, which said the move could undermine the country's creditworthiness, and pressured Ecuador to change course by retracting a Bank credit line. In response, Mr. Correa flew to Caracas to arrange $300 million of financing from Mr. Chávez. Wearying of the conflict, Ecuador's president fired Mr. Correa.

The battle, though, lifted Mr. Correa's profile and powered his presidential bid. When Mr. Chávez called U.S. President George Bush "Satan" during a speech to the United Nations in September, Mr. Correa said he considered the comment an insult to Satan.

But that turned out to be Mr. Correa's political high-water mark. His plans to renegotiate foreign debt payments encouraged foreign investors to sell Ecuador's bonds, creating fears of a return to crisis. His ties to Mr. Chávez created concern as Chávezinspired policies in Bolivia spawned protests there as well as a fight with Brazil. His popularity took another hit when he hinted that he would ditch Ecuador's link to the U.S. dollar when he took office. Polls show most Ecuadorians view the greenback as the central pillar of the newfound stability.

Mr. Correa, who had written academic papers attacking dollarization, quickly tried to assure voters that he wouldn't tamper with the currency.

Mr. Correa's political problems became evident in the first round of voting in October, where he came in second after leading in most polls to the 56-year-old Mr. Noboa, regarded as Ecuador's richest man. Since neither candidate won a majority in the first round, they must face each other in Sunday's runoff.

In many ways, Mr. Noboa embodies the plutocracy that Mr. Correa likes to rail against. Mr. Noboa inherited his business empire from his father and consolidated his position after a nasty fight with his siblings. He has taken positions well to the right of Mr. Correa, including promising a free-trade pact with the U.S.

Mr. Noboa also has skillfully used Mr. Correa's left-wing rhetoric against him, warning that Mr. Correa would endanger the country's newfound stability. Borrowing a page from conservative campaigns in Peru and Mexico, Mr. Noboa ran television and radio ads linking Mr. Correa to Mr. Chávez, suggesting that the Chávez-style anti-U.S. bravado would bring about ruin for the country by turning the U.S. into an enemy. One TV ad featured ordinary voters saying, "We can't have Chávez meddling in our country."

After his poll numbers sank, Mr. Correa put some distance between himself and Caracas. "Look, Chávez is my friend, but I haven't talked to him in months, and he has nothing to do with my campaign," he said.

Mr. Correa denies he is retreating from his principles. "My positions on the constitution and other things are already well known, so it makes sense to now to talk about new issues. I haven't changed a thing," he said as the SUV he campaigns in zipped between a 7 a.m. television interview and his children's French-language private school.

But that's not the message voters are getting. "Correa is coming back to reality," says Mr. Rivadeneira, the former auto-parts salesman who now has a good job selling Chevrolets. He says Mr. Correa's new campaign pitch is more in line with his own views, and that Mr. Correa may even get his vote. "I don't think anyone wants to risk stability," he says.

Maoists Sign Peace Deal In Nepal (NYT)

By Tilak P. Pokharel And Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

KATMANDU, Nepal, Nov. 21 — To end a crippling war that raged for more than 10 years and killed thousands, Maoist rebels in Nepal signed a peace deal with the government on Tuesday night, with a pledge to lock up their guns, at least for now, and let voters decide the future of the country.

The accord promises to bring the rebels, who control vast swaths of the destitute countryside, into the political mainstream. Whether the Maoists, who once functioned as a political party but abandoned the electoral path for armed struggle, will now play by the rules of parliamentary democracy is the most important question.

“It is the beginning of a new beginning,” the Maoist leader, known by his nom de guerre, Prachanda, said after signing the agreement in Katmandu, the capital.

Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala said: “This has given a message to the international community and terrorists all over the world that no conflict can be resolved by guns. It can be done by dialogue.”

The peace agreement paves the way for the fulfillment of one of the Maoists’ chief demands: elections to decide whether Nepal will remain a monarchy. The interim government, which the rebels have agreed to join, will organize elections next year for an assembly that will determine whether Nepal will remain a kingdom and if so, what kind.

The Maoists have repeatedly promised to run in the elections and abide by the results. On Saturday, during a visit to New Delhi, Prachanda reiterated that pledge, saying that even if Nepal voted to keep the monarchy, his cadres would continue to press for its abolition — but would do so peacefully.

The agreement signed Tuesday in Katmandu came a year after the rebels teamed up with Nepal’s main political parties to topple King Gyanendra, who dismissed the country’s elected politicians and took control of the state early last year.

In April, street protests blessed by the Maoists prompted Gyanendra to turn over control to the elected Parliament, which had been suspended four years earlier. This week a government-appointed panel found the king responsible for rights abuses against the pro-democracy protesters and called for him to be punished.

After the king yielded to Parliament, it was swift to take vital powers away from him, including control of the army, and engaged in peace talks with the rebels, who declared a unilateral cease-fire. Under the peace accord, the Maoists will sequester their armed fighters in cantonment sites, and the Nepalese Army will return to its barracks.

Ian Martin, the United Nations envoy to Nepal, said in a statement on Tuesday that agreement had been reached on the locations of the cantonment sites. He added, "Today's agreement promises to convert the cease-fire into long-term peace."

The rebels, still apparently distrustful of politicians and the palace, have not laid down their arms entirely. They have agreed to lock up their weapons but are holding on to the keys. The United Nations is to monitor the safekeeping of weapons through a system of closed-circuit cameras.

Human rights groups have accused the rebels of continuing to recruit members in the countryside, including children, but the Maoists have denied the charge.

The Maoists say they want their troops to be integrated into a new national army. How many and in what fashion remain unclear. "We are not dogmatic Communists, and we are prepared to change and debate our beliefs with anybody," Prachanda was quoted by [a news service] as saying.

The rebels, who called the conflict a "people's war," began with the aim of establishing a Communist state. Maoist insurgencies have blossomed in South Asia long after the demise of Mao and his ideology in China.

In India, a loose confederation of Maoist rebels are active in a swath of territory from the jungles of the far south all the way north to the border with Nepal. The Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, recently described them as the country's most pressing internal security threat.

The peace accord in Nepal includes a provision to establish a truth and reconciliation commission "to find facts about those involved in committing serious human rights violations and those involved in crime against humanity during the armed conflict."

Within minutes of its signing, crowds of well-wishers lined the streets and lighted candles as they waited for Prime Minister Koirala's motorcade to pass.

"Both sides give up state of war; it's celebration time," Kanak Dixit, the editor of Himal magazine, said by telephone amid hoots and hollers on the street. "The only challenge that now remains is that the Maoists, in particular their militia, be held to account by the peace deal."

Basanta Sharma, 35, a student, waited for three hours outside the Birendra International Convention Center for news of the signing. "What else can be there which makes us so happy?" he said. "It seems the common man can now live in peace, work and earn their living."

Peace Agreement Nets Guerrillas Seats In Parliament (WT/AP)

By Binaj Gurubacharya

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

KATMANDU, Nepal -- The government and rebels signed a peace deal yesterday to end a decadelong insurgency, paving the way for the guerrillas to join Nepal's interim leadership.

Nepalese Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala and Maoist rebel leader Prachanda signed the accord at a Katmandu convention hall packed with cheering officials, dignitaries and foreign diplomats.

"This ends the more than one decade of civil war in the country," said Prachanda, who goes by a single name. "We will now turn to a campaign of peace and building a new Nepal."

The rebels' fight for a communist state left more than 13,000 people dead before a cease-fire was declared in April. It came after weeks of mass protests that forced King Gyanendra to end his royal dictatorship and restore parliament, which he had suspended 14 months earlier.

The peace deal "has opened the door for a permanent peace, and Nepal has entered a new era," Mr. Koirala said.

The agreement came after months of negotiations that centered on how to disarm the insurgents and bring them into the government, which they helped bring to power by backing the April protests.

The first issue, disarming the rebels, was solved Nov. 8 when the Maoists agreed to confine their fighters to seven camps and lock up their weapons under U.N. supervision.

Talks then shifted focus to integrating the rebels into the interim parliament and government.

Under yesterday's deal, the rebels are to join the interim parliament by Nov. 26 and will get 73 of the chamber's 330 seats. Mr. Koirala's Nepali Congress will remain the biggest party with 85 seats, and the Maoists will share second place with Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist-Leninist). The rest of the seats will be held by other, smaller parties.

The rebels' large number will give them a significant role in a new interim government, which will be in place by Dec. 1.

The rebels will also get to play a major part in deciding how and when to elect a constituent assembly that is to rewrite the constitution and decide on the monarchy's fate.

The assembly was a key demand of the hundreds of thousands of ordinary Nepalese who took to the streets in April to demand Gyanendra's ouster.

Centrist parties favor a constitution that preserves the monarchy in a ceremonial role, while the Maoist rebels want the crown abolished.

A 2001 palace massacre, in which the crown prince is accused of gunning down Gyanendra's older brother, King Birendra, and much of the royal family and then killing himself, helped pierce the mystique surrounding Nepal's royalty.

The slaughter brought Gyanendra to the throne. Four years later, he dismissed parliament and seized power, saying he would bring order to a chaotic and corrupt political scene and quell the Maoist insurgency.

Internet Extends Reach Of Bangladeshi Villagers (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

CHARKHAI, Bangladesh -- The village doctor's diagnosis was dire: Marium needed immediate surgery to replace two heart valves.

The 28-year-old mother of three said she was confused and terrified. She could barely imagine open-heart surgery. She had no idea how her family of farm laborers could pay for an operation that would cost $4,000.

The next day, Sept. 16, her father went to see Mahbubul Ambia, who had recently installed the only Internet connection for 20 miles in far northeastern Bangladesh. Ambia sat down at a computer, connected to the Internet by a cable plugged into his cellphone, and searched for cardiac specialists in Dhaka, the capital, 140 miles away. He found one and made an appointment for Marium, who like many people here goes by just one name. The specialist examined her and said she needed only a routine surgical procedure that cost $500.

"I felt a very deep sense of relief," Marium said.

Villages in one of the world's poorest countries, long isolated by distance and deprivation, are getting their first Internet access, all connected over cellphones. And in the process, millions of people who have no land-line telephones, and often lack electricity and running water, in recent months have gained access to services considered basic in richer countries: weather reports, e-mail, even a doctor's second opinion.

Cellphones have become a new bridge across the digital divide between the world's rich and poor, as innovators use the explosive growth of cellphone networks to connect people to the Internet.

Bangladesh now has about 16 million cellphone subscribers -- and 2 million new users each month -- compared with just 1 million land-line phones to serve a population of nearly 150 million people.

Since February, Internet centers have opened in well over 100 Bangladeshi villages, and a total of 500 are scheduled to be open by the end of the year. All of them are in places where there are no land lines and the connections will be made exclusively over cellphone networks.

DOJ_NMG_0097270

Before February, analysts said, only 370,000 Bangladeshis had access to the Internet. But now millions of villagers have access to information and services that had been available only by walking or taking long and expensive bus rides, or were beyond their reach altogether.

People now download job applications and music, see school exam results, check news and crop prices, make inexpensive Internet phone calls or use Web cameras to see relatives. Students from villages with few books now have access to online dictionaries and encyclopedias.

"We could not imagine where this technology has taken us in such a short time," said Mufizur Rahman, 48, a grocery shop owner in Charkhai, a town of about 40,000 people whose streets are filled with colorful three-wheeled bicycle rickshaws, and where there are almost no cars.

"For the First World, this is minor," he said. "But this is a big thing for us."

The Internet centers are being set up by GrameenPhone, a cellphone provider partly owned by the Grameen Bank, which shared this year's Nobel Peace Prize with its founder, Muhammad Yunus.

The centers are building on a cellphone network created over the past decade by a Grameen Bank program that helped provide more than 250,000 cellphones in villages. When that program started in 1997, only 1.5 percent of the population had access to a telephone; that has risen to more than 10 percent.Staying Connected

Goats grazed on litter outside Ambia's little Internet shop in Charkhai, where merchants sell bright red tomatoes and honking ducks in the crowded central market.

Bangladesh, where the United Nations says average annual income is about $440, is one of the most densely populated countries in the world, with its 150 million people crammed into an area roughly the size of Iowa.

Ambia's shop sits wedged between a stall where men sell huge sacks of rice and one selling cheap plastic shoes. By midmorning on a steamy September day, at least 20 people stood in line waiting to use one of Ambia's two Chinese-made computers.

A woman named Aleya, 55, sat down on a small plastic chair and handed Ambia a scrap of paper with a London phone number. She said that her 18-year-old daughter was getting married and that she was calling her uncle in England to ask him to help pay for it. Aleya said her husband is a construction worker who earns about $70 a month, barely enough to feed their five children.

Ambia dialed the number on the keyboard of his computer, connected by a cable to a Motorola cellphone. The call connected using VoIP (Voice over Internet Protocol) technology, which allows calls to be placed from a computer to another computer or a telephone anywhere in the world -- for little or no cost.

VoIP technology is growing rapidly. One of the biggest brands, Skype, was founded in August 2003 and now has 136 million registered users. Companies such as Vonage and Yahoo also offer the service and are expanding exponentially.

Aleya picked up the small telephone handset connected to the computer and her face lit up. Her uncle, who owns a restaurant in London, promised that he'd make arrangements to send money for the wedding.

The five-minute call cost 8 Bangladeshi taka, about 11 cents.

"An 8-taka call has earned me thousands," Aleya said with a broad smile.

Before Ambia's center opened in February, Aleya said, she would have called her uncle on a borrowed cellphone at a cost of more than $2, her husband's daily wage.

The only other option would have been to take a bumpy bus to Sylhet, a city about 20 miles down the road, to make the call from an Internet cafe there. She said rutted roads and ancient buses making frequent stops often turned that into an all-day errand that would cost her nearly $3.

As Aleya spoke on the phone, Komoruddin, 50, was waiting to make a call to his son, an electrician living in Saudi Arabia. Komoruddin said he and his other son and five daughters live largely on the money his son sends home.

"I used to have to make a plan and spend a whole day to make a call. Now I can just come in here and relax," he said. "I never thought I'd see anything like this here. Some people still don't believe it."Cyber Vows

Ambia, a lanky 26-year-old, said he was running a small shop doing cellphone repairs when he heard about GrameenPhone's plan to create hundreds of village Internet centers.

DOJ_NMG_0097271

"I love browsing the Internet, but I used to have to go to Sylhet to do it," he said. "When I saw the opportunity to combine browsing and business, I took it."

He said his business is growing fast, fueled by villagers' delight at being able to connect with a world beyond theirs. Ambia also sells cellphones in his shop, and each month he signs up about 500 new customers, who pay about $4 to activate a phone.

Ambia said Internet access is a logical next step in Charkhai's digital evolution. In recent months, he noted, local people have been making long walks through the fields and crossing wide rivers to log into cyberspace.

Before, getting a passport application could take weeks, or would require a bus trip to Sylhet. News of overseas job opportunities used to come by word of mouth. But now people browse online employment bulletin boards, then use the center's scanner to submit completed applications for jobs that before they might never have known about.

Students cram into the two-room center to use computers to check results of their standardized exams, instead of walking miles or taking a bus ride to get them.

Ambia has created a database of land and houses for sale around Charkhai, which better-off Bangladeshis in London or the Middle East use to browse for investments in their homeland.

He is working on databases listing doctors and other basic services. He said a program would soon begin to allow local doctors and their patients to hold video conferences to consult with specialists in Dhaka.

"People are just beginning to know about this," he said. "They are excited to get this kind of information."

One of Ambia's most popular services is video conferencing, using the little Hyundai Web camera mounted atop one of his computer monitors.

Entire families crowd in front of the center's camera to hold video conferences with relatives overseas. Ambia said a mother came in recently to hold up a newborn to give the father, working overseas, his first glimpse of his child.

"People even come here to see how things are being cooked in London, how they are cutting the fish," he said.

And Ambia was preparing to add a 21st-century twist to a traditional ritual, by hosting his first video conference wedding.

Aslam Ahmed, 25, said he planned to sit in front of the Web camera in Charkhai and marry his girlfriend, Jasmine, 17, who would be in front of a Web camera in her home in London.

Weddings conducted over the telephone are common in this part of Bangladesh. Many marriages are still arranged between conservative Muslim families, and often the bride or groom is living overseas.

A marriage certificate is also a fast route to getting a work visa to leave Bangladesh -- and conducting the wedding by phone is faster and cheaper than arranging for the overseas partner and family to travel home for a wedding.

An imam is present at both ends of the call, along with a civil official who certifies the vows. Duplicate sets of paperwork are then exchanged by mail for everyone's signatures.

Ahmed and his bride had planned a wedding by cellphone and knew they would have to pay $30 or $40 just for the call. The video conference over the Internet, however, would cost a fraction of that, so the imams conducting the ceremony would not have to rush through the prayers to save money.

Jasmine's family moved to London in 1986. Ahmed said he had met her just once, in 2002, when her family came back to Charkhai to visit. They spoke on the phone and exchanged e-mail regularly after that -- and once Ambia's center opened, they saw each other regularly by video conference, even though they live 5,000 miles apart.

"I don't know what other people say, but as far as I'm concerned she's Miss World," Ahmed said.

Russian Venom (WSJ)

By Boris Volodarsky

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

On the evening of Feb. 18, 1954, in Frankfurt, a man called on Georgy Okolovich, a leader of an anti-Soviet émigré union. The business at hand was murder. But things took a different turn when Okolovich opened the door. "I'm a captain in the Ministry of State Security and I have been sent from Moscow to organize your assassination," the visitor told him straight out. "I don't want to carry the order out and I need your help." His name was Nikolai Khokhlov. He defected to the U.S. and revealed that the Soviets used assassination as a political instrument.

Three years later, Mr. Khokhlov was at a conference in Germany when, while with friends, he drank a cup of coffee and collapsed hours later. The doctors called it simple food poisoning, but his condition deteriorated until, 10 days into his illness, his hair began to fall out; his bone marrow was found to be severely damaged and his body showed an almost total loss of the white cells that are vital to the proper functioning of the immune system. Later tests uncovered the culprit: deliberate poisoning by a new and previously unknown form of thallium. He lived to tell the tale.

Fast forward to November 1998, in Moscow, when Col. Alexander Litvinenko of the Russian Ministry of State Security -- the old KGB that today goes by FSB -- publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to assassinate Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky. He was soon arrested and put in the infamous Lefortovo prison. The head of the FSB at the time was Vladimir Putin. A court cleared Mr. Litvinenko the following year of all accusations, including service misconduct and assorted others, but he was rearrested and retried the following year, and cleared again. In 2000, he and his family went to live in exile in Britain. There, Mr. Litvinenko published a book that tied the 1999 bombings of Moscow apartment buildings -- which justified Russia's reinvasion of Chechnya -- to the Putin presidential election campaign, which was successfully propelled by that war.

Early this November, Mr. Litvinenko was invited to tea at a London hotel with a Russian man who was familiar to him from his Moscow days. Some hours later, he had a sushi lunch at Piccadilly Circus with an Italian acquaintance, Mario Scaramella, who wanted to give him documents purportedly throwing light on the recent assassination in Moscow of the opposition journalist Anna Politkovskaya, shot dead last month in her apartment building.

That night, he became violently ill. At first, doctors suspected food poisoning. It was only on the 10th day in hospital, when his hair began to fall out, that toxicology tests were performed. His body contained, these tests showed, three times the fatal dose of thallium. John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who was the first to pinpoint the dioxin poisoning of Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, examined Mr. Litvinenko this Saturday and told the BBC, "There's no doubt that he's been poisoned by thallium." According to my sources close to Alexander, whom I've known for a couple years, investigators now suspect that he was poisoned at the tea, not the lunch. The name of the Russian suspect hasn't been made public by the police.

When I heard the other day that Alexander's condition was worsening, I thought that the doctors perhaps made the same mistake as in the Khokhlov case. Thallium has never been known to attack the blood stream, but that's what's happening to Alexander Litvinenko. Specialists at the U.S. military hospital in Frankfurt only later discovered that Mr. Khokhlov was exposed to radioactivated thallium, which initially only results in non-specific gastrointestinal symptoms; and only later did they observe a moderate elevation of blood lipids, leukocytosis and anemia that occurs in most high-level intoxications. By the time the symptoms known to be after-effects of radiation began to appear, the radioactivated thallium had already disintegrated, making it very hard for doctors to find, and for investigators to confirm, the poisoning. The same scenario may be playing out with Mr. Litvinenko. Yesterday the London hospital treating him said it could not confirm that the poison was thallium -- a diagnosis that in the Khokhlov case was only made by a special U.S. military hospital.

I last met Alexander at London's Connaught Hotel to discuss the Khokhlov case, about which I'd published a monograph. He was investigating the death of Yury Shchekochikhin, an opposition Russian parliamentarian and journalist, who died in suspicious circumstances in 2003 after a two-week illness. His symptoms were similar to President Yushchenko's, pointing clearly to exposure to a toxic agent. After his death, no autopsy was performed and access to medical records wasn't allowed.

Mr. Litvinenko is a small thorn in the side of the current Russian regime. He lives abroad and holds a British passport. That didn't protect him, but nor did it Georgi Markov, the Bulgarian dissident who in 1978 was killed by a KGB ricin-tipped umbrella near Waterloo station.

It is perhaps too early to discuss how and why Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned. Some things are clear. This was likely the work of the Russian secret service that had been after him for years. Whether the Russian president, who was often the object of Mr. Litvinenko's fierce and fearless mockery, is involved is open to doubt. I wonder if Mr. Putin is in control of his squabbling entourage. Whatever the truth, this poisoning also looks to be directed against Boris Berezovsky, now in exile in London and campaigning for regime change in Russia. Mr. Litvinenko is one of his advisers.

Russian foreign intelligence denies any involvement in his poisoning. It cannot deny, however, its long history of using poison as a weapon. The "Kamera," or as KGB veterans might remember it, "Laboratory No. 12," was founded in 1921 in a corner of Lenin's Cheka. This office innovated biological and chemical agents as advancing science and the Kremlin dictated.

But one thing in their design has stayed constant: To make the victim's death or illness appear natural, or at least produce symptoms that will baffle doctors long enough to delay proper treatment. The Chechen rebel Khattab was poisoned in 2004, as was Trotsky's secretary Wolfgang Salus in 1957. Countless other victims were never identified as such.

Before the Litvinenko case, the most prominent poisoning involved Mr. Yushchenko, whose digestive tract and once-chiseled face were destroyed by a complex, dioxin-based compound during a meal with the top officials of his country's security service. Mr. Yushchenko was an unwelcome candidate for Moscow in Ukraine's 2004 elections. Like Khokhlov, he survived; all leads in that case point to the Kamera. The investigation has been hindered by overt pressure on Mr. Yushchenko's doctors at home and in Austria, where he was treated, and Ukrainian politicians.

At this hour, Alexander Litvinenko is fighting for his life in a London hospital.

Mr. Volodarsky, a former Soviet military intelligence officer who lives in London, is the author, with Oleg Gordievsky, of the forthcoming "KGB: The West Side Story."

Programs Help Reduce HIV Rates In Parts Of Africa, Report Says (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Seven African countries are experiencing a decline in the prevalence of HIV infection among young, urban adults, finally reaping the benefit of AIDS prevention and treatment, the United Nations said yesterday in its annual report on the global epidemic.

That good news was offset by troubling signs that the first African country to reverse the epidemic, Uganda, is experiencing a resurgence of infection, as is Thailand, another early success story.

Based on hundreds of national and regional surveys, the report stitches a patchwork of progress and setbacks: a successful national treatment program in Brazil and a new, aggressive response by the Chinese government, alongside a worsening HIV epidemic in the former Soviet bloc and a new outbreak among gay men in Europe.

But the pendulum swing underway in Uganda and Thailand appears to mark a new phase in the 25-year-old AIDS epidemic.

"It should not be a surprise that the countries first to show success will be the first to have a rebound and show problems," said Peter Piot, director of UNAIDS, the program run by the United Nations and the World Bank. "It is something that I am really very worried about."

He and other epidemiologists are trying to learn whether the resurgence of infection in the two nations is a demographic copy of the first wave of AIDS cases or represents the spread of infection to new groups. They are also trying to understand how big a part "prevention fatigue" may be playing in the trend.

"We really don't have an idea why it is happening," Piot said.

The findings make clear that vulnerable populations may differ somewhat from country to country, and that entire nations may be at different stages in the epidemic.

"One of the main messages is the need of countries to know their epidemic," said Paul De Lay, director of monitoring and evaluation at UNAIDS. "The epidemics are continuing to evolve."

Worldwide, 39.5 million people are infected by HIV, up 2.6 million from two years ago. This year, an estimated 4.3 million people will become infected and 2.9 million will die, according to the report. Two-thirds of all adults and children with HIV live in sub-Saharan Africa.

In many countries, HIV incidence is uncertain. Estimates based on the infection rate of pregnant women at public clinics are unrealistically high, and estimates based on household surveys (which often miss such high-risk people as commercial sex workers, drug users, soldiers and migrants) are deceptively low.

Most estimates now combine the methods, and although they are generally lower than previously cited rates, they are still shockingly high for many countries. In Zimbabwe, for example, 20 percent of people 15 to 49 are thought to be infected with the AIDS virus.

Prevalence of the disease in city dwellers 15 to 24, who make up a key demographic gauge of the epidemic's trajectory, has fallen by at least 25 percent in Zimbabwe, Malawi, Kenya, Botswana, Burundi, Rwanda and Ivory Coast. In Zimbabwe, Kenya, Botswana and Tanzania, the rate fell a similar amount among rural people.

In Uganda, the national prevalence is 6.7 percent -- a steep decline from a decade ago, attributed to fewer sex partners, later "sexual debut" by teenagers, increased condom use and rising AIDS mortality through the 1990s. Now, however, AIDS prevalence is rising in some populations, such as rural men (up from 5.6 to 6.5 percent) and rural women (6.9 percent to 8.8 percent), according to recent surveys.

Piot said Uganda also suffered from a period of "decreased credibility" of condoms, the consequence of messages by some fundamentalist groups, a run of defective condoms and then a shortage of condoms.

In Thailand, HIV infection used to be seen almost exclusively in prostitutes and their male clients. The spread of the virus was nearly halted by a national campaign for "100 percent condom use" in commercial sex transactions. Now, however, the epidemic is spreading to married women, who accounted for one-third of new infections last year. It is also becoming far more prevalent in male homosexuals -- up from 17 percent in Bangkok in 2003 to 28 percent in 2005.

In Western Europe, just over one-third of the new HIV infections last year occurred in "men who have sex with men," the term preferred by epidemiologists, because many men infected that way do not consider themselves to be homosexual. The Netherlands, Britain, Portugal, Switzerland and Belgium reported steep increases in the number of infections in that population since 2000.

About 55 percent of new infections in Europe were acquired through opposite-sex intercourse, with three-quarters occurring in immigrants or migrants. The report noted the need to target prevention programs to them.

A major sign of progress is that since 2002, 2 million years of life have been gained by the use of antiviral drugs in low- and middle-income countries. In Africa, 790,000 years of life have been gained, most in the past two years.

Lifesaving combinations of antivirals became widely used in rich countries beginning in 1996. The idea that a decade later they might be used by more than a handful of people in poor countries was viewed by most as unrealistic and possibly dangerous.

Piot said the report demonstrates that policymakers such as himself "need to safeguard early successes like Uganda." He added: "You develop complacency, and the attention moves to something else. That is completely human. The job is never finished, particularly when you have had some successes."

Iran And Arak (NYT)

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

The International Atomic Energy Agency has always had a conflicted mandate. It is supposed to promote the peaceful use of nuclear technology while also restraining the spread of nuclear weapons. The problem is that some peaceful nuclear technology can be too easily used to make a weapon.

That dangerous duality is being played out again this week in Vienna, where the agency's board is debating whether its staff should provide Iran with technical advice on how to safely complete construction of a heavy water nuclear reactor near the town of Arak. Tehran says that it needs the reactor to produce medical isotopes. The United States and the Europeans suspect that what it really wants is the abundant plutonium that can be extracted from the reactor's spent fuel — plutonium that could form the core of a nuclear weapon.

Denying the request should be a no-brainer — especially at a time when Iran is defying a Security Council order that it stop enriching uranium, usable for nuclear reactor fuel or potentially a nuclear bomb. But Tehran is adept at whipping up the suspicions of the board's nuclear have-nots, who jealously guard their right to all civilian nuclear technology, no matter the potential dangers.

The board needs to soundly reject Iran's request. Anything less — some members of the notoriously conflict-averse board are calling for deferring the decision — will only confirm Tehran's belief that the international community is not serious about containing its nuclear ambitions.

Even more worrisome, the Security Council still cannot agree on how to punish Iran for continuing to enrich uranium — nearly three months past a Council-ordered cutoff.

Moscow and Beijing, which have been protecting Tehran at the Council, need to focus less on Iran's oil wealth and more on the dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran. The Bush administration, which has agreed to talk with Iran if it suspends enrichment, needs to go further, offering Tehran explicit security guarantees in exchange for giving up technology that could feed a nuclear weapons program.

Until there are real incentives and equally real punishments there is no chance of changing any minds in Tehran. The Arak episode is one more reminder of why the world needs to find a better way to guarantee countries the benefits of civilian nuclear technology without also dangling the temptations of nuclear weapons.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terrorism Charge May Be Reinstated Against Padilla (AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press

AP, November 22, 2006

MIAMI — Federal prosecutors have asked an appeals court to reinstate a key terrorism charge against an alleged Al Qaeda operative, Jose Padilla, contending a judge erred in finding that it duplicated other counts in the same indictment.

Padilla and two co-defendants are charged with being part of a North American support cell that provided money, supplies, and recruits to Islamic extremists worldwide. Padilla, an American citizen, was held for 3 1/2 years without charge as an "enemy combatant," originally accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in an American city.

The pleading filed with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals late Monday argues that the charge dismissed by U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke is a distinct offense in the case.

Judge Cooke ruled in August that the first count of the indictment against Padilla and two others — charging a conspiracy to "murder, kidnap, and maim persons in a foreign country" — was essentially the same as two other terrorism support counts. The dismissed charge is the only one in the case that carries a potential life prison sentence.

Reno Joins Criticism Of Anti-Terror Strategy (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Former attorney general Janet Reno has taken the unusual step of openly criticizing the Bush administration's anti-terrorism strategy -- joining seven other former Justice Department officials in warning that the indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene.

In a friend-of-the-court brief filed in the case of alleged enemy combatant Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, the former prosecutors assert that criminal courts are well equipped to prosecute terrorism suspects while guaranteeing the constitutional rights of defendants arrested on U.S. soil.

Reno, reached at her Florida home yesterday, said she would let the brief "speak for itself. I've been following this, and it reflects my concerns about the detention and treatment of people who have been determined to be enemy combatants in a manner that is not clear how it is being done."

In their brief, Reno and the other former Justice Department officials said: "The government is essentially asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute those people criminally -- perhaps because it would be too difficult to obtain a conviction, perhaps because a motion to suppress evidence would raise embarrassing facts about the government's conduct, or perhaps for other reasons."

The filing in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit is a highly unusual move for Reno. She has generally maintained a low profile since leaving the helm of the Justice Department in 2001 and has said little publicly about the policies of her successors, John D. Ashcroft and Alberto R. Gonzales.

The brief is also notable because its signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years -- W. Thomas Dillard and Anton R. Valukas -- in addition to prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip A. Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor.

"It carries more weight because these are high-ranking officials in several administrations from both parties," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

Marri, a Qatari national, has been held as an enemy combatant in a military prison in South Carolina since he was accused of being an al Qaeda "sleeper agent" sent to the United States to carry out attacks. Unlike the hundreds of detainees being held in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Marri was apprehended on U.S. soil, in Peoria, Ill., and is the only remaining enemy combatant held inside the United States.

The Justice Department argues that an anti-terrorism law, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, allows the government to detain any foreign national as an enemy combatant, regardless of where they were arrested. The administration wants to place Marri into its military trial system, but he is challenging the legality of his detention.

"While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing in this case as both the magistrate judge and district court concluded," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said yesterday.

Gonzales defended the administration's detention and surveillance policies in a weekend speech at the Air Force Academy, telling cadets that it is a "myth" that civil liberties have been hampered by anti-terrorism strategies.

Reno, Former U.S. Officials Challenge Military Trials (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Jeff St.onge

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

Nov. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials challenged the Bush administration's bid to try suspected terrorist Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a foreign national living in the U.S. when he was arrested, before a military commission.

Reno and the others said the Bush administration is trying to set a dangerous precedent that would let the government indefinitely imprison any non-U.S. citizen considered an enemy. The former U.S. officials were joined by at least four human rights groups making similar arguments.

The administration is ``asserting the right to hold putative enemy combatants arrested in the United States indefinitely whenever it decides not to prosecute them criminally," Reno, six former U.S. attorneys and a former deputy solicitor general said in a ``friend-of-the-court" brief.

Al-Marri, 41, was the first defendant removed from the U.S. criminal justice system and deemed an illegal enemy combatant. He was studying in the U.S. and living in Illinois when he was arrested in late 2001. The Justice Department unsealed the indictment in December 2002, and he was declared an enemy combatant about six months later. A citizen of Qatar, al-Marri has been held at a U.S. Navy Prison in South Carolina since June 2003.

The Justice Department said it stands by its decision to try al-Marri as a suspected terrorist outside the criminal court system.

Complex Issues

``These are complex and difficult legal issues," said Justice Department spokeswoman Kathleen Blomquist in an e-mailed statement today. ``While we respect the right of other legal minds to be heard on these issues, we believe we are on firm legal footing."

The Justice Department said a new anti-terrorism law, the Military Commissions Act, gives terrorism suspects such as al-Marri no right to challenge their imprisonment.

Jonathan Hafetz, one of al-Marri's lawyers, said a hearing on the government's request to have al-Marri's challenge to his detention thrown out is scheduled for late January or early February in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond.

``This is an unprecedented, unlawful and un-American attempt to deprive an individual living in this country of basic constitutional rights," said Hafetz, from New York University's Brennan Center Justice, in a phone interview.

Reno was attorney general in President Bill Clinton's administration. The other officials who joined her on the legal brief served under Clinton and President Ronald Reagan, such as former U.S. Attorney Anton Valukas, who is now a partner at the Jenner & Block law firm in Chicago. Some represent detainees held at the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay in Cuba, according to Hafetz.

The case is Al-Marri v. Wright, 06-7427 in the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia.

Editorial: Terror Detainees Still Face Legal Limbo (DENP)

Denver Post, November 22, 2006

Justice for the 9/11 victims requires that high-level detainees be charged and prosecuted. And, Congress should restore the right of habeas corpus.

A few months back, when President Bush was pushing Congress for the authority to try suspected terrorists before military commissions, he made a surprise announcement confirming the existence of secret overseas prisons.

Among those behind bars were 14 al-Qaeda terror suspects who were relocated to the military prison at Guantanamo Bay.

President Bush said then that the legislation was necessary to bring these people and others to justice. Among them was Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, considered the mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

The president was asking Congress for powers the U.S. Supreme Court had ruled unconstitutional, and he cast it as a time-sensitive situation.

DOJ_NMG_0097281

"As soon as Congress acts to authorize the military commissions I have proposed, the men our intelligence officials believe orchestrated the deaths of nearly 3,000 Americans on Sept. 11, 2001, can face justice," Bush said in September. "To start the process for bringing them to trial, we must bring them out into the open."

But what seemed so urgent at the time is now taking on a different tenor.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told The Denver Post editorial board Monday that the administration can hold Guantanamo Bay detainees indefinitely, without any judicial proceeding through the "period of hostilities." Which is to say, indefinitely.

The administration has categorized an untold number of detainees as "unlawful enemy combatants," saying they are members of a non-state terrorist group. It's a different class of detainee than POWs, typically uniformed combatants captured during battlefield-style warfare. The U.S. in previous wars has held enemy combatants. But the Military Commissions Act of 2006 broadened the definition of illegal enemy combatant to include those providing support to terrorists. As such, they have no right to a real day in court. "We have no obligation to bring people to justice," Gonzales said.

And even when military commission proceedings begin, Gonzales predicted slow going due to defendants' legal maneuverings.

"At every opportunity they're going to bring challenges," he said. But these opportunities have shrunk considerably.

In fact, Congress gave the president the authority to use military commissions in a bill that included one particularily controversial provision - denying the detainees a procedure known as habeas corpus, a right that obligates the government to justify imprisonment before a federal judge.

With the removal of habeas rights, the detainees have no way of challenging their status in federal court. That alone has spawned litigation that seems sure to make its way to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, the wheels of makeshift justice are grinding slowly. Government officials told The New York Times earlier this month that the first military commission trials at Gitmo could begin this summer, but those will not involve any of the 14 senior al-Qaeda members recently moved to the prison in Cuba. Along with Shaikh Mohammed, they include Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be Sept. 11 hijacker, and Abu Zubaydah, who is said to have served as a link between al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and cells in his organization.

It could be well into 2008 before those high in the command structure of al-Qaeda would be tried, or never. We believe that egregious crimes should be prosecuted as quickly as practical, as the president suggested in his September remarks. Victims of Sept. 11 have already waited five years for justice.

As for those who are in detention at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, the denial of habeas corpus is unnecessary and un-American. While the U.S. Supreme Court almost certainly will get a crack at this questionable law, members of Congress shouldn't wait. They should review the military commissions act as an early order of business in 2007 and at the very least restore the right of habeas corpus to those imprisoned at Guantanamo.

It is a step that will bring the U.S. back into line with our own traditions and rights.

Gonzales Acknowledges Supermax Problems, Says They're Addressed (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

DENVER — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged the federal government has made mistakes at the ultra-high-security Supermax prison in Colorado, including inadequate monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls, but he said steps are being taken to address the problem.

"Have mistakes been made? Have there been some problems there? No question about it, like there are at every facility," Gonzales said Monday. "But we've taken steps to address them."

Supermax, in the town of Florence about 80 miles south of Denver, houses some of the nation's most dangerous inmates, including Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Local and federal officials have criticized the prison in recent weeks over staffing levels, security measures and fencing.

A Justice Department report in September criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications. Last month, a federal arbitrator found staff cuts had made the facility more dangerous. Both Colorado's senators, Republican Wayne Allard and Democrat Ken Salazar, and local officials have raised concerns about security and communications.

Gonzales said all inmate mail is now being read and a large portion of phone calls are monitored as they occur. The rest are recorded and reviewed by translators later, though a shortage of qualified Arabic translators has caused a delay.

He did not say how long the delay was.

Gonzales said he has asked the director of the Bureau of Prisons to look into potential technology improvements at Supermax and whether perimeter patrols should be stepped up.

DOJ_NMG_0097282

Gonzales said 11 staff members have been added at Supermax in recent weeks and seven more will begin work soon. Those 18 would bring the facility to 208, still fewer than the 240 who were there when the prison opened in 1994.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Rainier Valley Barbershop Owner Flees U.S. (SEAPI)

By Paul Shukovsky, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 22, 2006

Facing sentencing in plea deal, he phones FBI to say he's in Somalia

Ruben Shumpert, who federal agents allege made his Rainier Valley barber shop a kind of "anti-American training ground for Muslims" where children were taught "how to shoot and fight the Americans," has telephoned the FBI to say he won't be going to prison anytime soon.

Shumpert, who faces sentencing on federal counterfeiting and weapons charges, has fled to Somalia.

A warrant has been issued for the arrest of Shumpert, who is also known as Amir Abdul Muhaimin, Assistant U.S. Attorney Bill Redkey said. He was to be sentenced Tuesday.

Shumpert -- an African American convert to Islam -- was among more than a dozen, mostly African immigrants from Islamic countries arrested by the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force two years ago on a mix of charges, including immigration fraud and bank fraud.

Shumpert was never charged with any terrorism crimes, but court documents paint a picture of his barber shop at 7821 Rainier Ave. S. as a gathering place for adherents of radical Islam where he showed children videotapes of "fighting, shooting and killing with images on Shumpert's computer screen of al-Qaida and the Taliban."

Shumpert had been free on personal recognizance and was facing sentencing under a plea agreement when he fled the country, Redkey said. Shumpert called an FBI agent on the Joint Terrorism Task Force from Somalia, Redkey said.

But he noted that the United States has no extradition treaty with Somalia. Somalia is considered a fertile breeding ground for radical Islamic terrorists by U.S. intelligence agencies.

Redkey said Shumpert also likely is to be charged with failing to appear for his sentencing hearing, a separate felony.

A condition of Shumpert's release before sentencing was that he surrender his passport, said Redkey, who noted that in recent years, it has become more common for judges to allow defendants to turn in their passports after they are released from custody. Shumpert never surrendered his passport, Redkey said.

Redkey said the U.S. Attorney's Office is reviewing the practice of allowing people out of custody before they surrender their passport.

Seattle Convict Who Espoused Radical Views Flees To Somalia (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

AP, November 22, 2006

SEATTLE -- A south Seattle barbershop worker who allegedly espoused radical Islamic views fled to Somalia rather than show up in federal court to be sentenced on gun and counterfeiting charges.

"He decided he liked his chances better elsewhere," Assistant U.S. Attorney William Redkey said after Tuesday's sentencing was put off. "It's always a concern when someone who has espoused radical ideas heads to a place like Somalia, of course."

Ruben Shumpert helped run Crescent Cuts barber shop in Seattle's Rainier Valley, according to documents filed in U.S. District Court. He was arrested two years ago and charged with being a felon in possession of a firearm, following an FBI investigation into activities at the shop. He was accused of providing a gun to one person and giving $700 to another for the purpose of buying a gun.

Redkey said he isn't sure when Shumpert fled. He was last in court on Sept. 20, when he appeared on bond to plead guilty to the weapons charge and to transferring counterfeit currency. He entered the pleas in exchange for a recommended sentence of 24 to 30 months.

Shumpert's lawyer, James Vonasch, said the government told him only that his client had left the country. He didn't know until contacted by The Associated Press that Shumpert had gone to Somalia - a war-wracked East African country that's considerably less safe than federal prison.

"He hasn't been checking in with his lawyer," Vonasch said. "That is a horrible place to go to."

Vonasch also said that Shumpert claims to speak some Arabic, and that an FBI agent who worked the case got a call from him within the past two weeks.

"The agent implied it was an unpleasant conversation, but he didn't supply me with the details," Vonasch said.

Vonasch said Shumpert's wife and two young children are still in Seattle. The FBI questioned the wife about Shumpert's whereabouts, he said.

The FBI's investigation into the barbershop relied on paid informants who told agents that Shumpert and other men who would meet at the shop often spoke in bellicose anti-American terms. Eventually, agents determined that they were "unable or unwilling to engage in acts of terrorism," according to court documents.

Some - including Shumpert - were indicted on non-terrorism-related charges, such as document fraud and firearms violations.

Among the items removed from the barbershop were "jihad motivational DVDs," prosecutors wrote in a sentencing memorandum last July.

"If youngsters came in to play video games he would encourage them first to view the motivational DVDs," they wrote of Shumpert. "The subject matter of the DVDs included a glowing tribute to the '19 Martyrs,' referring to the 9/11 terrorists."

Shumpert, who has previous state convictions on weapons and assault charges, denied being a radical. In a 12-page, neatly handwritten letter to the judge this summer, he said he wanted to take responsibility for his crimes, and credited Islam with turning him from a life of theft and drug-dealing. But he also criticized the FBI's reliance on paid informants who first befriended him and then begged him to get them guns and counterfeit money.

"Has there ever been any (news) stories that show how these sort of FBI investigations have torn apart whole communities with false allegations and entrapment?" he wrote. "I ask you please, don't let them throw us away in the system so easily."

Vonasch said it appeared likely that the judge might give a longer sentence than the 24-30 month recommendation; she rejected a previous plea agreement that would have made that sentencing range binding on the court.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on each other. The current administration was formed with the help of the United Nations two years ago, but it has failed to assert any real control outside the southern town of Baidoa, where it is based.

New Plan Aims To Better Share Terrorism Data (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- More than five years after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, U.S. intelligence officials have unveiled the first comprehensive plan to help federal, state and local officials share information about terrorist threats. But whether the government will provide the money and commitment needed to make the plan work remains uncertain.

The Office of the Director of National Intelligence, which is coordinating the new plan, known as the "Information Sharing Environment," said it aims to break down barriers by allowing federal and local agencies to send representatives to the National Counterterrorism Center, the government's main terrorism-information clearinghouse.

The plan also seeks to overhaul the way classified and sensitive data are handled so information can better reach the people who need to see it, like governors, mayors, police chiefs and, eventually, beat police on the street.

A senior U.S. intelligence official said President Bush asked the DNI to create a framework to allow the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to better coordinate their threat assessments and warnings to state and local authorities. The White House has grown increasingly concerned about the poor quality of information sharing between the federal government and the states.

State and local officials cautiously welcomed the plan, which was unveiled a week ago but details of which they have been learning in recent days. But many warned the effort wouldn't work without federal money and muscle to provide better technology and to put an end to traditional interagency turf battles.

Deputy Chief Mark Leap of the Los Angeles Police Department said the ISE is a promising first step but that local police need "almost instantaneous access" to information for decision-making purposes. "There is no system to support that kind of access right now," he said.

The office of the Director of National Intelligence is currently in talks with the White House about funding for the new technology and personnel costs outlined in the plan. Officials haven't decided how much this will cost or who should pay for it.

The Department of Homeland Security is in charge of communicating threat information to state and local governments. It has been helping states and regions set up "fusion" centers to coordinate information locally. These centers are a key part of the new information-sharing plan, although the information they handle isn't just terrorism-related.

Sens. Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, and Joseph I. Lieberman, from Connecticut, wrote a letter, released yesterday, alleging that the department's information-sharing programs remain weak a year after Hurricane Katrina.

The Homeland Security Information Network, a program intended to link so-called first responders -- those on the front line in responding to a disaster or crisis, such as firemen -- and disseminate intelligence to local authorities, has largely failed, the letter said. It said only 6% of an estimated 18,000 first responders use the network on a regular basis. As a result, the Homeland Security Department can't reliably obtain "situational awareness," or knowledge of current information from the site of a disaster or terrorist attack, the letter said.

The need to share information collected by local police about suspicious activity has increased along with fears that homegrown radical groups pose perhaps a greater threat to the U.S. than foreign terrorists.

6 Imams Removed From Flight For Behavior Deemed Suspicious (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

Six Muslim religious leaders were taken off a US Airways flight in Minneapolis on Monday evening and detained for several hours after some passengers and crew members complained of behavior they deemed suspicious, including prayers at the gate.

The incident prompted the Council on American-Islamic Relations and officials for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Washington to call Tuesday for Congressional hearings on racial profiling and an investigation by the Justice Department and the Transportation Security Administration.

Nihad Awad, executive director of the Islamic advocacy group, said this was hardly the first time Muslims had encountered problems with stereotyping by the airline. “We seem to have received more complaints against US Airways” than other carriers, Mr. Awad said in an interview. Those complaints have come from Muslim employees and passengers alike, he said.

Morgan Durrant, a US Airways spokesman, said the airline was investigating the episode. But he said the crew had acted in accordance with the company’s policy for removing passengers, though he declined to give specifics on the policy.

The six men detained, all imams, had attended a Minneapolis conference of the North American Imams Federation. They were handcuffed by the police and led off the flight, bound for Phoenix, after reports from passengers and crew members of “unsettling” behavior, according to a police report. One passenger had slipped a note to a flight attendant that began, “6 suspicious Arabic men on plane,” the report said.

After being detained for five hours and questioned separately by federal agents, all six men were released, said Patrick Hogan, a spokesman for Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport.

One of the six, Omar Ahmad Shahin of Phoenix, said he had been questioned for less than a half-hour. “This is the humiliation,” said Dr. Shahin, 45. “They found nothing. They found we had a good relation with everybody.”

A phone call to the Minneapolis office of the F.B.I. on Tuesday was not returned.

The men’s fare was refunded to them, but on Tuesday morning a US Airways ticket agent refused to book them on another flight to Phoenix. They returned instead on a Northwest Airlines flight.

Detailed accounts of the incident varied. Witnesses, including a number of passengers and US Airways employees, said they heard some of the men making anti-American remarks and chanting “Allah,” first as they boarded the plane and then when led off, Mr. Hogan said.

Others said the men behaved strangely once on board, with some asking for seat belt extensions, the police report said. “I did not see they actually needed them,” one flight attendant wrote in a statement given to the police. “They were not overweight.”

Dr. Shahin disagreed, saying the extensions were necessary for their “big bodies.”

In another statement, a gate agent said some of the imams had been praying in Arabic in the gate area. “I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud,” the agent said.

A second imam, Ahmad Tafish Shqeirat, said that three of the six had prayed in the gate area, in the ritual of evening prayers, but had not meant to be disruptive and indeed had taken pains not to disturb other passengers.

6 Imams Removed From Twin Cities Flight (AP)

By Martiga Lohn

The AP, November 21, 2006

Six Muslim clerics removed from a US Airways flight said Tuesday they were victims of discrimination and called for a boycott of the airline.

The imams were removed from the flight to Phoenix on Monday night after three of them said their normal evening prayers in the terminal in Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport before boarding, said Omar Shahin, president of the North American Imams Federation. They were among the 150 imams who attended a federation meeting in Minneapolis.

DOJ_NMG_0097285

"The police came and take us off the plane in front of all the passengers in a very humiliated way," said Shahin. "I never felt bad in my life like yesterday. It was the worst moment in my life when I see six imams, six leaders in this community, humiliated."

The Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said in a letter Tuesday it had opened an investigation.

US Airways Group Inc. issued a statement saying it was interviewing crew members and ground workers to find out more about what happened.

"We are always concerned when passengers are inconvenienced and especially concerned when a situation occurs that causes customers to feel their dignity was compromised. We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind," the airline said.

An airport police report said the flight's captain had already decided he wanted the men off the plane after the passenger passed a flight attendant a note pointing out "Arabic men."

Witnesses said the men prayed in the terminal and made critical comments about the Iraq war, according to the police report, and a US Airways manager said three of the men had only one-way tickets and no checked baggage.

An airport police officer and a federal air marshal agreed that the combination of circumstances was suspicious, and eventually asked the men to leave the airplane, the police report said.

"There were a number of things that gave the flight crew pause," Airport spokesman Patrick Hogan said. It wasn't immediately possible to verify whether the passengers who reported suspicious activity witnessed it themselves.

But Shahin and Marwan Sadeddin, another of the imams, strongly denied doing anything out of the ordinary. They entered the aircraft individually, except for Sadeddin, who is blind and needed a guide, Shahin said. Once on the plane, the six did not sit together, he said.

Shahin said no one asked the six to leave until police arrived, when the group complied.

The other passengers on the flight, which was carrying 141 passengers and five crew members, were re-screened for boarding. The plane took off about three hours after the men were removed.

On Tuesday, US Airways refused to honor the group's tickets or allow them to buy new ones, saying their payment for Monday's flight had been refunded.

Shahin eventually booked flights on Northwest Airlines — to Phoenix for five of the imams from the Phoenix-Tempe area and to Los Angeles for the sixth, who is from Bakersfield, Calif.

Shahin said his days of praying in airports may be over. "It's terrible, unfortunately," he said. "In America we have no freedom to practice our faith, to do our faith."

Shahin expressed frustration that — despite extensive efforts by him and other Muslim leaders since even before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — so many Americans know so little about Islam, which requires prayer five times a day.

Nihad Awad, executive director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, said he hoped the incident would "raise awareness among the general public and the airline industry that praying as a Muslim and flying as a Muslim should not trigger any fear and any prejudice."

Muslim Scholar Calls For A Boycott Of US Airways (CCT)

By Bob Von Sternberg And Pamela Miller

The Contra Costa Times, November 22, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS - From now on, Omar Shahin won't be praying at the airport while waiting for a flight.

"This was humiliating, the worst moment of my life," Shahin said Tuesday, a day after he and five fellow Muslim imams were escorted off a US Airways jet at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport. "To practice your faith and pray is a crime in America?" he said.

The incident set off a nationwide uproar, and the Department of Homeland Security's Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties said it will review the incident.

Bloggers and talk radio buzzed about the need to be vigilant against potential terrorists, while civil rights advocates and Muslim leaders cried foul. The national Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) called for a congressional hearing about ethnic and religious profiling at airports.

Locally, the Jewish Community Relations Council of Minnesota and the Dakotas and the Somali Justice Advocacy Center questioned the detention.

Bushra Khan, spokeswoman for CAIR's Arizona chapter, said, "All these men did was pray, and it was misunderstood. The bottom line is that they were Middle Eastern-looking men . . . and that scares some people."

US Airways said that it would fully investigate the matter and that passenger safety is paramount.

The religious leaders were heading home to Phoenix after a three-day North American Imams Federation conference in Bloomington, Minn.

The pilot ordered the men off the flight after their praying, conversation and behavior alarmed several passengers and flight attendants.

The imams denied that they did or said anything that could be considered threatening. They were released without charges after being questioned for five hours by federal law enforcement officials.

Left behind by US Airways, Shahin, president of the imams' group, called for a boycott of US Airways after an agent and his supervisor, without giving a reason, refused to sell him replacement tickets Tuesday morning.

"I'm not going to stay silent," Shahin said. "I came to this country to enjoy justice and freedom."

The US Airways supervisor told Shahin that his tickets had been refunded and that he would have to go to another airline. The supervisor offered Shahin a customer service phone number.

"I want to go home. I don't want phone numbers," Shahin said. "They have no reason to refuse service to us just because of the way we look."

He bought six one-way tickets at the Northwest Airlines counter, and the men flew to Phoenix without incident.

In a statement to police, a US Airways gate agent wrote that three of the men prayed in Arabic at the gate. "I was suspicious by the way they were praying very loud," the gate agent said.

Said Shahin: "We were never bothering anyone, not saying anything loudly. We were just prostrating ourselves, the normal way we pray."

Devout Muslims pray five times a day, but practices vary among cultural groups, said Owais Bayunus, a Twin Cities Muslim scholar.

"Those who pray in the airport would be more conservative Muslims who stop to pray at the designated times no matter where they are," he said. "Others accept the fatwa (an opinion by an Islamic legal scholar) that it is acceptable to combine the prayers during travel."

Before passengers boarded, one became alarmed by an overheard discussion. "They seemed angry," he wrote in a police statement. "Mentioned `U.S.' and `killing Saddam.' Two men then swore slightly under their breath/mumbled. They spoke Arabic again. The gate called boarding for the flight. The men then chanted `Allah, Allah, Allah.'"

Marwan Sadeddin, another of the imams, said, "What bothers me the most is these false statements and lies that we were shouting, `Allah, Allah.' This never happened."

Another, Ahmad Shqeirat, said, "That is a lie. We were not talking politics. And even if we did, so what? What is suspicious about that?"

Once the six were seated, two in front, two in the middle and two in back, and paid visits to each other to chat, some passengers became alarmed, the police report said. One passed a note to a flight attendant citing the alleged comments about Allah and Saddam.

Flight attendants alerted the pilot, who called airport police and asked them to remove the men from the plane. They left "cooperatively," according to the police report.

A bomb-sniffing dog examined the men, their luggage and the entire airplane and found nothing. The plane left for Phoenix about three hours late after the other 141 passengers reboarded.

After being questioned by agents of the U.S. Marshals Service, the FBI, the Secret Service and the Transportation Security Administration, the men were released.

Asad Zaman, communications director for the Muslim American Society of Minnesota, said an Arizona MAS chapter member called him for help about 11 p.m. Monday because the six imams had not arrived and one had called his wife to say police detained them.

Within 10 minutes of a Minnesota imam's call to police, the six were free, Zaman said.

"This event would be the equivalent of Roman Catholic bishops being arrested in China because they wore clerical robes and invoked Jesus Christ in prayers," Zaman said.

Muslims Escorted Off Minneapolis Flight (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

A half-dozen Muslims were removed from a US Airways flight in Minneapolis on Monday evening after nervous passengers alerted the flight crew about suspicious behavior.

The men, who officials later learned were Islamic religious leaders, refused to leave the plane and were escorted by security off Flight 300 from Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport to Phoenix at 6:30 p.m.

Conflicting reports say the men were praying in the concourse or on the plane, and a Minnesota television reported that the imams were chanting "Allah, Allah, Allah," as they left the plane.

Douglas Hagmann, director of the Northeast Intelligence Network, a private organization that investigates terrorist threats, said his contacts are reporting the men did begin the prayers in the concourse, then continued prayers and discussions once on board.

"One of the passengers who understands Arabic passed a note to the crew that what she heard, she did not like," Mr. Hagmann said.

Patrick Hogan, spokesman for the Minneapolis-St. Paul Metropolitan Airports Commission, said the men reportedly made anti-American statements relating to the Iraq war, asked to change seats once inside the cabin, and that one requested an extender to make his seat belt larger even though he did not appear to need it.

"There was some peculiar behavior," Mr. Hagmann said.

In a statement released by US Airways yesterday, the airline said they "are diligently conducting our own investigation" and working with law-enforcement officials and government agencies.

"We are always concerned when passengers are inconvenienced and especially concerned when a situation occurs that causes customers to feel their dignity was compromised. We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind and will continue to exhaust our internal investigation until we know the facts of this case and can provide answers for the employees and customers involved in this incident," the statement said.

The imams, along with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, Minnesota Democrat and the first Muslim elected to Congress, had attended a conference in Minneapolis of the North American Imams Federation.

A call and e-mail for comment to Mr. Ellison's campaign office were not returned.

The imams and officials of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) say the men were victims of prejudice and ignorance.

"We are concerned that crew members, passengers and security personnel may have succumbed to fear and prejudice based on stereotyping of Muslims and Islam," said Nihad Awad, CAIR's director. "CAIR is receiving more reports of 'flying while Muslim' and racial profiling incidents from members of the Islamic community nationwide."

The group is calling for congressional hearings on racial, religious and ethnic profiling at airports, and investigations by the Justice and Homeland Security departments. The Office for Civil Rights and Civil Liberties at DHS has already opened an investigation.

Mr. Hagmann called the incident "ideological jihad" and a "test run" to undermine airport security through litigation.

"This is a watershed event in this country -- one week before Thanksgiving when tensions are high -- and they are looking for this to be litigated ad nauseam," Mr. Hagmann said.

Report Finds DHS Lax On Contracting Procedures (WP)

By Robert O'harrow Jr. And Scott Higham

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Private consultants hired by the Department of Homeland Security have found widespread problems with its contracting operation, including nearly three dozen contract files that could not be located.

Files that could be found often lacked basic documentation required under federal rules, such as evidence that the department negotiated the best prices for taxpayers, according to a copy of the consultants' report obtained by The Washington Post.

"The inability to locate files and inconsistent file organization puts the government at risk in ensuring the contractor is fulfilling its contractual obligations and the government is meeting its contract administration responsibilities," the consultants wrote in their report.

The assessment underscores complaints by department auditors and outside experts that procurement officials persistently neglected contracting responsibilities as they spent billions of dollars after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks -- much of it on security systems that do not work as planned.

"This strongly suggests that we're buying the wrong stuff, the wrong way, possibly from the wrong contractors, and failing to check before, during or after," said Charles Tiefer, an expert on government contracting who teaches at the University of Baltimore School of Law.

The confidential report, delivered to department officials in March, focused on spending in fiscal 2005 by the Office of Procurement Operations. During that period, nearly $17.5 billion was spent department-wide on contracts for a variety of goods and services, including security at airports and borders, radiation-detection monitors, and information technology consultants.

Department spokesman Larry Orluskie said procurement officials are following several recommendations made in the report.

"We've acted upon each one of their findings," Orluskie said. "It was an internal look. We are going to bring them in again to make sure we are following up."

Last year, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, Deputy Secretary Michael P. Jackson and others at the agency acknowledged having trouble with contracting and promised to do better. They said they had made progress by hiring scores of contracting officials and by tightening rules.

But the confidential report adds weight to critics' contentions that contracting problems persist. Last week, the agency's inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, told a House panel that "expediency, poorly defined requirements and inadequate oversight" are creating "a high risk of cost overruns, mismanagement or failure."

The firm hired to write the report, Acquisition Solutions, examined a sample of 72 contract files for DHS, which wanted to determine whether it was following federal contracting laws and internal policies.

At the outset, the team of acquisition specialists could not locate 33 of the 72 contract files it had selected for the review, so the consultants had to select 33 others.

"The files were extremely difficult to locate and were organized in an inconsistent manner," they wrote.

The consultants sharply criticized an array of contracting procedures. Of the 72 contract files reviewed, only 14 were deemed to be in "excellent" shape. Those files contained evidence that the contracts were awarded with adequate competition and represented the best deal for taxpayers.

Forty-seven files met only "minimum" standards and showed little evidence of fair and reasonable pricing or supervision by contracting officials.

Eleven files were deemed to be "seriously inadequate," with key documents missing or incomplete and little evidence that the contracts were competitively awarded or prices were justified.

The consultants said some information in the files "seems to be just enough to 'get by.' "

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), who is in line to assume chairmanship of the Senate's Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said he intends to hold hearings on DHS contracting next year.

"I expect the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee to conduct vigorous oversight of this issue in the 110th Congress," he said.

Fliers Urged To Ease Logjam (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, November 22, 2006

Aviation officials are waging an unprecedented campaign to warn travelers about new restrictions on carry-on bags that they fear could bog down lines during the busiest Thanksgiving travel weekend ever.

The Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is staging events at 66 airports to alert passengers that they can carry only limited amounts of liquids, aerosols and gels on airplanes. Airports are warning of the restrictions with ads, billboards and workers who hand out plastic bags that travelers must use to pack carry-on liquids.

A record 25 million passengers — up from 21.6 million last Thanksgiving — are projected to take flights Nov. 17 through Nov. 28.

“We're kind of bracing,” said Tara Hamilton of Washington's Dulles and Reagan National airports, where high school students have been paid to remind travelers about security rules.

Lines on Sunday and Monday were a minute or two longer than a year ago, TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said. At Orlando International Airport, local resident Todd Elliott said the security line was about 40 minutes Tuesday morning, but other travelers around the USA said lines were mostly routine.

“TSA is very focused on keeping waits down,” Howe said.

Many Thanksgiving travelers have not flown since the TSA restricted the amount of liquids passengers may carry, which could lead to uncertainty about the rule, Howe said. The restrictions took effect after British authorities disrupted a plot to bomb U.S.-bound airliners using liquid explosives.

Passengers must pack all carry-on liquids in a single zip-top, quart-size plastic bag. The liquid containers can be no larger than 3 ounces. Larger quantities may be packed in checked luggage.

“Many people don't realize we want the stuff in a clear plastic bag so we can see it,” said Cris Soulia, a screener at San Diego airport.

Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, predicted reasonable security lines at most airports. “It's going to be all hands on deck to avoid any embarrassment,” Mitchell said.

Airports and the TSA typically beef up staff during travel crunches. In Los Angeles, LAX recently completed a year-long process of adding eight security lanes to ease some of the USA's longest lines.

DOJ_NMG_0097289

Allison Harris of Washington tried to go through security Tuesday at Dulles airport with a half-filled 5-ounce bottle of hair gel. A screener told her the bottle was too big, so Harris returned to the terminal to buy 3-ounce bottles, poured the gel in and went back through security.

"It's very irritating," Harris said. "It's probably my own fault for not thinking about it beforehand."

Air Officials Get Set For Travel Trial (USAT)

By Thomas Frank And Larry Copeland

USA Today, November 22, 2006

This Thanksgiving poses one of the biggest recent tests to the nation's aviation system — whether or not airport security lines will flow smoothly despite a record number of passengers and new security rules.

Many travelers and officials are nervously optimistic.

Some warn that a large number of inexperienced passengers facing unfamiliar carry-on restrictions will bring about fearsome backups.

The test comes at a crucial time for the struggling airline industry and the Transportation Security Administration.

Thanksgiving is one of the busiest travel periods — 25 million passengers are expected from Nov. 17-28 — and starts the crucial holiday travel season. The TSA, an oft-criticized agency created after 9/11, could face heightened scrutiny when Democrats take control of Congress in January. It could also face criticism if lines are delayed.

The weekend's significance is underscored by an awareness campaign by the TSA, airlines and airports to highlight new restrictions on the amount of liquids, aerosols and gels passengers can carry on airplane cabins. News stories, posters, ads and e-mails have inundated travelers in virtually every major city and smaller areas from Eau Claire, Wis., to Midland, Texas.

David and Sherry Lautares got the message. David saw a TV news story Monday about security rules. Sherry got an e-mail from Delta Air Lines on the subject that day.

By the time the Lautareses and their daughter, Molly, 9, got to Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International on Tuesday to fly to New York, they could recite the new security policy: "It's 3-1-1," David Lautares said. "Three ounces of liquid or gel, 1-quart bag and one bag per passenger in the security bin."

Lautares may be an exception. Stan Kotowski, a frequent flier from Princeton, N.J., saw "ungodly" lines two weeks ago at airports. Passengers didn't know about the liquid restrictions, or they didn't care.

"It's ignorance and arrogance," Kotowski said. "Some people had absolutely no clue."

That worries aviation consultant Michael Boyd. He fears a "lollapalooza" of security delays on what he calls "amateur" weekend when the ill-informed and impossible-to-educate amass at airports.

"You can't really make these people aware of it, no matter what you do," Boyd said. "It's just not going to get through."

Ben DeCosta disagrees. The Atlanta airport manager pointed to garbage bins by security checkpoints to prove the success of a publicity campaign featuring ads and banner-size airport posters. On Tuesday, the bins mostly held empty water bottles and innocuous trash.

When the restrictions took effect in late summer, 6-ounce toothpaste tubes and 4-ounce shampoo bottles filled the bins — contraband taken from travelers unaware of the policy. Restrictions began after authorities said they foiled a plot in London to bomb U.S.-bound planes with liquid explosives.

"It's a campaign with the TSA to make the infrequent traveler, who's traveling a lot during the holiday period, aware of the rules," DeCosta said.

Aviation consultant Robert Mann said the TSA's campaign was "far more comprehensive" than in its previous security changes, such as when small scissors and tools were allowed in cabins last December.

At Los Angeles International Airport on Tuesday, lines were smooth. "It's moving pretty fast," Hawaii-bound Jamie Olivas said. "Last year, this year, they're about the same."

FBI Struggles To Win Trust Of Muslim, Arab Communities (BVND)

By Marisa Taylor

The Belleville News Democrat, November 22, 2006

RICHMOND, Va. - When a local FBI agent wanted to make contacts in this city's tight-knit Muslim community, he started knocking on doors.

The agent didn't look, much less act, like a typical investigator. He spoke Arabic and he wore street clothes, not the suit and tie favored by many in the bureau.

"He seemed really friendly," said Muhammad Sahli, a U.S. citizen approached at his home last month by the agent. "So I invited him in."

But the agent's questions about international terrorist organizations unnerved Sahli. The agent wanted to know if Sahli knew anyone with ties to extremist groups. Sahli, a Muslim married to a Christian woman, said he didn't.

"You ask yourself, `Why me?'" said Sahli, a 71-year-old retired chemist. "When you've never had a visit from the FBI before in your life, you feel a certain amount of anxiety, even though you've done nothing wrong."

For many Muslim and Arab-Americans these days, meeting a FBI agent can be an unsettling, even terrifying experience.

Beginning almost immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the FBI began to root out suspected terrorists, and Arab and Muslim communities became the bureau's top targets. Agents rounded up hundreds of people for questioning. They raided Muslim charities, monitored mosques for radiation and held refugees for months because of security checks.

To regain the trust of Muslim and Arab-Americans, the FBI has embarked on an aggressive national outreach program. The bureau's efforts, which include mosque visits and one-on-one meetings, have become so pervasive in certain cities that some young Muslim-Americans refer to the agency as the "Friendly Brotherhood of Islam."

Yet across the country, many participants wonder what the interactions achieve when mistrust remains the biggest obstacle. Some community activists compare the tone of the current encounters to those during the Red Scare of the 1950s, when U.S. citizens were singled out as suspected communists and expected to prove their loyalty to the United States.

"You never hear the FBI say that part of the reason there has not been another terrorist attack in this country is because radical extremists have not found a home in American mosques," said Rebecca Abou-Chedid, the director of government relations for the Arab American Institute in Washington, D.C. "It's as if they believe that we know about terrorist cells and we're not telling them."

In Detroit, the home of an estimated 200,000 Arab-Americans and immigrants, agents and activists sometimes argue for hours over terrorism-related investigations. Many Muslim leaders think the bureau has targeted the wrong people in its effort to root out extremists.

"It is very difficult," said Daniel Roberts, the special agent in charge of the FBI's Detroit field office. "To be honest, I sometimes wonder why we do this when we so often are beaten up in a verbal sense."

Agents aren't apologizing for their tactics and respond that they have a duty to pursue any possible U.S. ties to terrorists. More than 260 defendants have been convicted of terrorism-related charges in the United States and trials are pending for 150 more, according to the Justice Department's latest estimates released in June.

But agents also recognize that the alienation that Muslims and Arabs feel could undermine the bureau's hunt for domestic terrorists. If the fear subsided, more citizens might come forward with tips, agents believe, at a time when the bureau is under mounting pressure to collect better intelligence.

Muslim and Arab-American leaders said they, too, are eager to improve their relations with the FBI. If that happened, many of them said, they would urge their children to join a federal law enforcement agency that's eager to recruit them. Now, most don't.

Muslims and Arabs also hold out a small but persistent hope that if FBI agents trusted them more, other Americans would, too.

But experts said the bureau's mission is made more difficult because of outreach techniques that often differ by region.

In Richmond, Muslim leaders have met with FBI agents several times over the years. So far, federal authorities haven't pursued any terrorism investigations against local Muslims.

When they heard an agent was knocking on doors during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, though, many community leaders couldn't help but feel alarmed.

FBI officials later confirmed that the agent wasn't investigating any of the men who were visited. Instead, he was assigned to make contacts with the Muslim community as part of the FBI's local outreach.

Community leaders said they wouldn't have objected to the interviews if they'd been warned about them.

"We need to be respected as law-abiding citizens," said Malik Khan, a board member of the Islamic Center of Virginia in Richmond.

Cliff Holly, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI in Richmond, said he didn't want to have to "ask permission" from community leaders to talk to people.

"I appreciate their perspective," he said. "But when you meet with large groups, it's difficult to develop any long-term relationships."

To improve relations with local Muslims, his office paid for the agent's Arabic classes and brought in an activist to talk to other agents about Muslim culture, Holly said.

"Nobody's picking on anybody," he said. "We're just going out and saying hello to people in the community."

FBI officials in other cities, however, said they inform local Muslim leaders first, to avoid alienating the entire community.

DOJ_NMG_0097291

Michael Rolince, former head of the FBI's International Terrorism Operations Section, said the bureau remains divided over how to approach Muslims and Arabs when it's not in the context of a terrorism investigation.

Before he retired from the agency in 2005, Rolince asked FBI headquarters to fund a program that Northeastern University in Boston would host. The program required $1 million in start-up money to bring leaders, activists and agents together to talk.

But critics raised questions about some of the participating groups' alleged ties to the Muslim Brotherhood, a secretive international organization that some Arab, U.S. and Israeli officials blame for provoking violence in the Middle East. Rolince said he disagreed with the critics' assessments of the U.S.-based organizations.

"There's a right-wing contingent in town that believes we should not work with any of these groups," Rolince said.

To Rolince's dismay, FBI Director Robert Mueller decided not to authorize funding for the program, citing budget constraints.

As a result, the FBI's 56 field offices don't have a uniform way of handling outreach, Rolince said. Some FBI agents work with the groups that sparked the funding controversy. Other agents don't.

"It's not in the best interest of the community or the FBI to deal with each organization in 56 different ways," he said. "It sends a mixed message to the community and to the agents."

According to a study released earlier this year by the Vera Institute of Justice, seven out of 16 U.S. cities with significant Arab and Muslim populations didn't have active FBI outreach programs. The institute, a nonprofit organization in New York, wasn't permitted to identify the cities as part of its agreement with the FBI.

In Raleigh, N.C., for example, where about 20,000 Muslims live, Muslim leaders say the FBI doesn't meet routinely with them. Instead, agents talk to individual activists, often to press them about potential terrorist activity.

In Washington, D.C., Los Angeles, New York and Detroit, agents meet regularly with groups of Muslims and Arabs. The larger community gatherings help the leaders feel less singled out, agents said.

Joseph Persichini Jr., the assistant director in charge of the FBI's Washington, D.C., field office, compared the outreach effort to talking to Italian-Americans about organized crime in the mafia's heyday.

"How did we attack the problem? We got to know the community," he said. "Did that mean if you were Italian-American you were part of organized crime? Of course not."

But more contact isn't always better. Although the FBI met more often with community leaders than most local police departments did, Muslims and Arabs trusted them less, the Vera Institute of Justice concluded. Community leaders said local police officers were less likely than the FBI to assume they had links to terrorism.

Lacking a consistent program, FBI agents sometimes feud over what division within the bureau should take the lead in discussions, Muslim and Arab leaders say. In some cities, the FBI's counterterrorism units oversee the bureau's interaction with the community. In others, outreach officers oversee it.

"It's like dealing with Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," said Randy Hamud, a San Diego attorney who has participated in one of the outreach meetings. "It's as if we have to remind the FBI: `We're a community, we're not a cell.'"

A. Brett Hovington, the FBI's supervisory special agent in charge of the community relations unit, said the bureau has tried to change the perception that outreach and counterterrorism efforts are connected. However, he said local agents need the freedom to decide how to approach Muslims and Arabs.

"Was the message kind of blurred? I would say it probably was," Hovington said. "But I think we're becoming better at being clear about our intentions."

FBI officials said agents have become savvier about approaching Muslims and Arabs after meeting with them more often. Agents now contact leaders to clear up misunderstandings or to coordinate law-enforcement efforts. Minneapolis agents, for example, called leaders when they needed to interview members of the city's large Somali population. The witnesses were less afraid and more cooperative because they'd been reassured that the case had nothing to do with terrorism.

"I would expect there to be friction," said John Miller, the FBI assistant director who oversees the national outreach program. "I'd also expect that we'd be able to talk about it."

But Muslim and Arab leaders also differ on how they should respond to the FBI's outreach. Should they meet monthly with an agency that could turn its sights on them, their family or their friends? What should they do when an FBI agent appears at their door? Should they invite the agent in or call a lawyer?

Consensus can be difficult to reach because Muslim and Arab communities in the United States are diverse, ranging from Iraqi Christians to African-Americans to third-generation Lebanese-Americans.

Immigrants can be especially terrified of the federal agents because they recall abusive secret police practices of repressive regimes back home.

"This business of outreach is an oxymoron for many people," said Ali Galaydh, a former prime minister of Somalia and professor of public policy at the University of Minnesota. "Law enforcement wanting to reach you means they want to get you."

DOJ_NMG_0097292

Despite their misgivings about the FBI, Muslim and Arab leaders said they're more than willing to provide any information if they thought it could prevent a terrorist attack.

After London authorities in August uncovered a plot to blow up planes, Miami Muslim leaders called the FBI to ask for a briefing. Since then, agents have been assigned as contacts for imams at almost 40 mosques.

"In a way, we're in this together," said Abou-Chedid of the Arab American Institute. "We all know that if there is ever another attack, our community and the FBI will be the first to be blamed."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Eats With GIs In Hawaii, Heads Home (AP-Y)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 22, 2006

President Bush circled the globe on his Asian journey but never strayed far from the subject of Iraq. He dined with U.S. troops in Hawaii before heading home Tuesday, telling them their efforts "will determine how your children and grandchildren live."

Bush, who was due back at the White House late Tuesday night, visited Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia during an eight-day trip aimed at assuring Asia of America's commitment to the region. He even found time to meet briefly with Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow.

Still, Iraq and the war on terror kept the president's attention. In Vietnam, asked about lessons from that war, Bush answered that in Iraq, "we'll succeed unless we quit."

And he found himself in front of cameras on Tuesday at Hickam Air Force Base condemning the assassination earlier in the day of an anti-Syrian Lebanese leader.

Bush was briefed in Hawaii at the Oahu headquarters of the U.S. Pacific Command, whose territory spreads from the West Coast of the U.S. to the Indian Ocean.

Before that he ate and chatted with the troops, at an open-sided mess hall.

The president made his way through the food line, piling his plate with ham, eggs, a biscuit topped with gravy, and potatoes. He shook hands with troops in camouflage uniforms. Then, after eating, he thanked the military personnel for their service "on behalf of a grateful nation."

"You serve at a time when we witness an ideological struggle between those who love freedom and those who hate freedom," the president said. "I'm determined, like you are determined, that freedom prevails."

Though Bush was cheered by troops and others on Oahu — a contrast to the thousands of anti-war demonstrators a day before in Indonesia — his visit wasn't without incident for those around him.

Three police motorcycle officers were injured when they crashed on slick pavement while escorting his motorcade on Tuesday. Two were taken by ambulance to a local hospital, where one was described as in serious condition and another was described as stable.

Members of the White House medical team — including an ambulance — were cut loose from the motorcade to help, said Dr. Richard Tubb, Bush's doctor. Local ambulance and fire units were sent, too.

Also, acting White House Travel Office Director Gregg Pitts was beaten and robbed by at least two men while out in Honolulu Monday night. Pitts suffered head and other injuries in the attack. He was awake and alert but remained behind at a Honolulu hospital because of a possible concussion, White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Bush's Asia trip was shadowed by talk of wars past and present.

His visit to Vietnam inspired a fresh debate about whether today's increasingly difficult war in Iraq has dangerous parallels to the failed American war in Southeast Asia three decades ago. The president ended his Asian tour with the stop in Hawaii, where the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor launched the United States' entry into World War II.

The Iraq situation was complicated Monday when Iranian leaders invited the presidents of Iraq and Syria to a weekend summit in Tehran to discuss the war. The move, viewed as an attempt by Iran to counter U.S. influence in the region, was received with skepticism at the State Department in Washington.

Then, on Tuesday, came the assassination of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel, a foe of Syrian involvement in his country.

Bush denounced the killing, saying that Syria and Iran were trying to undermine the democratically elected government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

DOJ_NMG_0097293

He stopped short of specifically blaming Iran or Syria, but called for a full investigation to identify "those people and those forces" behind the assassination.

Kramer's Tirade, Adding Insult to Inaccuracy

Hey, funnyman: You nailed the wrong guy.

That's what Darryl Pitts would like to tell Michael Richards, the "Seinfeld" star who spewed racist slurs at an African American man after his stand-up gig at a Los Angeles comedy club was interrupted last Friday.

The irony of the insult, according to audience member Pitts: It wasn't the black guy who interrupted him. The black man sat next to the alleged heckler. Pitts told our colleague Darryl Fears the two were in a group of roughly 10 people who ambled into the Laugh Factory during Richards's routine. The comic ordered them to shut up, then asked, " 'What are you talking about?' "

The black guy spoke up: "My friend doesn't think you're funny." The loud-talking friend "was maybe Arab or Hispanic but not black," said Pitts, who was not part of the group. "The way it's been portrayed is that a group of black guys came to the club and were disorderly . . . and that's inaccurate, absolutely."

What followed -- as captured on video and circulated on the Internet -- was shocking. Said Pitts, who himself is black: "It was like buckshot. It hit everyone. . . . I have a difficult time accepting his apology -- 72 hours later. What did he do? Read a black history book? Why the change?"The Bushes Hit a Few Bumps in the Road

White House Staffer Robbed, Beaten In Waikiki (KITV)

KITV-TV, November 22, 2006

HONOLULU -- The acting director of the White House Travel Office was robbed and beaten in Waikiki early on Tuesday morning outside a nightclub, according to Honolulu police.

"He was knocked down, punched, kicked -- his wallet and id were stolen," Honolulu Police Department Capt. Frank Fujii said.

Pitts' passport and international phone were also taken.

Pitts left the bar alone. He walked through International Marketplace, where he was confronted by three men beaten up and robbed, according to a source familiar with the case.

His friends went looking for him and found him lying in a pool of blood.

People familiar with Waikiki said muggings happen occasionally. Police said they have no evidence of an increase in violence against tourists.

Pitts accompanied President George W. Bush on a brief visit to Hawaii. The stop came after an eight-day trip to Asia.

While Bush stayed at Hickam Air Force Base, White House staff, crew from the airplane and reporters stayed at Hilton Hawaiian Village in Waikiki.

Paramedics treated Pitts and took him to Queen's Medical Center. He did not return with the president to Washington.

Iraq's Government Hampered By Suspicions (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

BAGHDAD — When the Ministry of Municipalities and Public Works dispatched crews to the Amil neighborhood last month to repair a sewer line that had been spewing raw human waste into the street for weeks, residents were encouraged.

But instead of repairing the pipe, the workers wound up rupturing the freshwater line. They left the entire mess for someone else.

Iraqis elected their leaders in December, hoping that a government by the people would do something for the people. Eleven months later, officials acknowledge that their efforts have been mostly a failure. And, as with the busted sewer line of Amil, government involvement often creates a bigger problem than it solves.

Despite U.S. pressure for results, Iraq's elected officials have been unable to overcome their mistrust of one another and improve security or tackle the major political and economic issues — from murderous cops to the sewage woes of Amil.

Fed up with ministers he says were foisted on him by political factions, Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has promised a Cabinet reshuffle. He is scheduled to convene the body this week to address the deepening political divisions and a threatened walkout by the Sunni Arab bloc.

But his resolve may not be enough to overcome the government's inherent frailties and limitations.

Officials say Baghdad's authority has been undermined by the ubiquity of U.S. troops and by militias, neither of which answers to the government.

But above all, the sectarian balance on which the government was formed has made it impossible make big decisions or ferret out corruption or incompetence.

"If Maliki discovered that one of his ministers in one of the political parties was involved in corruption or brutality, he could not fire him, because [the minister is] backed up by another political party," said Salim Abdullah Jabouri, a spokesman for Iraq's main Sunni party, which is part of the ruling coalition. "He'll be accused of going against [the] minister's party."

The government even backtracked on its controversial decision to issue an arrest warrant for the country's leading Sunni cleric, Harith Dhari, amid threats that the Sunni coalition would pull out of the government.

Some blame U.S. policy, saying it puts too much faith on consensus and balance as a panacea for Iraq's ills.

Iraq's constitution — with its complex system of checks and balances and stripped-down executive authority — limits what any leader can do.

The government "has been created by political agreements giving every side a veto against the other side," said Abbas Bayati, a Shiite lawmaker.

At every crossroads, the government's large Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish blocs huddle noisily to come up with internal agreement before heading to the negotiating table to squabble again with the other factions. Insiders say little gets discussed in Maliki's Cabinet without the approval of each party in the three sprawling blocs.

At the ministry level, a raft of corruption cases has struck fear in the hearts of administrators, who allow money to pile up rather than become entangled in a graft case. "There is an ambience where people are afraid of making decisions," an official said.

Even when decisions are made, there is no oversight to make sure follow-up action is taken, nor any coordination among ministries.

"The government plays like a football team," said Mustafa Hiti, a Sunni lawmaker. "Even if [Oil Minister Hussein] Shahristani is good, you need another ministry of transportation, interior and housing to do their job in order for him to be effective."

U.S. efforts to get institutions up and running have been hampered by the crudest of stumbling blocks. For example, American troops recently visited a west Baghdad courthouse, where the road leading to the decrepit four-story building was flooded with sewage and the court had run out of diesel to fuel its generator.

Based on his most recent remarks, including a frustrated speech to parliament this month, Maliki appears to have recognized the problems. But many say it may be too late, that even the finest government officials can't enforce good policy with a weak government.

Month after month, Maliki has promised to disarm and disband the Shiite militias wreaking havoc on the streets. Sunnis say the government has not done enough — failing, for example, to follow up on leads from those freed after men dressed in police uniforms brazenly kidnapped dozens of people from a Ministry of Higher Education building last week.

"The government hasn't moved a finger to investigate," Jabouri said. "The government is either weak or in collusion with the kidnappers or has lost control of the militias."

Maliki's credibility had already been faltering, officials said.

"I think the government is seen as representing one part of Iraqi society," said a Western analyst in Baghdad, who spoke on condition of anonymity for security reasons.

"When the Sunnis under Saddam [Hussein] dominated Iraq, they also represented one segment of the society, but they had an overwhelming force to back that up. These guys don't. There are other forces out there."

Bush Plans To Meet With Maliki (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

President Bush plans to fly to the Middle East next week to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, as the two leaders try to overcome recent tensions and revitalize the war effort, the White House announced last night.

The surprise trip underscored the accelerating efforts by Bush and his team to come up with a fresh approach to the war after a period of spiraling violence in Iraq and voter rejection in midterm elections at home. Bush recently ordered various agencies to consolidate an ongoing Iraq policy review in the hope of reaching a new consensus.

The White House has pressed Maliki to speed transition of security responsibility to Iraqi forces, and the two leaders will review conclusions of a joint panel they appointed to find ways to do that.

"We're not looking for a big, bold announcement," national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters aboard Air Force One last night, as Bush returned from an unrelated eight-day overseas trip to Asia. "This is an opportunity for the president and Prime Minister Maliki to get together, to get a report from this commission they have adopted. This is obviously an important time for both Iraqis and Americans in developing a way ahead."

Bush will meet with Maliki in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 29-30, after he attends a previously scheduled NATO summit in Riga, Latvia. Hadley said the administration's own Iraq review would not be finished before the meeting, nor would a separate report be completed by the congressionally chartered Iraq Study Group. But the meeting will give Bush a chance to get Maliki's views, Hadley said.

Administration officials have at times expressed frustration with Maliki's government for not doing more to take over security in Iraq and rein in sectarian violence.

Bush, Al-Maliki Set To Confer In Jordan On Iraqi Security (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

ABOARD AIR FORCE ONE (AP) -- President Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki will meet next week in Jordan to discuss the security situation in Iraq.

In a joint statement, the two leaders said: "We will meet in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 29-30 to continue our consultation on building security and stability in Iraq."

Press secretary Tony Snow distributed the statement to reporters returning home with Mr. Bush yesterday from an eight-day Asia trip. Mr. Bush will fly directly to Amman from next week's NATO summit in Riga, Latvia.

"We will focus our discussions on current developments in Iraq, progress made to date in the deliberations of a high-level joint committee on transferring security responsibilities and the role of the region in supporting Iraq," the statement said. "We reiterate our commitment to building the foundations of a peaceful, democratic and secure Iraq and to strengthening the partnership between our two nations."

Mr. Bush and Mr. al-Maliki last met July 25 in Washington.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley told reporters that the idea for a meeting came up a week or more ago and that plans accelerated in the last few days.

"We're not looking for a big, bold announcement," he said.

On Monday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad asked the presidents of Iraq and Syria to attend a weekend summit in Tehran, a move seen as another effort by Iran to play a strong role in the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0097296

Asked about what role Iran and Syria should be playing, Mr. Hadley said: "We think it is important that Iraq be speaking directly to these countries and making it clear to them that they need to play a positive role in seeking security, stability and democracy in Iraq. ... We are supportive of Iraqi government officials as they deliver that message."

Bush's Best Defense May Be His Father (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

ABU DHABI, UNITED ARAB EMIRATES — Former President George H.W. Bush took on Arab critics of his son, the current President Bush, during a testy exchange Tuesday at a leadership conference in the capital of this U.S. ally.

"My son is an honest man," Bush told members of the audience, who harshly criticized the younger Bush's foreign policy.

"We do not respect your son. We do not respect what he's doing all over the world," a woman in the audience bluntly told Bush after his speech.

Bush, 82, appeared stunned as others in the audience whooped and whistled.

The oil-rich Persian Gulf used to be safe territory for the former president, who brought Arab leaders together in a coalition that drove then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's troops from Kuwait in 1991.

But gratitude for the elder Bush was overshadowed at the conference by hostility toward his son, whose invasion of Iraq and support for Israel are deeply unpopular in the region.

The hostile comments came during a question-and-answer session after Bush finished a folksy address on leadership by telling the audience how deeply hurt he feels when his presidential son is criticized.

"This son is not going to back away," Bush said, his voice quavering. "He's not going to change his view because some poll says this or some poll says that, or some heartfelt comments from the lady who feels deeply in her heart about something. You can't be president of the United States and conduct yourself if you're going to cut and run. This is going to work out in Iraq."

Bush also told the audience its derisive hoots were mild compared with the reaction he got in Germany in the 1980s after persuading that country to deploy U.S. nuclear missiles.

He told the audience he was extremely proud of his sons, the current president and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

One audience member asked the former president what advice he gives his son on Iraq. Bush said the presence of reporters prevented an answer.

"If I did what you ask me to do — tell you what advice I give my son — that would then be flashed all over the world," he said.

"If it happened to deviate one iota, one little inch, from what the president's doing or thinks he ought to be doing, it would be terrible. It'd bring great anxiety not only to him but to his supporters."

Pentagon Cites Alternative To Baker Report (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Pentagon is drafting its own new options for winning in Iraq, in part, to give President Bush counterproposals to fall back on in case the Iraq Study Group comes up with ideas he does not like, defense officials say.

Meanwhile, study group co-chairman Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana, told The Washington Times yesterday that he and co-chairman James A. Baker III, secretary of state in the first Bush administration, have nearly completed a first draft report.

Mr. Hamilton said the two men hope to complete it this weekend, give it to the eight other Iraq Study Group members in time for a meeting next week to review it. The report contains Mr. Hamilton's and Mr. Baker's assessment of the Iraq situation and recommendations to Mr. Bush.

The 10 members will then accept, reject or modify the ideas, and Mr. Hamilton cautioned that the panel has no deadline to produce a final report.

"The whole thing could be changed," Mr. Hamilton said. "We do feel like we should move ahead with due diligence."

Mr. Hamilton declined to discuss the options. Mr. Baker has said publicly he believes in talking to one's enemies, an indication that the study group will recommend opening dialogues with Syria and Iran, two U.S. adversaries that border Iraq and support the insurgents.

Mr. Hamilton said the group has heard from more than 250 people, both in and out of government.

"We are inundated with recommendations at this point," he said. "I literally can't go anywhere without people making recommendations to me. But that's good."

The Baker-Hamilton group will not be the only source of new ideas on Iraq for the president in a war that an increasing number of Americans say lacks progress. The Pentagon is also leading an extensive review.

DOJ_NMG_0097297

The defense officials said they do not want the Iraq Study Group's options to go unchallenged in case it proposes items that Mr. Bush does not like, such as a timetable for removing troops.

"I don't think anyone is comfortable with one organization coming up with a list of recommendations," said a senior Pentagon official involved in the war review, adding that the Pentagon review could produce ideas that compete with or are counter to the Iraq Study Group's.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, began leading the Pentagon's review in September. The Joint Staff, the Joint Chiefs planning arm, is studying ideas -- from adding troops to reducing them as well as making new efforts to win the support of Sunni Muslims who lead the insurgency.

A likely option will be to find ways to accelerate the deployment of Iraqi brigades, defense officials say. This is a move advocated by House Armed Services Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican. In theory, some officials see it as the only promising option for reducing the American presence in Iraq and thus reducing casualties.

An adviser to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said, "If we had a silver bullet, we would have fired it a long time ago."

Defense officials say they doubt that Gen. Pace will recommend a major increase in troops. The Army today is hard-pressed to maintain the bulk of 147,000 troops in Iraq. Stateside brigades lack basic equipment on which to train because the Army puts deployed units at the top of the priority list for weapons and other equipment.

Mr. Rumsfeld is leaving the Pentagon next month after the expected Senate confirmation of Robert M. Gates as his successor. The bulk of the review work is falling on Gen. Pace, who under law is the top military adviser to the president.

Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the region, has made a passionate case for keeping American troop levels where they are now, thus requiring Gen. Pace to overrule a combatant commander if he wants a troop increase.

"Our troops' posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Gen. Abizaid, who heads U.S. Central Command, last week told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "and then we need to assess whether or not we can bring major combat units out of there."

Interventionism's Realistic Future (WP)

By Robert D. Kaplan

Hard-core foreign policy realists (the kind who say this country should rarely intervene again, anywhere) are hoping that in the wake of our comeuppance in Iraq things will be going their way. That is to say, U.S. foreign policy will be defined by an obdurate caution, coupled with a ruthless, almost mathematical application of balance-of-power principles. You'd think -- to hear some of them talk -- that we're about to emulate China, which seeks only energy sources and advantageous trade agreements and cares nothing at all for the moral improvement of regimes in such places as Zimbabwe, Burma and Uzbekistan.

This is nonsense. Our foreign policy is about to experience an adjustment, not a flip-flop. Neither political party will support anything else if it really wants to elect a president in 2008. Just look at the dismay in this country over our failure to intervene in Darfur, even given the burden we already carry in Iraq. To be sure, the recent evidence that our democratic system cannot be violently exported will temper our Wilsonian principles, but it will not bury them. Pure realism -- without a hint of optimism or idealism -- would immobilize our mass immigrant democracy, which has always seen itself as an agent of change.

Iraq will merely close a post-Cold War chapter in American foreign policy, one that began with the Persian Gulf War -- and with Bosnia. After the collapse of communism in 1989, idealism, the export of democracy and humanitarian interventionism were all the rage among journalists and intellectuals -- much as realism, restraint and benign dictatorship are now. Ten years ago Liberia, Sierra Leone and other countries less institutionally developed than Iraq were considered prime candidates for liberal change. Back then, people such as Brent Scowcroft and James Baker were attacked not just by neoconservatives but by liberal internationalists, too. In those first, heady post-Cold War years, to be called a "realist" was practically an insult.

The Balkan interventions, because they paid strategic dividends, appeared to justify the idealistic missionary approach to foreign policy. The 1995 intervention in Bosnia changed the debate from "Should NATO Exist?" to "Should NATO Expand?" Our 1999 war in Kosovo, as much as the events of Sept. 11, 2001, allowed for the eventual expansion of NATO to the Black Sea. It also led to the toppling of Yugoslav strongman Slobodan Milosevic, without chaos ensuing. Neoconservatives and others who had supported our actions in Bosnia and Kosovo then carried the spirit of this policy to its limits in Iraq.

And so what began in 1995 with a limited air and land campaign in the western, most-developed part of the former Ottoman Empire ended with a mass infantry invasion eight years later in its eastern, least-developed part. Not only was this last intervention far more ambitious than the first, it was also far less competently executed in its occupation phase. Thus it failed.

The lesson is not that we won't intervene again. We will, and often. But we will do so with the caution and hesitation shown in the 1990s and only as part of an authentic coalition. To wit, just as NATO's war in Kosovo had a British face and voice -- that of its spokesman, Jamie Shea -- any intervention in North Korea (should it ever come to that) will put the South Korean military front and center and will have the implicit cooperation of the Chinese army. Otherwise, we won't do it.

The expansion of our military deployments in Africa, as well as the emergence of NATO as a global constabulary force, points to an activist military presence overseas. From Senegal on the Atlantic to Djibouti on the Gulf of Aden -- across the entire Sahara -- Marines and Army Special Forces have been conducting training missions -- not only to field indigenous forces in the hunt for Islamic terrorists but also to professionalize the militaries of fledgling democracies and develop the backbone of an American-advised, pan-African intervention force to handle future Darfurs. The drawdown of our forces in Iraq, no matter how humiliating the circumstances, will eventually free up equipment and manpower for such smaller and less controversial deployments, which will always have a civil affairs element.

NATO is moving on a parallel track. What started after 1989 with train-and-equip missions to reform former Warsaw Pact military forces in Eastern Europe has expanded to the Caucasus and Central Asia under the Partnership for Peace program. NATO's current mission in Afghanistan and its restructuring under Marine Gen. James Jones to a more sea-based, expeditionary force signifies how it will be able to deploy faster and more often to deal with out-of-area emergencies.

Our military and civilian agencies will be expected to deal with many emergencies as we enter an era when more people than ever before will be killed or made homeless by natural disasters as populations rise in environmentally fragile zones. The tsunami rescue effort of 2004-05, led by U.S. Pacific Command, was a curtain raiser for deployments to come.

The debacle in Iraq has reinforced the realist dictum, disparaged by idealists in the 1990s, that the legacies of geography, history and culture really do set limits on what can be accomplished in any given place. But the experience in the Balkans reinforced an idealist dictum that is equally true: One should always work near the limits of what is possible rather than cynically give up on any place. In this decade idealists went too far; in the previous one, it was realists who did not go far enough.

Iraq has relegitimized realism, which is a good thing. But without an idealistic component to our foreign policy, there would be nothing to distinguish us from our competitors. And that, in and of itself, would lead to the decline of American power.

Lessons From The Saudis (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

While the nation debates what to do about the disaster in Iraq, I have been pondering a disaster that hasn't happened -- in Saudi Arabia. There are some lessons in the Saudi story that may help clarify the Bush administration's choices as it nears crunch time in the region.

First, some background: Ten years ago Osama bin Laden declared war on the United States to "expel the infidels from the Arab peninsula." One theme of his Aug. 23, 1996, fatwa was that for all its military power, America was weak. It had fled from terrorist attacks in Beirut and Somalia, and it would flee Saudi Arabia as well. Bin Laden said of his terrorist cadres: "These youths love death even as you love life."

The truth of those words became clear on Sept. 11, 2001, when 15 Saudi-born terrorists led a suicide attack on the symbols of American power. And in some ways, al-Qaeda's game plan has worked: America's botched occupation of Iraq triggered a ferocious reaction there, and now the American public is losing patience with the war, just as bin Laden would have predicted.

Given these setbacks for America, it's easy to forget that bin Laden has failed utterly in his strategic goal in the Sept. 11 attacks, which was to topple the ruling monarchy in his home country of Saudi Arabia. The oil kingdom, the real prize in the region, is stronger and more secure than it was five years ago.

Saudi Arabia is, to be sure, not exactly a rock of stability, but its gains are highlighted in a recent study by Nawaf Obaid, a clear-headed Saudi analyst who advises his government. He noted that since May 2003, Saudi security forces have foiled more than 25 major terrorist attacks; they have captured or killed 264 al-Qaeda operatives and arrested 845 other people with links to al-Qaeda. Of the 26 terrorists on the Saudi most-wanted list, all but one have been captured or killed.

Perhaps more important, the Saudis have begun to crack the network of religious extremists that gave al-Qaeda a platform. The Saudi Interior Ministry, once a hidden source of support for the jihadists, now oversees what Obaid calls an "ideological reeducation program" supervised by religious scholars and university professors. More than 400 people have been released from this program, Obaid says.

The House of Saud, the mysterious clan that rules the oil kingdom, is also steering a steadier course under King Abdullah. Almost unnoticed last month, the Saudis announced a new council to oversee the transition to the next generation of leadership. As with many aspects of Saudi governance, the details are murky, but the plan appears to provide a stable legal framework for selecting a successor to the king and crown prince -- easing the danger of a future political crisis.

What are the lessons in Saudi Arabia's move back from the brink of potential disaster? The most important is that the Saudis decided to take charge of their own security rather than relying on an America that many in the kingdom resented. After 2003 the Saudis realized that they faced a deadly terrorist threat and began to fight it aggressively: They focused on national solutions; they reduced the visible, humiliating presence of American troops; they pursued political reforms; they increased oil production.

How does this apply to Iraq? Like the Saudis, the Iraqis will have to save themselves, working within the authentic political framework of their culture, religion and region. The more we try to substitute our will for theirs, with more American troops or exhortation, the more we enfeeble them. As in Saudi Arabia, we must move slowly but deliberately out of the spotlight and into the shadows, with a sustainable mission of training and advising Iraqi troops.

What will contain the Iraqi civil war, in the end, is that none of the regional powers can tolerate a shattered Iraq -- not Iran, not Syria, not Saudi Arabia, not Jordan, not Turkey. Nor do most Iraqis want a dissolution of their unitary state. The Iraqis will restabilize their nation when the "nationalist forces" -- including ones we don't like, such as Moqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Sunni insurgency -- make common cause under a regional mandate.

Only the United States can broker the regional conference that will allow a political transition in Iraq. That's our leverage now -- diplomatic clout, more than military power. If the neighboring powers can help apply a tourniquet to stop the bleeding in Iraq, America can begin to step away.

Lost In The Desert (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON

Iraq now evokes that old Jimmy Durante song that goes, “Did you ever have the feeling that you wanted to go and still have the feeling that you wanted to stay?”

It’s hard to remember when America has been so stuck. We can’t win and we can’t leave.

The good news is that the election finished what Katrina started. It dismantled the president’s fake reality about Iraq, causing opinions to come gushing forth from all quarters about where to go from here.

The bad news is that no one, and I mean no one, really knows where to go from here. The White House and the Pentagon are ready to shift to Plan B. But Plan B is their empty term for miraculous salvation.

Even Henry Kissinger has defected from the Plan A gang. Once he thought the war could work, but now he thinks military victory is out of the question. When he turns against a war, you know the war’s in trouble. He also believes leaving quickly would risk a civil war so big it could destabilize the Middle East.

Kofi Annan, who thought the war was crazy, now says that the United States is “trapped in Iraq” and can’t leave until the Iraqis can create a “secure environment” — even though the Iraqis evince not the slightest interest in a secure environment. (The death squads even assassinated a popular comedian this week.)

The retired Gen. Anthony Zinni, who thought Mr. Bush’s crusade to depose Saddam was foolish and did not want to send in any troops, now thinks we may have to send in more troops so we can eventually get out.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, whose soldiers pulled Saddam out of his spider hole and who is returning to Iraq to take charge of the day-to-day fight, has given up talking about a Jeffersonian democracy and now wishes only for a government in Iraq that’s viewed as legitimate. He has gone from “can do” to “don’t know.” He talked to The Times’s Thom Shanker about his curtailed goals of reducing sectarian violence and restoring civil authority, acknowledging: “Will we attain those? I don’t know.”

At a Senate hearing last week, Gen. John Abizaid sounded like Goldilocks meets Guernica, asserting two propositions about the war that are logically at war with each other. He said we can’t have fewer troops because the Iraqis need us, but we can’t have more because we don’t want the Iraqis to become dependent on us.

He contended that increasing the number of our troops would make the Iraqi government mad, but also asserted that decreasing the number would intensify sectarian violence.

This a poor menu of options.

As Peter Beinart wrote in The New Republic this week, “In a particularly cruel twist, the events of recent months have demolished the best arguments both for staying and for leaving.” Noting in the same magazine that “we are approaching a Saddam-like magnitude for the murder of innocents,” Leon Wieseltier worried that the problem may be deeper than the number of our troops; it may be Iraq itself. "After we invaded Iraq, Iraq invaded itself. ... We are at the mercy of Iraq, where there is no mercy."

Kirk Semple, The Times's Baghdad correspondent, wrote about Capt. Stephanie Bagley, the daughter and granddaughter of military policemen who was enthusiastic a year ago about her job of building a new Iraqi police force. But that was before the militia so inexorably began to infiltrate the police, presumably with the support of some leaders in Iraq's dysfunctional government. Now, with the police begging the Americans not to make them patrol Baghdad's mean streets and showing her their shrapnel wounds, she just wants to get her unit home safely, without losing another soldier. She said her orders were to train a local force to deal with crimes like theft and murder, not to teach them how to fight a counterinsurgency.

Aside from telling Israel to be nicer to the Palestinians, as if there lies Iraq salvation, James Baker will mostly try to suggest that the U.S. talk to Iran and Syria. Yesterday, after the Lebanese Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel, an opponent of Syria, was assassinated in Beirut, President Bush said he suspected that Iran and Syria were behind the murder.

Maybe Mr. Baker had better find Plan C.

The Pentagon is trying to decide whether we should Go Big, Go Long or Go Home.

Go figure.

An Ideologue For Hire Gets New Alliance (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — Senator Joseph I. Lieberman announced Tuesday that he had hired a new spokesman, which is not in itself that noteworthy, except that the said spokesman, Marshall Wittmann, is one of the great career vagabonds, ideological contortionists and political pontificators ever to inflict himself on a city full of them.

To say that Mr. Wittmann defies classification is like saying Paris Hilton defies modesty. But in his peripatetic soul, he is a Washington Original, a man without a political country going to work for a senator without a political party.

Mr. Lieberman, a longtime Democrat of Connecticut who was re-elected as an independent and calls himself an "Independent Democrat," has not ruled out becoming a Republican.

Mr. Wittmann, meanwhile, is a Trotskyite turned Zionist turned Reaganite turned bipartisan irritant turned pretty much everything in between — including chief lobbyist for the Christian Coalition, the only Jew who has ever held that position.

"Jewish mothers do not raise their Jewish sons to work for the Christian Coalition," said Mr. Wittmann, offering one of many explanations for why that job was not an ideal fit.

"I think I'm the only person who has worked for both Cesar Chavez and Linda Chavez," Mr. Wittmann said of the union pioneer who inspired him in the 1970s and the conservative Republican whose Senate campaign in Maryland he joined in the 1980s.

"I think I'm the only person who's worked for both Ralph Reed and Bruce Reed," Mr. Wittmann added, referring to the former executive director of the Christian Coalition and the top lieutenant to former President Bill Clinton.

There are of course plenty of political people who have undergone philosophical evolutions over the years. But Mr. Wittmann, 53, has zigzagged in the extreme, from stints in left-leaning unions to right-wing policy shops. He describes his career as "eclectic," saying he has always been drawn to independent thinkers. "The good lord has made me a contrarian," Mr. Wittmann said.

The good lord has also blessed him with the gift of speaking in punchy and irresistible sound bites.

He has been quoted thousands of times in newspapers, magazines, newsletters and journals, according to Lexis-Nexis. And this does not count the at least 939 times his name has appeared misspelled as "Marshall Wittman."

He suffered through a two-year dry patch from 2002 to 2004 when he was a spokesman for Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican, a job that largely required him to suppress his inner quotemeister for his boss's even-more-impressive knack for drawing attention.

When that became unbearable, Mr. Wittmann returned to his roots as a Democrat in Waco, Tex., where he had volunteered at age 15 for the antiwar presidential campaign of Eugene McCarthy.

After leaving Mr. McCain's office, he joined the moderate Democratic Leadership Council as a senior fellow, a position whose mandate was not exactly clear but allowed him to once again be quoted. (Think Michael Jordan returning to the basketball court after his fish-out-of-water career as a baseball player.)

Liberated from the on-message shackles of a Senate office, Mr. Wittmann soared into the blogosphere. He immersed himself in his popular online diary, Bull Moose, named for the party of his political hero, Teddy Roosevelt. It became a virtual megaphone through which Mr. Wittmann could ridicule both the Bush administration and the liberal bloggers, or "netroots" (or, in Mr. Wittmann's words, the "nutroots") that attacked Mr. Lieberman relentlessly during his re-election campaign.

Now Mr. Wittmann will once again have to stifle his pundit proclivities to the greater good of Mr. Lieberman. “I’ve gone through this before,” he said of withdrawal from talking freely to the press. “Luckily my wife is a psychologist,” he said of his spouse of 29 years, Karen, one of the few enduring allegiances he has held faithfully.

He will also be forced to suspend the Bull Moose. “The Moose is now in hibernation,” Mr. Wittmann said, adding that he is not certain if moose in fact hibernate. (They do not.)

In announcing Mr. Wittmann’s appointment, Mr. Lieberman hailed his “independent and diverse background” in a statement (or understatement).

Even though he has a new boss, Mr. Wittmann still swears deep and abiding affection for Mr. McCain. And the feeling is apparently mutual: Mr. McCain said through an aide that Mr. Wittmann was “a dear friend.”

All of which raises the question of what happens if Mr. McCain runs for president and invites Mr. Wittmann to join his campaign.

Would he abandon Mr. Lieberman?

Mr. Wittmann invokes one of the first rules of flackdom and a glimpse of the drudgery to come. “One thing I’ve learned in the press world,” he said, “is that I don’t answer hypothetical questions.”

Al Qaeda Welcomes Democratic Victory (WT)

By Walid Phares

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The latest audio by al Qaeda's Iraq commander -- posted 48 hours after the midterm elections -- sends a clear signal to the readers of the jihadi strategic mind: Al Qaeda and its advisers around the world want to provoke an "American Madrid." Portraying the United States as a bleeding bull in disarray, the war room projects its wish to see America's will crippled. The video attempts to do the following:

1. Convince the jihadists that the United States is now defeated in Iraq and beyond. While no reversal of the balance of power has taken place on the ground, the jihadi propaganda machine is linking the shift in domestic politics to a withdrawal from Iraq. It projects the change in Washington as a crumbling of the political process in Baghdad and America's foreign policy. Interestingly, others in the region are also "announcing" the upcoming defeat of America in the war on terror. Hezbollah's Hassan Nasrallah declared: "The Americans are leaving, and their allies will pay the price."

2. Spread political chaos at home. Jihadists portray the Democratic takeover of Congress and the resignation of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld (and maybe others) as signs of American weakening in the resolve to fight jihadism. The video had a potential to frustrate U.S. citizens if it is not accurately interpreted by experts. Americans may end up believing that the message reflects the situation in the Middle East and that it is a logical outcome of a faulty U.S. policy. If the Bush administration and the new congressional leaders do not respond adequately to the video, some "chaos" of this sort may ensue.

3. The terminology used in the videotape is a powerful indicator that al Qaeda's political network relies on Western-educated minds, familiar with political processes in the United States and serving as advisers to the jihadists. A regular al Qaeda emir does not use the term "lame duck." It is more likely that a U.S.-based cadre, who understands the impact of political jargon on domestic audiences, had suggested the use of this word. Abu Hamza al Muhajir's use of the term batta arjaaa (lame duck) is striking to any native speaker of Arabic. This term does not exist in Arab culture, let alone in jihadi rhetoric. Its use is yet another proof of the Americanization jihad has undergone. Thus, Iraq's al Qaeda is using the term as a weapon -- something most likely requested by the jihadi brains operating on the other side of the Atlantic.

So what do the speechwriters want to achieve with these kinds of tapes? They aim at sapping American public morale during a time when reorganization is taking place in the U.S. government. Reading from the jihadi wishful thinking, the audiotape of al Muhajir and the statements made by other radical Islamists send the following message: Americans are being thanked for removing Mr. Bush's party from the leadership of Congress, which the jihadists attribute to the war on terror rather than U.S. domestic problems. Al Qaeda's audio tells citizens in the United States that they were wise for having responded positively to the previous messages by Osama bin Laden. Al Masri's words aim at convincing the American public to pressure their newly elected legislators to pull U.S. forces hastily from Iraq.

In short, al Qaeda wants an American Madrid: it wishes that a change of power in January would be accompanied by a change of national determination, not just a change of course within Iraq.

In the Salafis chat rooms, the commissaries explained to their audiences, that the Democratic Party victory in Congress means that America is now divided and al Qaeda can push to create more cracks in the system -- as it has successfully done in Spain. The masters of the forum, emulating al Masri's audiotape, said not only that "we got their soldiers on the run in Iraq," but "we got their citizens on the run on their own soil" referring to the November electoral outcome. They promised that with more killings in Iraq, they will break the will of Americans at home; and that the new Congress, seeking to fulfill one of its electoral promises will force the Bush administration to pack up and leave the Middle East.

In Washington, both the administration and the new congressional leaders failed to seriously respond to the al Qaeda message. Grave mistake; for ignoring the speech would help convincing the jihadists that America is divided and crumbling and would embolden them to strike further, not only in Iraq but also inside the United States. The silent treatment works in favor of the Salafi combatants: It only leads them to believe that they are right and that their strategy is working; just as Allah had crushed the Soviets in Afghanistan, he has divided the Americans. It is, therefore, imperative that Washington strikes back in a unified manner at every opportunity that arises. It must tell the dreamers of a terror caliphate that American democracy will not serve as a weapon to defeat freedom worldwide.

Elected As A War Critic, He Was Part Of Prewar Errors (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Of all the Democrats who rode a wave of public anger over Iraq to election victories this month, Chris Carney had the most unlikely credentials as a war critic.

Before winning the race for Pennsylvania's 10th Congressional District, Carney was part of a controversial intelligence unit at the Pentagon that was responsible for some of the most alarming — and, it turned out, unfounded — prewar claims about Iraq.

Assigned to search for links between Iraq and Al Qaeda, the unit reached a series of conclusions, including that a Sept. 11 hijacker had met with an Iraqi agent in Prague, Czech Republic, that have since been widely discredited. The Pentagon unit was created and run by one of the Iraq war's principal architects, then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith.

Carney took part in briefings at the White House and the Pentagon that disparaged the CIA for underestimating the relationship between Baghdad and the terrorist network. Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials frequently touted the findings to bolster the case for war.

Despite his background, Carney campaigned as an antiwar Democrat and said he got a "very warm reception" when he arrived at Capitol Hill this week to take part in orientation activities for incoming members. Carney is a lifelong Democrat, according to his press secretary.

"They are intrigued," Carney said of his fellow freshmen. "But I'm not sure all of them know about this."

Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Atherton) said she was disturbed by the work that came out of Feith's office, but doubted that members would hold that against Carney.

"I think that in retrospect that what happened there is deeply troubling and we're paying a price for it," Eshoo said. "But I don't want to cast judgment on him."

Carney, 47, is not apologetic about his work at the Pentagon.

"I certainly stand by the fact that I believe there was some sort of relationship," he said in an interview. "On a scale from zero to 10, with zero being no relationship and 10 perfect operational coordination," Carney said, the Iraq-Al Qaeda link was "somewhere in the 2.5 range."

That appears to be a more qualified assessment than the so-called Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group presented to policymakers during a series of briefings in 2002. In one briefing slide, the group asserted that there were "more than a decade of numerous contacts" between Iraq and Al Qaeda and that there were "multiple areas of cooperation," possibly including the Sept. 11 attacks.

Carney, a reserve officer in the Navy and political science professor at Penn State University, wasn't expected to win his conservative-leaning district in eastern Pennsylvania. But his chances improved when the Republican incumbent, Don Sherwood, admitted he'd had a five-year extramarital affair and was forced to deny accusations that he had choked his mistress.

Carney said he initially was a supporter of the invasion of Iraq but has been dismayed by the handling of the postwar insurgency. His stance hardened, he said, when one of his college students returned from Iraq and complained of how ill-equipped U.S. fighting units were.

"They had to scrounge Iraqi scrap yards for junk metal to weld onto their trucks," Carney said.

Carney ended up working for Feith after being called up for duty as an analyst at the Defense Intelligence Agency in the aftermath of Sept. 11. Carney was detailed to Feith's office in 2002 after the noted neoconservative asked the DIA to provide two analysts for a special project.

DOJ_NMG_0097303

Carney and another DIA analyst, Christina Shelton, spent months poring over thousands of raw intelligence reports. They quickly concluded that the CIA, which had been skeptical of any serious relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda, was getting it wrong.

"I found it kind of curious the way they were so equivocal in the analysis," Carney said of the CIA reports. "It was frustrating to me and others with all the caveating that was going on."

So the Feith team assembled a competing report called "Assessing the Relationship Between Iraq and Al Qaeda." The document cited "fundamental problems" with the CIA's analysis and offered conclusions without caveats. It said Baghdad was providing training to "non-Iraqi terrorists" and had "provided safe haven" for terrorist leader Abu Musab Zarqawi. Under the heading "Known Iraq-Al Qaeda Contacts," the document listed the alleged 2001 meeting of Sept. 11 hijacker Mohammed Atta with an Iraqi agent in Prague as if there were no doubt the meeting had occurred.

When the group's findings were leaked to a conservative publication, Cheney described the report as the "best source" for understanding ties between Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden.

Like much of the prewar intelligence on Iraq, the allegations of ties between Baghdad and Al Qaeda have crumbled under postwar scrutiny. A recent investigation by the Senate Intelligence Committee concluded that Atta never met with an Iraqi agent in Prague, that Baghdad did not give safe haven to Zarqawi, and that Hussein was so wary of Al Qaeda he had issued an edict barring anyone in his government from having any dealings with the terrorist network.

Carney defends his work by saying that many of the postwar conclusions are based on information that wasn't available to analysts in 2002.

Polls show a significant minority of Americans still believe Iraq was somehow involved in the Sept. 11 attacks, but Carney disputes that his work contributed to that misperception or pushed the U.S. into war.

"I was one voice among hundreds talking about this," Carney said. "Ultimately, the decision to go to war rests with the president, and I am certain that the president had lots of information other than what I had."

Carney said that much of his focus in Congress would be on domestic issues, including healthcare and job security. Still, he said that he believed U.S. intelligence agencies suffered from a lack of creative thinking, and that he had ideas about how to fix some of the community's problems.

"There are a number of things I'm looking at as committee assignments, and the intelligence committee is certainly one of them," he said. If selected, he added, "I think I would apply the same kind of rigor to those issues that we did in the Pentagon."

Iraq And Syria Agree To Restore Relations (FT)

By Ferry Biedermann

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Syria and Iraq on Tuesday announced the formal restoration of diplomatic ties, nearly a quarter of a century after they were suspended.

The move comes as the US and other western powers are exploring the option of enlisting Syrian and Iranian help in stabilising Iraq.

But there are no signs yet that Damascus is preparing to change its policies on the ground in Iraq, where it has been accused of supporting the insurgency.

Walid Moalem, Syria's foreign minister, at a press conference in Baghdad with his Iraqi colleague, Hoshair Zebari, said that Syria now hoped to turn a new page in its relations with the US.

"I do not want to go back to the former accusations. We seek future co-operation in all fields," he said.

Syria has invited Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, to Damascus.

The restoration of ties was welcomed by Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary-general, as well as by the Arab League. The US administration also expressed cautious approval.

"We've always encouraged Iraq's neighbours to take a role in supporting and assisting the unity government in Iraq," said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the White House's national security council.

But he added that "one of the first steps Syria could take was to strengthen its border with Iraq and stop the flow of foreign fighters into that country."

In Damascus, some officials said that this was unlikely to be the case, at least for now.

"Syria is waiting for an incentive," said Samer Ladkani, of the Al-Sharq think-tank which has close ties to the government. He cautioned that "there may be just diplomatic ties without any results on the ground."

News of the restoration of ties with Iraq was greeted with indifference by many Syrians. They did not expect a change in Iraq as long as US troops remained.

DOJ_NMG_0097304

Syria is seeking a “package deal” with the US that would see its demands in the region met, said analysts and diplomats in Damascus. These are said to include a US withdrawal from Iraq; a restoration of Syrian influence in Lebanon and a halt to the UN investigation into the murder of Rafiq Hariri; the complete return of the Israeli-occupied Golan Heights; the establishment of a Palestinian state; and a general recognition of Syria’s status as a regional power.

The Syrian government considers itself to be in a position of strength after Hizbollah’s “victory” against Israel in Lebanon in the summer. Some in the leadership are said to credit Syrian support for the insurgency in Iraq with what they see as the defeat of President George W. Bush in the recent mid-term elections in the US, when the Democrats wrested control of Congress from the the Republican party.

American Foes Step Into The Iraq Fray (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, November 22, 2006

CAIRO

This week, Iraq has drawn decisively closer to the two countries the US alleges are the greatest threats to peace and stability in the Middle East.

Tuesday, Syria restored diplomatic ties with Iraq that were broken by Saddam Hussein in 1980 back when Iraq was fighting Iran. Also Tuesday, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani's office said he would travel to Tehran this weekend to meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to talk about restoring order to Iraq.

The US has repeatedly accused Iran and Syria of stirring up violence inside Iraq, but recently the notion of isolating them as punishment has lost favor in Washington. A growing number President Bush's advisers are urging direct dialogue with both nations. They argue that engagement could convince Syria to do more to prevent foreign fighters from entering Iraq; Iran could exert more influence on Iraq's dominant Shiite political parties (and their militias) to compromise more.

"It could make a difference, but not a critical difference," says Anthony Cordesman, former director of intelligence assessment to the US Secretary of Defense and now a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS) in Washington.

Iran has been accused of being deeply involved in training, funding, and arming the two major Shiite militias in Iraq, where Tehran has historic ties to the current Shiite political leadership. Many Iraqi Shiites spent years in Iranian exile during Mr. Hussein's decades in power in Baghdad. One militia, the Badr Brigade, was trained in Iran by the Revolutionary Guard.

"While of course it's worth talking to them, even if they complied with all our wishes, what they could do probably would not be decisive," says Wayne White, former head of the Middle East desk at the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research.

"The situation is so bad now in Iraq," he says, "you can't expect any magic over there. And even if you could get the Iranians and Syrians to accomplish things you wanted, what would you have to cough up in return?"

Former US Secretary of State James Baker, who served under President Bush's father and is now the leader of the Iraq Study Group (ISG) advising the president on new directions for his Iraq policy, has been quietly meeting with Syrian officials in the US, according to an interview with the Syrian ambassador to the US reported by The New York Times. He also met with Iran's ambassador to the United Nations.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair has publicly called for more direct engagement, and members of the ISG have been quietly urging more direct ties with Iran, as well.

Outgoing US Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, a hard-liner on Syria and Iran, was ousted this month in favor of former CIA chief Robert Gates, who as a member of the ISG had also been urging direct engagement with Iran over the problems in Iraq.

Though Mr. Blair praised the Syrian visit to Iraq, saying it may see that "Syria becomes of help to Iraq in its process of progress ... rather than a hindrance," the closer ties between Iraq and Syria could quickly become a strain on the US and Iraqi relationship.

Meanwhile, Iran's meeting with the Iraqi president this weekend is seen by some analysts as evidence of its increasingly muscular role in the Middle East, where it already has established deep influence in Syria and Lebanon.

Lebanon is yet another nation where various internal and external political forces are vying for power. On Tuesday, a leading anti-Syrian Lebanese politician, Pierre Gemayel, was assassinated in Beirut. An ally of his, parliament leader Saad Hariri, immediately claimed that Syria was behind the murder.

Mr. Hariri's father, Rafik, a former prime minister, was assassinated last February, and the US and anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians have blamed Syria for that murder as well, which they allege was designed to bolster the pro-Syrian, Iran-backed Hizbullah inside the country.

Mr. Cordesman says events like the Gemayel assassination in Lebanon underscore the likelihood that neither Iran nor Syria will become very cooperative on issues that the US cares about - withdrawing support from Hizbullah in Syria's case, or abandoning its nuclear program in Iran's case - any time soon.

"What everyone needs to understand is that cooperation from Syria and Iran is likely to be very limited, particularly in the short-term," he says.

"Syria is certainly backing the Hizbullah in its efforts to achieve a new level of political influence in Lebanon and it has the feeling that it's less vulnerable to any kind of US action now, ... and when Iran goes out and carries out the most provocative military exercise in recent history, this may not be a symbol of compromise." He was referring to recent Iranian military exercises in the Gulf.

The State Department reacted with skepticism about Iran's intentions in Iraq, but said it was up to Iraq to decide whether to attend. "It's their call; it's their decision," deputy spokesman Tom Casey said in Washington.

Bomb Blasts Speaker's Car In Green Zone (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 21 — A bomb exploded in an armored car belonging to the speaker of Parliament, wounding the American security guard who was driving it out of a parking area in the government Green Zone and disrupting a meeting of lawmakers nearby, a parliamentary aide said.

Though the speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, was not in the vehicle and was unscathed, the assassination attempt was one of the most serious breaches of security yet within the Green Zone, the heavily fortified government district on the west bank of the Tigris River.

The bomb, which exploded in midafternoon, was planted inside a decoy armored car that was part of the speaker's regular convoy and resembled the one he usually used, said the parliamentary aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk publicly about the attack.

Only part of the bomb exploded, the aide said. A police official said investigators believe that the bomb was planted inside the Green Zone and detonated by cellphone.

Mr. Mashhadani, a hard-line Sunni Arab nationalist reviled by many Shiites, was attending a Parliament meeting inside the Green Zone convention center at the time of the explosion. He and other legislators were forced to stay inside for hours afterward while the American military secured the area.

In the summer, senior Shiite and Kurdish leaders, backed by some American officials, called for his ouster because of inflammatory comments he had made about various groups in Iraq and about the American presence.

The most serious breach of security inside the Green Zone occurred in October 2004, when insurgents set off two bombs in crowded areas that killed at least five people, including three Americans. Individuals have also been attacked there: at least one foreign jogger was reportedly stabbed, and another intentionally hit by a vehicle.

While Parliament members stewed inside the convention center, a senior Kurdish legislator said in a telephone interview that the president, Jalal Talabani, had accepted an invitation from the president of Syria, Bashar al-Assad, to meet in Damascus. Such a meeting would be the highest-level diplomatic discussion between the two countries in decades, and would seal a reconciliation that took place this week with the visit of the Syrian foreign minister here.

No date has been set for Mr. Talabani's visit, said the legislator, Mahmoud Othman, a member of the Kurdistan Alliance. The invitation was delivered to Mr. Talabani by the Syrian foreign minister, Walid al-Moallem, who came to Iraq to re-establish diplomatic ties that were severed in 1982, after Syria sided with Iran in the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Talabani is scheduled to visit Iran this weekend, months after Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki made his first trip there. Mr. Othman said there were rumors that the Iranian government had also invited Mr. Assad to the meeting, but there was no definite sign that any senior Syrian officials would attend.

Meanwhile, the White House announced that President Bush would meet with Mr. Maliki in Jordan next week to discuss the security situation in Iraq.

Early Tuesday, American and Iraqi forces raided the Shiite district of Sadr City in eastern Baghdad and detained a man the American military identified as the leader of a kidnapping ring in connection with the abduction last month of an American soldier, Specialist Ahmed al-Taie. Soldiers detained six other Iraqis.

The raid sparked a battle that involved fire from American aircraft. A Shiite official in the district, Sheik Abdul Zahra al-Suaidi, said in a telephone interview that five civilians had been killed in the fighting, including a woman and a child, and 15 others were wounded.

A spokeswoman for the American military, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, said in an e-mail message that “there may have been civilian casualties.”

Across Baghdad, at least 29 bodies were discovered Tuesday, an Interior Ministry official said. In Diyala Province, at least 13 people were killed in scattered violence.

Iraqi Parliament Speaker Escapes Car Bombing (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 21 -- A car bomb exploded inside the heavily protected Green Zone on Tuesday in an apparent attempt to kill Iraq's controversial speaker of parliament.

About 2 p.m., a small bomb exploded in one of the armored cars in Mahmoud al-Mashhadani's motorcade as it approached the convention center where parliament meets, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq. Mashhadani was not in the car, and the driver survived, Garver said.

Bomb-sniffing dogs then detected explosives in another vehicle, Garver said. Bomb specialists detonated that car, which set off a series of blasts that caused a fire but injured no one and caused no major damage to nearby structures.

Members of parliament were forced to stay inside the convention center for about four hours until the fire was extinguished and the area deemed safe, Garver said. "They were told to remain inside for their safety," he said.

Garver said he was not sure how the explosives made it so far into the Green Zone, which houses the Iraqi government, the U.S. and British embassies and thousands of foreign troops and private contractors. Anyone trying to enter the zone must pass through several checkpoints -- first to get into the complex, then to enter individual buildings.

The Green Zone has been a frequent target of mortar and rocket attacks, but although bombs have exploded at checkpoints at entrances to the zone, they rarely infiltrate the fortresslike compound. "Obviously, there is an investigation going on," Garver said.

Mashhadani is the fifth high-ranking Iraqi government official to be targeted in recent days. An outspoken Sunni Arab, Mashhadani last summer called the U.S. occupation "the work of butchers." Shiite and Kurdish groups called for his ouster after that and other provocative comments.

On Tuesday, his supporters reacted angrily to news that he had been targeted for assassination.

"We condemn and denounce this act, and we consider this as a criminal act, for Dr. Mashhadani is valuable to us," said Ammar Wajih, director of the media office at the Iraqi Islamic Party, a leading Sunni Arab group.

As Tuesday's assassination attempt and infiltration of the Green Zone highlighted Iraq's deteriorating security situation, the government moved to stabilize relations with a long-hostile neighbor. By signing an accord to restore diplomatic ties with Syria, ending a quarter-century of enmity, Iraqi leaders said they hoped to stem the flow of foreign insurgents across their common border.

"The flag of Iraq will be raised in the sky of Damascus and the flag of Syria will be raised in the sky of Baghdad, and ambassadors will be named," Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari said at a news conference in Baghdad with his Syrian counterpart, Walid al-Muallem.

The two countries had been at odds since the 1980s, when Syria sided with Iran in its war against Iraq. Most recently, U.S. and Iraqi leaders have accused Syria of doing too little to stop foreign fighters from crossing into Iraq.

In signing the agreement, Muallem abandoned his demand that the United States set a timetable for the withdrawal of troops from Iraq. Instead, he agreed that the troops should stay until no longer needed.

The agreement came as Iraqi President Jalal Talabani prepared to leave Friday for a weekend meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Tehran. Ahmadinejad had hoped to include Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in the summit, but Ali al-Dabbagh, the official spokesman for the Iraqi government, said there were no plans for Assad to join them.

He did, however, say that the Syrian leader has invited Talabani and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to Damascus to talk about regional solutions to the sectarian violence within Iraq. "The invitation is there, and then we'll work it out to find a convenient time," he said.

Also Tuesday, U.S. and Iraqi forces raided Sadr City, Baghdad's vast Shiite slum, and captured seven members of the Mahdi Army, a militia loyal to Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. One of the men was believed to know the whereabouts of Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a U.S. soldier who was kidnapped a month ago while visiting his Iraqi wife in Baghdad, officials said.

In Ramadi, there were reports by witnesses and a hospital physician that Abu Zaid al-Tunisi, a senior aide to al-Qaeda in Iraq's former leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. airstrike Monday night. Garver, the military spokesman, said Tuesday that he could not confirm the reports.

Perfect Killing Method, But Clear Targets Are Few (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

KARMA, Iraq, Nov. 16 — The sniper team left friendly lines hours ahead of the sun. They were a group of marines walking through the chill, hoping to be in hiding before the mullahs' predawn call to prayer would urge this city awake.

They reached an abandoned building. Two marines stepped inside, swept the ground floor and signaled to the others to follow them to the flat roof, where they crawled to spots along its walls in which they had previously chiseled out small viewing holes.

Out came their gear: a map, spotting scopes, binoculars, two-way radios and stools. The snipers took their places, peering through the holes, watching an Iraqi neighborhood from which insurgents often fire. They were hoping an insurgent would try to fire on this day. The waiting began.

If the recent pattern was any indication, the waiting could last a long time. This was this sniper team's 30th mission in Anbar Province since early August. They had yet to fire a shot.

More than three years after the insurgency erupted across much of Iraq, sniping — one of the methods that the military thought would be essential in its counterinsurgency operations — is proving less successful in many areas of Iraq than had been hoped, Marine officers, trainers and snipers say.

In theory, Western snipers are a nearly perfect method of killing Iraq's insurgents and thwarting their attacks, all with little risk of damaging property or endangering passers-by. But in practice, the snipers say, they are seeing fewer clear targets than previously, and are shooting fewer insurgents than expected.

In 2003, one Marine sniper killed 32 combatants in 12 days, the snipers say, and many others had double-digit kill totals during tours in Iraq. By this summer, sniper platoons with several teams had typically been killing about a dozen insurgents in seven-month tours, with totals per platoon ranging from 3 to as high as 26.

The gap between the expectations and the results has many causes, but is in part a reflection of the insurgency's duration. With the war in its fourth year, many of the best sniping positions are already well known to the insurgents, and veteran insurgents have become more savvy and harder to kill.

In some areas of Iraq, where the insurgents are less experienced or still fight frontally, snipers have had better rates of success, including the platoon with 26 kills. But many areas, the snipers say, have become maddening places in which to hide and hunt.

"A lot of Marine battalions have rotated through these same areas for six or seven months at a time," said Staff Sgt. Christopher D. Jones, the platoon sergeant of the Scout Sniper Platoon in the Second Battalion, Eighth Marines. "But the insurgents live here. They know almost all the best places that have been used. Before we even get here, they know where we are going to go."

Moreover, the insurgents have developed safeguards, using shepherds and children to look for snipers in buildings and heavily overgrown areas, and networks of informants to spread the word when a sniper team has taken up a new position. "These days we're lucky if we can go 12 hours without getting compromised," he said.

In the Marine Corps, snipers have long been a culture within the culture, a group of quiet, highly competent infantrymen selected for their field skills, self-discipline and shooting expertise.

Picked from the ranks, they are trained at a 10-week school that develops their skills in hiding, stalking and long-range marksmanship. Each infantry battalion has a platoon of snipers, who typically work in small teams apart from the rifle companies. They are considered elite.

But some snipers now worry that the difficulties they face have been compounded by rules and conditions placed on them by senior military leaders.

Marine snipers have customarily trained to work in two-man teams who hide and stalk for days, seeking targets a half-mile or more away. Often an area might be saturated with snipers, so they can support and protect one another while confusing an enemy force with different angles of fire.

This way, according to their thinking, they can kill more enemy combatants, and sow more fear.

Those two-man teams are not allowed in Iraq, in part because of the killings of two groups of snipers earlier in the war.

In the first episode, in 2004 in Ramadi, four Marine snipers were killed without firing a shot, apparently after being surprised in a shooting position in an urban area, known in sniper jargon as a hide. An investigation suggested that they had been overwhelmed and executed.

DOJ_NMG_0097308

In 2005, a six-man sniper team from a Marine reserve unit was killed in Haditha. The insurgents videotaped a display of the slain team's equipment, including a marine's dog tags, and circulated the spectacle on the Internet.

The losses have made commanders hesitant to send out small teams, Marine officers said, a decision that many snipers said inhibits their work.

Snipers argue a counterintuitive point, saying that even though two-man teams have less firepower and fewer men, they are safer because they can hide more effectively.

Sgt. Joseph W. Chamblin, the leader of the battalion's First Sniper Team, said the sniper community was suffering from an overreaction. "It's sad that they got killed, but when you think about it, we've been here three years, going on four, and we've only had two teams killed," he said. "That's not that dramatic."

Sergeant Chamblin killed for the first time on Nov. 10, shooting an insurgent who was putting a makeshift bomb beside a bridge near Saqlawiya, near Falluja, a spot where a similar bomb killed three marines and a translator this summer.

He said snipers were willing to assume the risk of traveling in pairs. "It's a war," he said. "People are going to die, and the American public needs to get over that. They need to get over that and let us do our job."

Snipers also say that other force-protection issues are limiting their operations, including requirements to wear helmets and flak jackets, which slow snipers down and make hiding more difficult.

"You go to a 10-week sniper course and never in that course are you in Kevlar and a helmet," Sergeant Jones said. "Then you come to Iraq and immediately you're in your flak jacket and helmet, and you've got a huge pack of gear."

Sergeant Chamblin agreed. "We are carrying way more stuff than we can be tactically sound with," he said. "My arms are numb because my pack is so heavy. Sometimes, on my missions, my pack has weighed more than I have, and I weigh 150 pounds."

The military has also tightened rules of engagement as the war has progressed, toughening the requirements before a sniper may shoot an Iraqi. Potential targets must be engaged in a hostile act, or show clear hostile intent.

The marines say insurgents know the rules, and now rarely carry weapons in the open. Instead, they pose as civilians and keep their weapons concealed in cars or buildings until just before they need them. Later, when they are done shooting, they put them swiftly out of sight and mingle with civilians.

With almost no Iraqi police officers available in Anbar Province to check loiterers and suspicious cars, the snipers said, the insurgents have moved freely, making it difficult to tell from afar which people are dangerous, even when they have been violating the law.

Although the teams are frustrated, Lt. Col. Kenneth M. DeTreux, the battalion's commander, said they still influenced the insurgents, who tend to avoid areas that are watched. The presence of snipers can keep a road free of bombs, he said.

"Our scout sniper teams have a deterrent effect," he said. "That's not wishful thinking. The insurgents fear our snipers."

Still, the snipers want to thin the insurgents' ranks, not just deter them. Some of their difficulties were evident on the roof on a recent day, when the battalion's Fourth Sniper Team sat, watching through holes in the wall.

Karma is a scene of frequent violence, and below them was a favored insurgent area. Once during the day they thought they had been spotted, and three marines swept the building below to make sure they were safe. They were.

They returned to peering through the holes. Other holes could be seen in buildings nearby — previous sniper positions, and a sign that insurgents probably knew the area is often watched.

"I've got a shady-looking guy," Lance Cpl. Nathan D. Leach, the assistant team leader, said as he observed a suspicious man. "He's got his hand behind him. Looks like he's got something under his shirt."

Lance Cpl. Keeghan O'Brien, the radio operator, interjected, "You see where that guy went?"

Cpl. Jason A. Dufault, the team leader, responded, "No, he walked behind a building and disappeared." A few hours later, several shots were heard from the neighborhood, and rifle-launched grenades sailed through the air. They landed behind the snipers, near a platoon-sized Marine position, exploding with a series of thunderous cracks.

The snipers peered around, seeking a shot. Another sniper team was also in the area, watching over the Marine position, too. No one saw a thing.

The insurgents were within a few hundred yards, but had found a seam. Several hours later, in the blackness again, the team picked up and moved, still waiting for a target after more than three months in Iraq.

New Suits Protect Troops Under Fire (USAT)

USA Today, November 22, 2006

FALLUJAH, Iraq — Marine commanders are outfitting their troops with flame-resistant flight suits in Iraq to ward off burns from the No. 1 killer here: roadside bombs.

DOJ_NMG_0097309

It's another sign of how troops in the field have adapted to the deadly insurgency. Earlier in the war, troops added their own armor to vehicles and devised their own makeshift electronic jamming devices to foil the growing power and sophistication of the bombs they encountered.

Marine commanders in Iraq took the initiative to issue flame- and heat-resistant clothing made from a DuPont-manufactured fiber called Nomex, said Lt. Col. Bryan Salas, a spokesman for Multi-National Force West. That group commands about 33,000 troops in western Iraq, the heart of the Sunni-based insurgency.

The intense heat from the bombs, called improvised explosive devices or IEDs, led Marine commanders to get the protective apparel, Salas said.

Troops who ride in tanks, trucks and armored personnel carriers received most of the first suits.

Explosives kill or wound more troops than any other weapon in Iraq, according to Pentagon records. Through Tuesday, roadside bombs have killed more than 1,200 U.S. servicemembers and wounded more than 11,000 others.

So far, the Marines have issued more than 12,000 fire-resistant suits, said Capt. Jeff Landis, spokesman for the Marine Corps Systems Command.

Only those Marines who leave forward operating bases receive the suits, Landis said, so there's been enough to go around.

In February, the Marines started a research and development program to develop clothing — including shirt, gloves and suit — to help troops survive a fiery blast.

Marines stationed in restive Anbar province in western Iraq say they like the flame-resistant suits.

“The Marine Corps made a great decision with the issuing of flight suits to Marines in vehicles,” said Marine Capt. Eric Dominijanni, 34.

He sends his Marines from the 5th Regimental Combat Team on patrol every day over roads pockmarked and scorched by bomb blasts. “Remember, all vehicles have fuel tanks,” Dominijanni said. “If they explode, the suits protect us from burns”

Members of the 5,000-strong combat team received their first suits in February, said Lt. Joseph King, a Marine spokesman. Troops received more of the dun-colored suits, dubbed “Poop Suits” by the Marines, in the spring, King said.

The Army also has begun to issue fire-resistant flight suits to tank and truck drivers in Iraq, said Lt. Col. Carl Ey, an Army spokesman at the Pentagon.

Next year, the Army plans to issue fire-resistant pullovers, boots and socks, records show.

Family Stands By A Marine Under Investigation (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Darryl Sharratt often breaks into tears when trying to start sentences that include the word "Haditha." A stoic foreman from Pennsylvania, he struggles with painful concepts such as betrayal and helplessness. His wife, Theresa, puts her hand on his shoulder and tries to talk through the anguish.

"I love my son. He's my hero," Theresa Sharratt says calmly. "He's not what they're portraying him as. I can't believe that this is happening to us. To him."

Their dining room table is covered with photographs, scrapbooks, letters and trinkets belonging to their son, Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, a 22-year-old Marine who had dreamed his entire life of joining the military. Now, the Sharratts are fighting to preserve his reputation, as he is one of a handful of Marines who are being investigated over the slayings of two dozen Iraqi civilians on Nov. 19, 2005.

The Sharratts have remained silent until now because they did not know what to say. They have avoided learning details of their son's possible involvement in the shootings while they have struggled to understand what might have happened in a war zone thousands of miles away. They have privately fumed about politicians -- such as Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) -- who have publicly stated that their son was part of a brutal, vengeful slaughter. And they are livid that no one in the Marine Corps has stepped forward to defend their son.

"He's very confident he did nothing wrong, and we believe him," Theresa Sharratt said in a recent interview in the family home in Canonsburg, Pa., which is south of Pittsburgh. Her husband wiped his eyes and added: "He felt he was doing his job. And, now, the Marine Corps has betrayed these guys. All of them."

The incident in Haditha was not widely known until the past spring, when Time magazine wrote an account of the civilian deaths in a small group of homes in the insurgent hotbed. Early reports alleged that Marines with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marines, snapped after a member of their unit was killed by a roadside bomb, sending them on a rampage through nearby homes. There were also allegations of a coverup.

Attorneys for the Marines -- including Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, the most senior noncommissioned officer at the scene of the shootings -- have said repeatedly that their clients followed the appropriate rules of engagement and killed the civilians as they were hunting insurgents responsible both for the roadside bombing and for a volley of shots from what the Marines believed were AK-47 assault rifles.

"They responded the way they were trained," said Jack B. Zimmerman, an attorney for Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, who officials believe was one of the Marines who fired shots. "Anytime you're involved in house-to-house urban warfare in an inhabited area, there's going to be the risk that civilians will be in harm's way. It's very unfortunate that women and children died, but the issue here is what was going through these guys' minds when they were taking fire, and did they respond the way they were trained to?"

Marine Corps officials have declined to comment about the case, as a nine-month investigation rests in the hands of prosecutors who have not yet decided on charges. A high-level review of whether commanders did not appropriately investigate the Haditha incident was completed in Iraq in July and the results are with commanders there, though Pentagon officials have so far declined to release the findings.

Wuterich, through his attorneys, has outlined a scenario that portrays the Marines reacting in a clinical way, noting that the squad was taking fire from the houses and attacked them, "clearing" rooms with grenades and gunfire.

In a separate account, recently obtained by The Washington Post, other Marines in the squad reported seeing, hearing and feeling gunshots flying over their heads in short bursts immediately before they entered the houses. The scenes inside, according to the account, were chaotic, as Marines threw fragmentation grenades and then fired shots through the dust and smoke.

One Marine who was in the convoy that day said that no one overreacted to the death of their friend, Cpl. Miguel "TJ" Terrazas, and that the troops focused on the mission. Answering written questions under the condition of anonymity, the Marine said no one seemed to be out for revenge. Instead, he said, the men wanted to make sure comrades came out from the ambush alive.

"If they were going to charge us, then you may as well charge every Marine and soldier in Iraq," the Marine said. He added that members of his squad "did not realize that civilians had been killed until they went back through the houses to assess collateral damage."

Military officials familiar with the investigation said there is some evidence that could show wrongdoing, including images, taken by an unmanned aircraft, that appear to show that a group of civilians shot near their car -- which had approached the Marine convoy after the bomb went off -- were executed. At least one Marine has told officials that he saw another Marine standing over the bodies and emptying his rifle's clip into them, according to two people closely familiar with the case.

Others have said that the shots that killed women and children inside the houses appeared to be "well-aimed," though defense attorneys have challenged that assessment as speculation because there is so little physical evidence to support it. The official investigation did not begin until months after the shootings, and some critical evidence was lost.

It is unclear what, if any, charges the Marines will face. Officials said this week that criminal charges could be announced in the next few weeks against as many as half a dozen men.

"My client did not engage in any conduct that we believe is criminal," said Gary Myers, an attorney for Sharratt. "Our position is that anything he did engaging the enemy was consistent with rules of engagement at the time."

Sharratt enlisted in the Marines just before his 18th birthday -- a decision his family supported -- and deployed to Iraq in 2004. He spent time in Fallujah, where he took part in the major offensive to take the city and used close-combat "clearing" tactics on enemy houses. He was deployed to Haditha the next year.

The Sharratts used to worry about their son's safety and how he dealt with the loss of friends -- "Don't worry about me, I can handle it," he had said to his mother. Now they worry that he is caught up in a political storm.

"Somebody's going to pay, and we're so afraid it's going to be the young guys," Theresa Sharratt said. "He believes he didn't do anything wrong."

But Darryl Sharratt says America has already convicted his son and the other Marines, and he feels helpless, lost, as he awaits a decision on possible charges.

"For 18 years, I protected him. And now I can't do anything about it," he said. "I just want the Marine Corps to stand up and say the Marines couldn't have done this and didn't do it. I blame them for letting it go on for this long."

Officials: Afghanistan Needs More Troops (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor
AP, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097311

More troops and sophisticated equipment are needed to bolster Afghanistan's security forces, but it is not clear whether more U.S. troops will be deployed there, U.S. and Afghan defense officials said Tuesday.

Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry told Pentagon reporters that U.S. officials will wait until after next week's NATO summit in Latvia to see how many troops other countries plan to provide before deciding if more U.S. forces must be sent to Afghanistan.

"I think it will be best at this point to wait and see what NATO is able to provide," Eikenberry said. "There's more meetings that are taking place on the military staff. And this is very high on their agenda."

U.S. military leaders have been pushing NATO members to meet their commitments and provide more troops in Afghanistan. For months, officials have said that NATO nations have provided only 85 percent of the support they promised. There is a NATO-led force of about 30,000 in Afghanistan, including some 12,000 U.S. troops. An additional 11,000 American troops are there under U.S. control, conducting counterterrorism operations and other training and reconstruction duties.

The Afghan minister of defense, Gen. Abdul Rahim Wardak, who met Tuesday with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, said his country needs more firepower, transport planes and armored vehicles. The Afghans have asked for additional helicopters and aircraft that can move troops and supplies through the mountainous regions.

Eikenberry said some body armor, helmets and other equipment are already being provided to the Afghan National Army. He added that there have been no final decisions on what other weapons and aircraft would be provided, and therefore he could not provide any cost estimate.

He said now is an appropriate time to give the Afghans more sophisticated equipment because they are better able to operate and maintain the equipment. It will be less expensive to equip the Afghans than continue to use U.S. troops and equipment in the war there, he said.

Wardak said Afghanistan is accelerating its training program for the army, and hopes to have about 70,000 troops by October 2008 — several years ahead of schedule. He said officials are hoping that NATO "will take a more effective role in equipping and training the Afghan national security forces."

"Once we are well-trained and well-equipped, we will be able to repay some of our debt to the international community by participating in peacekeeping operations," said Wardak, adding that Afghanistan would also be able to be "a permanent part of the war against terrorism."

In other comments, Eikenberry said the ongoing hunt for Osama bin Laden continues, and it "remains as much of a priority as it has since the United States of America was struck on 9/11."

Afghanistan Could Again Be Engulfed By Civil War (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Here in this extraordinary piece of desert is where the future of world security in the early 21st century is going to be played out.

Speaking those words on Monday at Camp Bastion, the British military base in Afghanistan's southern Helmand province, Tony Blair made clear to the 800 troops lined up to meet him that the UK and its allies would "stand up and defeat" the resurgent Taliban.

It was a commitment the visiting prime minister later repeated to President Hamid Karzai in the leafy grounds of the Afghan leader's palace in Kabul. Mr Blair's concern was the battle against Taliban supporters and their al-Qaeda and drug gang allies in the bitterly contested south of the country, where violence has risen to heights not seen since the toppling five years ago of their authoritarian regime.

The 5,200 British troops stationed in Helmand – part of a 32,800-strong Nato-led force in the country – have faced almost daily fighting that has been as fierce as many engagements in Iraq. More than 3,700 people have been killed this year, most of them in the south and east, where Taliban's Pashtun fighters remain the biggest threat to Afghanistan's fragile democracy.

On Nato maps, Afghanistan's southern provinces and eastern areas along the border with Pakistan are shaded a fiery red, reflecting the hot spots of a persistent insurgency. By contrast, the northern and western provinces are shown in green, dotted with yellow to indicate pockets of instability.

But the colour-coding is deceptive. The government and its international backers can no longer take the relative peace of the north and west for granted. It is becoming clear that warlords and commanders from other ethnic groups are increasingly a menace.

The Northern Alliance warlords – who, backed by a US air campaign, swept the Taliban from power in 2001 and in Bonn that December set out a five-year blueprint for democracy – have been marginalised by Mr Karzai's government. Many are angry about being pushed aside and hostile to anything that will erode their power at a local level – from counter-narcotics efforts to police reform.

"In the south the Taliban is an armed opposition but in the north there is growing political opposition. The government is being pushed from both sides," says Saleh Registani, a member of parliament from the fortress valley of Panjshir, just north of the capital, which held out against Taliban fighters in the 1990s. "The security crisis is spreading like an oil slick across the country."

Afghanistan is a nation riven by ethnic and factional divisions, which flared into a bloody civil war that left thousands dead before the Taliban militia swept to power in 1996. "The insurgency in the south has the potential to open up fissures along ethnic and factional lines which have so far been contained," says Joanna Nathan, senior South Asia analyst with the International Crisis Group.

Moreover, the war in the south is draining attention and resources from the north and west and stoking public anger towards the government in those regions, western officials in Kabul warn. "We do have a serious problem in the south, but the north is a ticking time-bomb. There is not a single unifying leader and there is the potential for chaos," says a diplomat in Kabul. "We are moving back to the days of the civil war where all the neighbouring countries were worried, concerned and involved in Afghanistan."

The issue will be at the centre of a two-day Nato summit that starts in the Latvian capital, Riga, next Tuesday. That follows the transfer of peacekeeping command to the alliance from the original coalition forces in eastern Afghanistan, the final phase of the nationwide deployment of its International Security Assistance Force.

The north is not immune from attacks by the Taliban and other disruptive forces, with incidents in Herat city in the west and the northern city of Kunduz, where German troops are based and which saw its first suicide attack in June. Islamic militants linked with the Hezb-e-Islami group headed by Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, who appears on US most-wanted terror lists, have been active in the north this summer, as have others linked to Afghanistan's large and rapidly growing drugs trade.

"What you have is a thinly spread gloss of governance over an area that is not under any power broker's control. It is fragmenting," says a senior US official in Kabul, adding that any attempt to force a government presence further into the north and west could kick off violent power struggles.

Local militia commanders are rethinking their backing of the central government and Islamic militants are moving to mobilise support outside their southern strongholds by exploiting the factional fault-lines in the north and the west. As the fighting has raged in the south, the instability has begun to infect previously secure areas.

"The north has become very unstable. A lot of weapons have been distributed and stockpiled. The warlords of all ethnic groups have come together with the drug mafias," says Mohamadullah Shoiab Shamkar, deputy director of tribal affairs for Fedayeen-e-Sol, a group of tribal elders from around Afghanistan who are looking at ways to stem the growing insecurity. "None of these people wants the constitution or the rule of law to succeed."

Since July in Faryab province, which borders Turkmenistan, there has been a spate of factional battles between forces loyal to Gen Abdul Rashid Dostum, an Uzbek warlord, and a rival commander. Their brief clashes have killed tens rather than the hundreds who have died in battles between the Taliban and Nato troops in the south but could herald more trouble to come. "The tensions between warring factions are now being exploited by insurgents and we have reports of militant activity in the south of Faryab," says one person involved with the Nato-led force in the country.

The bulk of the 2,700 troops in the north are German and are constrained by caveats that would not allow them to leave their bases to intervene in a big clash in the region. Italian, Spanish and Lithuanian troops in the west are similarly hidebound.

Last month, gun battles between rival factions in Shindand, near Herat, left about 30 dead. The main factor holding the west of Afghanistan together is the positive influence of neighbouring Iran, which "is pumping a lot of money into the reconstruction of the west", says a senior US administration official in Washington.

True, the standing armies of the leading warlords who ousted the Taliban – such as Abdul Rashid Dostum, Ismael Khan and Mohammed Atta – have been disbanded. Their factions remain splintered, even in parliament, where they are unable to present a solid block against the Afghan government. But the fault lines between the groups are exposed and ready for insurgents linked with the Taliban to exploit.

Riots that swept Kabul six months ago, leaving more than 20 dead, emboldened factional leaders across the north and west. The May violence in the capital sent a signal about the weakness of the central government around the country, says Nader Nadery, head of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission. "Commanders in the north saw the riots in Kabul just 5km away from Karzai's palace and asked themselves, 'Why should we be afraid of these guys sitting in the capital and give up our guns?' "

Weapons prices in northern Afghanistan more than doubled over the summer as commanders again began stockpiling arms. Consequently a UN-backed programme to disarm illegal militias has ground to a halt countrywide.

As local commanders seek to strengthen their hands against the central government, aid and reconstruction workers are increasingly being caught in the crossfire. Since the beginning of the year, more aid workers have been killed in the north and west of Afghanistan than the south.

Nine staff with aid agencies or the UN were killed in the north, 13 in the west and four in and around Kabul, compared with two in the south, according to the Afghanistan NGO Security Network. Although there are fewer aid workers in the restive south and east, the numbers also reflect the remobilisation of Islamic militant groups such as Hezb-e-Islami in the north and west as well as growing lawlessness linked to drugs and crime.

As the traditional ethnic enemies of the Pashtun Taliban who hail from the south and east, the Tajik, Uzbek and Hazara militia in the north and west are against the Taliban's return – but this may have lulled western governments into a false sense of security.

Michael Shaikh, a researcher with New York-based Human Rights Watch, says that Northern Alliance leaders – who battled each other and then the Taliban during the civil war of the early 1990s before coming to power in 2001 – need the Karzai government as a bulwark against the violence in the south. But he adds: "That doesn't mean they won't try to weaken the government and try to gain autonomy in their own areas. There are factors up there that could enable an insurgency."

With leading members of the Northern Alliance sidelined by Mr Karzai, their support for the government is waning, western officials and Afghan legislators say. "We agreed to work together in Bonn. We had an unofficial agreement. It was a promise but it was our mistake to trust Karzai. He called all the Northern Alliance leaders warlords and none of them are in positions of power now," says Mr Registani.

Younus Qanooni, parliamentary speaker and one of the architects of the Bonn agreement for the Northern Alliance, says the government is losing support and could face a crisis of public confidence. "We have seen that people who laid the foundations of the government have been pushed to the side," he says.

Although many of the marginalised still support the government, that could easily change.

39 Suspected Taliban Jailed In Pakistan (AP-Y)

By Abdul Sattar

AP, November 22, 2006

Police arrested 39 Afghans suspected of being Taliban fighters in the southwestern Pakistani city of Quetta, an official said Tuesday, though an Islamist group insisted the detainees were only students.

The arrests late Monday and early Tuesday came in separate raids on rented houses in areas with large Afghan refugee populations, said Chaudhry Mohammed Yaqoob, chief of police in Baluchistan province, whose capital is Quetta.

Pakistan is under pressure from the U.S. and neighboring Afghanistan to do more to detain Taliban militants or extremists allied with the toppled Afghan regime. The Pakistani government denies turning a blind eye to such activities, saying it is doing its best to crack down on militants.

Police are interrogating the suspects to learn if any senior Taliban figures were among them, Yaqoob said. Afghan officials have alleged Taliban leader Mullah Omar is in Quetta, but Pakistan has rejected the claim.

A spokesman for a pro-Taliban Islamic group protested the arrests, claiming the men were Islamic students and not fighters.

"They came here to study. They have no link with fighting," said Abdul Sattar Chisti of Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam party, a key member of a six-party Islamic political coalition.

Dozens of Taliban suspects have been arrested in the city in recent months, with many handed over to Afghan authorities, Yaqoob said. Among them are militants being treated at Quetta hospitals after being wounded in clashes with NATO and U.S. forces in Afghanistan, he said.

Pakistan had supported the Taliban before severing ties with the militia and backing the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Washington's history of abandoning friends doesn't give Iraqis much confidence.

MANY AMERICANS have been wondering why so many Iraqis are willing to fight for militias and terrorist groups but not for the American-backed government. Look at it from their perspective. Would you stake your life on a regime whose existence depends on Washington's continuing support? Given our long, shameful record of leaving allies in the lurch, that has never seemed to be a smart bet.

We have been betraying friends since our first overseas conflict, against the Barbary pirates who captured ships off the African coast and enslaved their crews. To defeat the pasha of Tripoli, the U.S. made common cause with his brother, Hamet Karamanli. In 1804, American envoy William Eaton led a motley force of mercenaries and Marines across North Africa to install Karamanli on the throne. The offensive was called off prematurely when President Jefferson's envoy reached a deal with the pasha to free his American captives in return for $60,000. Karamanli was evacuated to the U.S., but his family members were left as hostages. Eaton raged: "Our too credulous ally is sacrificed to a policy, at the recollection of which, honor recoils, and humanity bleeds."

Something similar could have been said about U.S. conduct after World War I. President Wilson was the leading champion of "national self-determination" at the Paris Peace Conference in 1919, yet the U.S. did nothing to safeguard the states he helped midwife. We stood by, for instance, when Czechoslovakia and Poland were occupied by the Nazis. This callous indifference was repeated after World War II when we did too little to save the Eastern Europeans from Russian occupation.

Postwar U.S. administrations compounded this duplicity when they urged the "captive" peoples behind the Iron Curtain to seek their freedom and yet did nothing to help the East Germans in their 1953 uprising, the Hungarians in 1956 or the Czechs in 1968. No one is suggesting that Washington should have risked World War III, but we might have put more diplomatic and economic pressure on the Soviet Union to mitigate the worst of their crackdowns. If we weren't willing to do even that, we shouldn't have instigated the uprisings in the first place.

Cuban anti-communists fared just as poorly at American hands. On April 17, 1961, 1,500 exiles organized by the CIA landed at the Bay of Pigs. The Cuban army counterattacked, and the rebels were killed or captured. The outcome might have been different if the U.S. had been willing to provide air cover, but President Kennedy refused to do so because he wanted to hide U.S. complicity.

In the following years, the U.S. waged a massive war to stop a communist takeover of South Vietnam. By 1973, we had tired of the conflict, and the South Vietnamese were left to fend for themselves. Thousands were killed. Many others wound up in brutal reeducation camps or took to the seas in leaky boats.

The U.S. was equally inconstant in its support of the rebels battling the Sandinista government in Nicaragua in the 1980s. We went from backing the Contras to cutting them off, heedless of the cost to fighters who were risking their necks to fight an oppressive regime. And then there was the shah of Iran, installed by the CIA and Britain's MI6 in 1953 and then abandoned by the United States in 1979 — and, unlike Hamet Karamanli, not even given refuge on our shores.

But that was nothing compared to the betrayal of the Iraqi Kurds and Shiites in 1991. President George H.W. Bush urged Iraqis to "take matters into their own hands" and overthrow Saddam Hussein, yet stood by as Hussein's henchmen brutally put down the uprisings. The U.S. did not even shoot down Iraqi gunships, which could have been done at little risk to American forces.

This long trail of American treachery has grave consequences for our foreign policy. It emboldens our enemies (the Bay of Pigs led to the Cuban missile crisis, for example), dispirits our friends and makes it harder to achieve our objectives. Knowing our history, few Iraqi leaders are counting on American support in the future. They're making their deals with the devil, whether neighboring states or sectarian militias. And if we do scuttle out of Iraq prematurely, Afghans and others whose support we seek will get the message again: Don't trust Uncle Sam.

The least we can do is to assure those Iraqis who have worked closely with American forces — whether as janitors, translators, soldiers or bureaucrats — that, if we do leave, they and their families will receive asylum in the United States. We should not sacrifice another "too credulous ally" on the altar of a dishonorable and inhumane policy.

Army Debuts New Slogan In Recruiting Commercials (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson,

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

The Army, facing another tough recruiting season, launched a $200 million-a-year advertising campaign this month and unveiled a new slogan: "Army Strong."

The campaign's core message is that the Army builds not only physical but also mental and emotional strength in recruits, bonding them into a powerful, close-knit team.

"There's strong, and then there's Army strong," a deep male voice intones as martial music rises from a brass band in the background.

The television ads, launched nationwide for Veterans Day along with Internet placements and other outreach, omit all but the most fleeting images related to the all-volunteer Army's biggest endeavor ever: the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0097315

The main 30- and 60-second ads show soldiers jogging in formation, scaling a rope obstacle course and leaping out of a helicopter -- all take place in what appear to be familiar, grassy, domestic settings. The only brief glimpse of what could possibly be Iraq is of a group of soldiers hastily raising a tent -- although, unlike others in the ad, these soldiers wear no helmets or body armor.

There are obvious reasons the Army might not want to underscore to potential recruits, and their parents, that signing up these days almost inevitably means deployment to combat zones in Afghanistan or Iraq, where the majority of the more than 2,850 killed and 21,000 wounded have been soldiers.

The Army missed its fiscal 2005 recruiting target by more than 6,000 soldiers but rebounded last year with the aid of thousands of added recruiters, a doubling of the maximum enlistment bonus to $40,000 and some eased standards. The Army begins fiscal 2007 with another hefty target of 80,000 recruits and only about 15 percent already in the pipeline -- compared with a goal of 25 to 30 percent.

Army officials acknowledge that parents and other influential adults are less likely to recommend military service today because of the ongoing conflicts, and surveys have shown that the wars have made some young people more wary of enlisting.

To address these concerns, two of the ads feature the parents of soldiers -- a farming couple and a mechanic and his wife -- whose worries about Army service evolve into pride. "I was pretty nervous, apprehensive," says the father, wearing a 1st Infantry Division cap and standing beside a cornfield.

"If your son or daughter wants to talk with you about joining the Army, listen. You made them strong, we'll make them Army strong," the announcer says in the English and Spanish ads launched on MTV, the History Channel, the Discovery Channel and other stations.

The television ads are coupled with Internet recruiting initiatives aimed at helping youths do their own research, including a presence on YouTube, Google, Yahoo and MySpace. Last Friday, the campaign expanded to offer potential recruits an "Ask a Soldier" discussion forum at GoArmy.com.

New York advertising firm McCann Erickson designed the campaign after winning the two-year Army contract, which can be renewed for three additional years.

The ads were tested on hundreds of soldiers, although studies show that it is difficult for the military to gain an accurate measure of the effectiveness of advertising, which is relatively expensive compared with other recruiting tools such as educational benefits and bonuses.

Asked how they felt about the "Army Strong" pitch, soldiers at the Pentagon had mixed reactions. "I like it because it gives a better picture of what the Army is," said Lt. Col. Wayne Cherry, a liaison officer for the Army's chief of staff. " 'Army Strong' is like a football team, a baseball team."

Sgt. 1st Class Mark Johnson was less enthusiastic. " 'Army Strong' is not telling me anything. It doesn't touch any emotional string," he said. "I don't think it will inspire people."

While soldiers were still formulating opinions on the new slogan, several held strong views about past ditties such as the nebulous "Army of One," which survived only five years until being replaced by "Army Strong."

"The 'Army of One' got lost in translation," quipped Col. David Reese, director for ministry initiatives of the Army's chief of chaplains. "I like 'Army Strong' because it symbolizes cohesiveness."

By far the most popular recent slogan, according to soldiers interviewed, was "Be All You Can Be," which lasted 20 years until a recruiting downturn saw it changed in 2001.

"To me, 'Army Strong' is kind of faddish. I've always liked 'Be All You Can Be' -- I missed that," said Lt. Col. Stephen Durham, a logistician.

" 'Be All You Can Be' could have gone on forever. It's such an evergreen thing," another Army official said wistfully.

DOJ:

GAO: DOJ Needs To Fix Classification Problems (GCN)

By Kerri Hostetler, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department needs a standard classification system and needs to address its staffing shortage, according to a report issued by the Government Accountability Office.

DOJ and its bureaus, specifically the FBI, were under review to determine if the department implemented the National Archives and Records Administration's Information Security Oversight Office (ISOO) recommendations to correct problems in their document classification systems.

ISOO is responsible for oversight of national security classification programs for Executive Branch agencies. GAO conducted the study because of the important role information protection and sharing plays in preventing terrorist attacks, the report said.

DOJ ranks third in the number of documents classified in the executive branch, behind the Defense Department and the CIA. Within DOJ, the FBI handles 98 percent of that work.

In any DOJ entity, a document can be classified in one of five ways: Limited Office Use Only, For Office Use Only, Law Enforcement Sensitive, Propriety Information or DEA-sensitive (specific to DEA). Each of these designations have "unique definitions and safeguard requirements," but they do not have "specific guidance on the types of information that merit each designation," the report said.

Without specific guidelines, employees do not know if the information warrants a sensitive but classified distinction. The components of DOJ do not train their employees to make these decisions nor do they oversee the process by which employees label the information.

Coordinating the classification process within DOJ will not take place until the end of December. Officials are waiting on results from an interagency work group that is standardizing classification procedures throughout the government. The agency said once these standards are available, they will make additional changes to their component's current practices.

Once the work group's standards are available, auditors recommend the attorney general make DOJ:

Establish specific guidance for applying the designations they will use;

Ensure that all employees authorized to make the designations have the necessary training before they can designate documents; and

Set internal controls for overseeing sensitive but unclassified designations to help ensure that they are properly applied. DOJ has taken action on five of the 10 ISOO recommendations, GAO found. The department has addressed its need to update and make its training more relevant and to fix its component monitoring problems. But Justice needs more people to do this and the department has failed to address its staff shortage issues, which GAO cited as ISOO's most important recommendation.

By not addressing the issue they do not have the resources to fix problems, such as insufficient training and oversight, the report said. Also, the department doesn't know how many people they will need to sufficiently perform its tasks nor does it know which recommendations take priority once the resource void is corrected.

The report said the staff shortage puts the classification program at risk because they are the people who set policy, provide training and oversee classification departmentwide.

ISOO also recommends an increase in DOJ security office clearance, but the agency disagrees with the notion because the program managers of the security office already have access to senior members of the department. Other recommendations not addressed by DOJ include: briefing exiting employees about the need to keep classified information secret, addressing already existing inspection problems and monitoring classification practices.

In all, the FBI implemented or taken action on 11 of the 12 recommendations issued by ISOO.

GAO Sees Risk In Classification (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department's classification program, which determines what information could reasonably be expected to damage the country's national security if disclosed publicly, is at risk because of a lack of adequate staffing, according to a government report.

In a 50-page report yesterday, the Government Accountability Office said the department's classification-management program needs to assess its "optimum" manpower requirements, develop a strategy to meet them, and then implement internal controls "to ensure proper use of sensitive but unclassified designations."

"The September 11 attacks showed that agencies must balance the need to protect and share sensitive information to prevent future attacks," the report says. "Agencies classify this information or designate it sensitive but unclassified to protect and limit access to it."

But, according to the GAO, the department is at risk because it has not addressed the problem of insufficient staffing to effectively manage and oversee the program, noting it has one staff member to cover departmentwide training issues and three staffers to oversee 3,500 locations under the program.

"According to the program manager, with these resources, the security office was reacting to classification issues that arose rather than being proactive to prevent them," the GAO said.

DOJ_NMG_0097317

Staffing increases for the Justice Department program were recommended by the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which reviewed security procedures in July 2004 and April 2005. GAO was asked this year to see how well the department and the FBI had responded to the request.

The GAO said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales should determine what staffing he needs to carry out the responsibilities of the department's classification-management program and devise a strategy to make those resources available and use them effectively.

Justice Department officials, according to the GAO report, said it "is trying to address its resources constraints, a long-standing problem that GAO identified as early as 1993, by requesting additional funds from an administrative account in fiscal year 2007."

The GAO noted that all records of a permanent historical value older than 25 years that contain classified national security information automatically will be declassified on Dec. 31, and each year thereafter, and "may be available for public disclosure, unless an agency head or senior agency official determines that these records fall within an exemption that permits continued classification."

It said the documents that could be released without proper classification could "seriously impair relations between the United States and a foreign government; undermine diplomatic activities of the United States; identify a human intelligence source; or violate a statute, treaty or international agreement."

But, it said, the problem continues because the department's security office did not receive additional resources, as requested, nor has Justice reallocated resources from other activities to that office.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

U.S. Drops Bid To Reinstate Lay's Convictions For Enron Fraud (BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins, Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

The U.S. government dropped an attempt to restore the convictions of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay, who died six weeks after being found guilty of spearheading the fraud that destroyed the company.

Lay died of a heart attack in July after being convicted in May of 10 fraud and conspiracy charges. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake threw out the verdicts under a legal principle that erases convictions of defendants who die before they can appeal.

The government moved yesterday to withdraw a Nov. 16 notice of an appeal of Lake's decision. Steven Tyrrell, chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, said in the document the government made the move after a bill to change the law was introduced in Congress. He didn't elaborate.

``Now, from a criminal standpoint, Ken Lay is forever exonerated," said Ed Tomko, a former federal prosecutor who defended another Enron executive against fraud charges.

Tomko said efforts to change the law are ``largely meaningless" to Lay's criminal case, because lawmakers can't apply punishments retroactively.

``It might mean something to the next case," Tomko said. ``But the government is already chasing Ken Lay's money in a civil case."

U.S. authorities last month filed a civil forfeiture case against Lay's estate, seeking $12.5 million for victims of Enron's collapse. The government asked for a jury trial to re- establish Lay's responsibility for the fraud.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch and Samuel Buffone, Lay's appellate lawyer, declined to comment on the government's decision not to appeal.

More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee retirement funds vanished virtually overnight when Enron plunged into bankruptcy in December 2001, following revelations of widespread accounting fraud at the Houston-based energy company.

Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion in stock market losses.

A total of 24 people besides Lay were convicted or pleaded guilty in Enron cases. Four of the 24 had convictions reversed on appeal, and more appeals are pending. Another six people are awaiting trial.

Jeffrey Skilling, former Enron chief executive officer, was convicted with Lay and was sentenced to 24 years in prison. He is to start serving his sentence Dec. 12 in Minnesota.

The case is U.S. v. Lay, H-04-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

CRIMINAL LAW:

Justice Department Declines To Pursue Porter Accusation (LVRJ)

By Steve Tetreault, STEPHENS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Las Vegas Review-Journal, November 22, 2006

Ex-staffer alleged illegal fundraising calls made

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department has decided not to pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, a practice that would be illegal if proved, officials confirmed Monday.

The charge was leveled by a former Porter staffer who offered e-mails in support of his charge against the Nevada Republican. Coming during the election season in October, it roiled the U.S. House campaign that pitted Porter, the incumbent and eventual winner, against Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen.

Officials from the Nevada Democratic Party, which pressed the Justice Department to pursue the allegation, were told late last week by the FBI that an investigation was not moving forward, state party chairman Tom Collins said Monday.

Porter said he was notified of the same on Nov. 9, two days after the election, by Steve Martinez, FBI special agent in charge of the Las Vegas office.

"I take it the fact the FBI is not moving forward is that they are confident and they didn't sense the need," Porter said. "Anyway, it was not true."

Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, said, "The FBI looked at it and the matter was declined." Sierra said he could not provide further information as to the review and the decision process.

Collins said no reason was given to him. He said there were no signs to Democrats in Las Vegas that the FBI pursued the matter.

"You have to look at who hires these guys in the Justice Department," Collins said. "This is just the typical Bush-Cheney cover-up stuff. Jon Porter has done nothing to clear his name."

Porter said he took the news as vindication "by the highest law enforcement in the land," and that the accusation was suspect from the start.

"This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee," he said.

Jim Shepard, the former employee who lives in Virginia, could not be reached by telephone and by e-mail on Monday.

Shepard, who worked from March to the end of June as Porter's scheduler and executive assistant, alleged that Porter on five dates made calls to potential campaign donors from his Washington office and his district office in Henderson.

Federal law makes it illegal to solicit or receive a donation of any kind in any official building. In Washington, lawmakers customarily walk to Republican or Democratic party headquarters on Capitol Hill to utilize small rooms for fundraising calls.

Shepard said he sat across for Porter in his Washington office while the congressman sought campaign funds. In Nevada, he said, Porter eschewed driving from Henderson to his campaign consultant's office in Summerlin, and made calls from his official office on three occasions in advance of President Bush's visit to Las Vegas in April.

Shepard made available e-mails in which he warned top Porter staffers against the practice. In response, Porter produced phone records and copies of his daily schedule that challenged some of the charges made by Shepard.

FBI Won't Probe Rep. Porter Fundraising Calls, Officials Say (AP)

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The Justice Department will not pursue an accusation that Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., made fundraising calls from his congressional offices earlier this year, officials said in Washington, D.C.

The charge, involving a practice that would be illegal if proved, was made in October by a former Porter staffer during Porter's re-election campaign against Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen. The staffer offered e-mails as evidence of his claim.

Porter said Steve Martinez, FBI special agent in charge of the Las Vegas office, told him the same thing two days after the Nov. 7 election.

"I take it the fact the FBI is not moving forward is that they are confident and they didn't sense the need," Porter said. "Anyway, it was not true. This was something raised two weeks before the election by a disgruntled ex-employee."

Aryan Brotherhood Members Sentenced To Life In Prison (AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press

AP, November 22, 2006

SANTA ANA – A federal judge sentenced three suspected leaders of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang to life terms Tuesday, saying the sentences were the only just response to three decades of orchestrated murders and attempted murders in some of the nation's toughest penitentiaries.

Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, was sentenced to four consecutive life terms without possibility of parole, a sentence automatically imposed after a jury deadlocked earlier this year on the death penalty. Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 59, also escaped the death penalty but received three consecutive life terms without possibility of parole.

A third defendant, Edgar "The Snail" Hevle, was sentenced to three consecutive life terms and will likely die in prison. He had not been eligible for the death penalty.

The men showed no reaction as the verdicts were announced, but they hugged their attorneys and shook the hands of other defense attorneys before being escorted out by federal marshals.

Carter said the sentences were appropriate for crimes "spanning well over 30 years of murder and organizational murder."

"It's almost inconceivable and the duration of time is almost inconceivable," Carter said of the string of murders, attempted murders and other crimes before handing down the sentence.

The defendants have 10 days to file appeals with the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

Defense attorneys said they were disappointed, but not surprised, with the sentences.

"This was inevitable," said Bernard Rosen, Hevle's co-counsel. "We've got some excellent legal arguments on appeal, so it ain't over yet."

Among other things, the jury convicted Mills and Bingham for inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., in 1997 that resulted in the deaths of black inmates Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the rival DC Blacks prison gang. Those killings made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty under the statute of Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering.

Hevle, 55, and a fourth defendant, Christopher Overton Gibson, were convicted of conspiring to murder the black inmates. Gibson, 47, is recuperating from back surgery and was not sentenced Tuesday. He faces a sentence of 20 years to life in prison.

Mills, Bingham and Hevle were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989. Gibson was not charged with that count.

Prosecutors spent six years building their case against suspected members of the Aryan Brotherhood in an effort to dismantle the violent white supremacist organization accused of ordering hits and running drug rings, gambling rings and protection rackets from behind bars.

On Friday, prosecutors dropped a bid to place severe lifestyle restrictions on the men. They had originally asked Carter to prohibit visits, letters and phone calls to the convicts from anyone but their attorneys and keep writing tools, paper and previously viewed reading material out of their cells.

Similar bans have been imposed only 11 times in the history of the federal prison system. Inmates Zacarias Moussaoui, the suspected "20th hijacker" in the Sept. 11 World Trade Center attack, and convicted Unabomber Ted Kaczynski are among those with restrictions on their prison contacts.

Instead, Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe said in court papers that the government would likely pursue the restrictions "administratively," meaning they would be imposed by U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales without a court hearing or judge's order.

On Tuesday, Carter said he was worried that Gonzales would impose the restrictions without ensuring that the Bureau of Prisons could enforce them. He read an Associated Press article aloud in court citing the shortage of guards and deteriorating conditions at the maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., where the men will likely serve their sentences.

"I can only pray that the attorney general will provide the resources to carry out these conditions," Carter said, adding that it was the only way to prevent "further inmates and members of the Bureau of Prisons staff (from being) hurt and, God forbid, killed."

Carter said he would have imposed the restrictions against Mills and cited testimony about threats Mills made to prison staff and an attempt to smuggle cyanide into a federal prison in Marion, Ill., to poison the guards.

Rosen, Hevle's attorney, said having Gonzales order the restrictions instead of a judge will make it harder to appeal them.

Inmates, unaided by their attorneys, must exhaust a series of appeals to prison officials before applying for a hearing before the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver. That hearing is not guaranteed, he said.

3 Hispanics Sentenced To Life In Killing Of Blacks (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

Three Los Angeles-area Hispanic gang members have been sentenced to life in prison in what federal prosecutors called hate-crime attacks that randomly targeted black non-gang members, including women and children.

Gilbert Saldana, 27, Alejandro Martinez, 28, and Fernando Cazares, 25, were sentenced Monday to consecutive life terms without the possibility of parole by U.S. District Judge Percy Anderson in Los Angeles for their roles in the slaying of two black men in 1999 and 2000.

Judge Anderson said the men, members of the Avenues gang, maintained a "reign of terror" over the Highland Park area northeast of Los Angeles that had "far-reaching consequences." Under federal sentencing guidelines, the judge could have imposed lesser sentences but declined to do so.

Prosecutors said the men tried to drive blacks out of the neighborhood in a six-year conspiracy of violence and threats.

Law-enforcement authorities said the prosecution was one of the first prominent cases in which the Justice Department targeted street gang members with hate-crime laws normally used to prosecute white supremacist groups.

In October, Robert B. Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal division at the FBI's Los Angeles office, told a House subcommittee that gangs and other criminal enterprises pose increasing concerns for the international law-enforcement and intelligence communities.

Calling gangs "more violent, more organized and more widespread than ever before," Mr. Loosle estimated that there are 30,000 gangs nationwide with 800,000 members affecting 2,500 communities.

Porfirio Avila, 31, a fourth man convicted in the Highland Park case, is scheduled for sentencing by Judge Anderson Dec. 18. Avila is in prison on separate state murder charges. A fifth man, Merced Cambero, was indicted but has fled and is listed as a fugitive.

Saldana, Martinez and Cazares were found guilty this summer of violating the civil rights of blacks in the gang's neighborhood by attacking and sometimes killing them. Christopher Bowser was fatally shot while waiting at a bus stop on Dec. 11, 2000, and Kenneth Wilson, 38, was killed while looking for a parking place on April 18, 1999.

Saldana was convicted of being the triggerman in the Wilson murder and is serving a life sentence in state prison for another murder. Martinez was convicted of instigating the Wilson slaying and encouraging his fellow gang members to kill Mr. Wilson. Cazares was convicted of serving as a lookout during that murder.

During the June trial, prosecutors documented several attacks by gang members on blacks, including the shooting of a 15-year-old boy on a bicycle; the attack on a jogger, who was hit in the head with a pistol; and the assault of a woman, who was knocked off her bike, and her husband, who was threatened with a box cutter.

Assistant FBI Director J. Stephen Tidwell, who heads the bureau's Los Angeles office, said the case represented "the successful and unprecedented result of a lengthy investigation into civil rights violations, including multiple violent assaults and murder, committed by this violent gang."

He said the FBI has offered a $20,000 reward for information on Cambero's whereabouts "to bring closure to the family of the victim who was murdered based on the color of his skin."

Brokers Not Guilty Of Bribing BWC Exec (COLDIS)

By Mark Niquette, The Columbus Dispatch

Columbus Dispatch, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097321

AKRON — After about three hours of deliberation, a jury today acquitted two Cleveland-area brokers accused of conspiring to bribe the former chief financial officer at the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation with use of a Florida condominium.

The six-man, six-woman jury returned not-guilty verdicts on all charges against Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil after closing arguments in which their attorneys argued that the government's key witness was not credible.

"The length of the deliberations speaks to the strength of the government's case," Lewis attorney Roger Synenberg said after the verdict, which followed the two-week trial.

Lewis and O'Neil and their family members hugged and celebrated after the verdict, with an emotional Lewis saying the trial ordeal was worse than serving in Korea.

"Korea was easier, even when everyone was shooting at me," said Lewis, 72, of Willoughby Hills. He added that he never doubted the outcome of the trial because he trusted God and his defense team.

O'Neil, 55, of Chesterland, thanked his friends and clients, including U.S. Sen. George V. Voinovich, for standing behind him. O'Neil handles Voinovich's personal finances.

"There was a lot of political pressure on him," O'Neil said of Voinovich.

The verdict is a setback for the state and federal task force investigating allegations of corruption at the bureau. The investigation has produced convictions for 10 public figures so far, including Gov. Bob Taft and coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, who was sentenced Monday to 18 years in state prison. Noe is to serve that time after a 27-month stay in federal prison.

U.S. Attorney Greg White, of Cleveland, said he would not second-guess the jury's verdict and that the investigations will continue with the same intensity.

"We have to dissect the verdict and decide whether we need to adjust our direction," White said. "There'll be some disappointment, but we are determined to see this through to the end."

He declined to discuss specifics, but other authorities have said that ethics charges are expected soon against two or three individuals and that other matters are under investigation.

Lewis and O'Neil were charged with two counts of conspiring to bribe the bureau's Terrence W. Gasper and one count each of lying to an FBI agent about Gasper's role in purchasing the Florida condo in 1998.

Gasper testified that after a clandestine meeting with the brokers in the fall of 1996 at Mohican State Park near Perrysville, he and his former girlfriend picked out the $345,000 condo in Islamorada, Fla., for their personal use and that the brokers paid for it.

In return, Gasper said he ensured that the brokers received the maximum amount of commissions for stock trades, as well as fees from solicitation agreements that the brokers had with outside money managers who received bureau funding.

Prosecutors said Lewis and O'Neil split 50-50 nearly $6.8 million from the bureau from 1996-2004; it was a majority of their income during those years.

The defense maintained that the brokers' dealings with the bureau were all legitimate — making money for the agency in the process — and that the condo was an investment that they allowed Gasper and other friends and family members to use.

Synenberg and O'Neil attorney William Beyer used nearly their entire closing arguments yesterday to question the credibility of Gasper, who they say was lying to reduce his prison sentence after pleading guilty to corruption charges and agreeing to cooperate with authorities.

"So here you've got the rat in the corner," Synenberg told the jury. "A man who we now know was a habitual criminal, a man who we now know was a habitual liar, and he's cornered, and they've got him and he's smart enough to know it."

Beyer told the jury: "I submit to you that the government's case is only as strong as the foundation on which it is laid. It is a house of cards because it has to be based upon whether or not you believe Terry Gasper."

The defense called a parade of witnesses who vouched for the brokers' honesty and said that Lewis or O'Neil had offered them use of the condo. The brokers did not testify.

In her final presentation to the jury, Assistant U.S. Attorney Benita Y. Pearson said that evidence beyond Gasper's testimony supported the charges.

She pointed to the testimony of a real-estate agent in Florida who said that Gasper picked out the condo and put down the initial $500 deposit for it — money that later was returned.

"We didn't choose Mr. Gasper," Pearson said. "Had we our choice, we'd have nuns and priests as our witnesses. Unfortunately, that wasn't an opportunity that was provided to us here. However, the defendants did choose Mr. Gasper."

Gasper, who pleaded guilty to both state and federal charges in June for trading bureau business for thousands of dollars in gifts and favors, has yet to be sentenced.

Ex-driver's License Examiner Sentenced (MURFP)

By Lisa Marchesoni

Murfreesboro Post, November 22, 2006

One former driver's license examiner in Rutherford County was sentenced Monday to 19 months in prison and two years of supervised probation after his release, a federal prosecutor said.

Ex-examiner Bruce Conklin of Murfreesboro pleaded guilty in July to accepting more than $30,000 in bribes in connection with his job. He pleaded guilty to one conspiracy count that included allegations of providing driver licenses illegally in exchange for bribes and one count of accepting bribes.

Conklin accepted bribes from Winchester Driving School located next to the driver's testing center on Samsonite Boulevard.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Brad Hester, who prosecuted the case with assistant U.S. Attorney Hilliard Hester, said Conklin will enter the federal prison system. There are no federal prisons in Tennessee.

Conklin and five other people were charged in January in a six-count federal indictment as part of the 18-month Operation Crooked Highway probe.

Driving school employees paid the examiners to obtain driver's licenses and one-year driving certificates of driving for immigrants at the school who didn't complete the required 36 hours of training or had questionable documents about citizenship.

Conklin began working as an examiner June 16, 1999. Co-defendant Teresa Jones worked from Aug. 16, 2004 to March 16, 2005.

A federal jury convicted Jones Nov. 2 on charges of bribery, conspiracy to commit bribery and making false statements to the FBI. She faces 20 years in prison when sentenced Jan. 12.

Bryan Guess, owner and operator of the Winchester Driving School, pleaded guilty previously to three counts of public corruption by paying bribes to driver's license examiners.

He was sentenced last week to six years in prison.

Sheila Robertson, a driving school employee from July 2003 to March 2005, was convicted of paying the bribes along with Guess. She was sentenced to three years probation and 12 months of home detention as part of her probation.

The FBI, Internal Revenue Service, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents and the Department of Safety investigated the case.

Authorities Charge Man With 1989 Slaying (WP/AP)

The Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- Authorities have charged a white man with murder and ethnic intimidation in the shooting of a black man 17 years ago.

Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident before dawn Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said Tuesday. Gibison is also charged with conspiracy and a firearms violation in the killing of 34-year-old Aaron Wood of Philadelphia on April 16, 1989.

Wood was found about a half-mile from his home in North Philadelphia, Williams said.

She would not disclose details on what led to authorities to Gibison, but said a warrant for his arrest was issued Nov. 3. He was arrested by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents and members of the federal bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Del. Man Is Arrested In 1989 Hate-crime Slaying (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 22, 2006

A joint task force of local and federal investigators arrested a white man they believe is responsible for the shooting death of a black man in a hate crime in North Philadelphia 17 years ago, the FBI announced yesterday.

Thomas Gibison, 35, was arrested without incident around 5 a.m. Nov. 7 at his home in Newark, Del., said FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams.

In addition to murder, Gibison is charged with conspiracy, firearms violations and ethnic intimidation.

The charges, Williams said, were the result of an intense investigation into the death of Aaron Wood, a 34-year-old man who was shot to death in the 1300 block of Stillman Street shortly before 1 a.m. April 16, 1989.

Law enforcement officials said they could not disclose specific details related to the killing or the exact details of what led authorities to Gibison.

Sgt. William Britt, of the Philadelphia Police Department's Special Investigations Division of the Homicide Unit, said: "It is most certainly a racially motivated crime," but he did not elaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0097323

Britt said also that information had become known in the last year that led the District Attorney's Office to convene a grand jury.

An arrest warrant was issued for Gibison on Nov. 3. He was captured by a task force that included Philadelphia authorities, FBI agents, and members of the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Britt said Wood's family had been notified.

Gibison, who was being held in Philadelphia, has a status hearing scheduled for next Wednesday, Williams said.

Gibison's public defender could not immediately be located.

Gibison, according to court records, has a long list of offenses dating back several years.

As a minor, according to the records, Gibison was charged with burglary, criminal mischief, assault and unlawful imprisonment.

In January 1996, according to court documents, Gibison pleaded guilty to firearms violations, including being in possession of 15 firearms, one of them a 12-gauge "street sweeper" shotgun.

The records also indicated that a prosecutor in a case involving Gibison had introduced evidence that he was a skinhead.

SEC Wins Asset Freeze Vs. Hedge Fund (HC/AP)

The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, November 22, 2006

TOOLS

WASHINGTON — The Securities and Exchange Commission said on Tuesday that a federal judge has agreed to freeze the assets of a New York hedge fund manager accused of bilking investors out of millions of dollars.

Spiro Germenis, the hedge fund manager, has been accused of diverting money from Oracle Services Inc. and Oracle Evolution LLC for his own use. He has fled to Greece, according to the SEC.

His attorney couldn't immediately be located for comment.

"We're aware that an investigation by the U.S. attorney's office and the FBI is ongoing in addition to the SEC action that was just filed," said Zachary Margulis-Ohnuma, an attorney for Germenis's wife, Maria Germenis. He said that Mrs. Germenis was "doing every thing she can to cooperate with the authorities."

Two Men Face Charges In Theft Of Laptops (MH)

By Larry Lebowitz

The Miami Herald, November 22, 2006

Authorities investigating the July theft of a federal agent's laptop containing the sensitive personal information of 133,000 Floridians, believe they have broken up a ring of computer thieves who may be responsible for its disappearance.

Two men are facing charges related to the theft of other laptops from vehicles near the Latin American Grill in Doral, where the agent's laptop was stolen from his parked sport-utility vehicle on July 27.

The laptop, which has not been recovered, contained investigative files including the Social Security numbers, addresses and birthdates of more than 133,000 Florida commercial truckers, pilots and drivers license holders.

The U.S. Department of Transportation Office of Inspector General, which employed the agent whose laptop disappeared, said it has found no evidence of credit fraud or identity theft since the laptop's disappearance.

The agent, who was never identified, subsequently resigned.

Suspects Juan Esteban Calle, 25, and Carlos Andres Leon, 26, were arrested during an extensive surveillance operation by DOT inspector general, the FBI and Miami-Dade police at Doral area restaurant parking lots -- including the same restaurant where the agent's laptop disappeared.

With video cameras rolling, Calle used a lock-punching device similar to the one used in the DOT theft to open a passenger-side door and steal a decoy laptop with a tracking device attached.

Based on those arrests, officials said they uncovered a theft ring that specialized in stealing laptops, loading new operating systems onto them and then selling them on the used-computer market, mainly to high school students.

Adding the new systems essentially masked the data previously on the computer hard drives, the DOT inspector general's office said.

"The ring did not target the data and did not even attempt to access the data on the laptops they stole," according to the DOT inspector general's statement.

Calle faces trial Dec. 4 on federal charges of stealing U.S. property. He has pleaded not guilty and is being held without bail.

DOJ_NMG_0097324

Leon has pleaded not guilty to state charges of attempted burglary and criminal mischief. He is free on $6,000 bail pending trial next week.

A second DOT inspector general's laptop that disappeared from an Orlando hotel conference room in April is still missing. That computer, belonging to former supervisor Barbara L. Barnet, contained personal information on 9,500 Floridians.

DOT Says Suspects In Custody, No ID Theft From Stolen Laptops (AP)

By Curt Anderson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

Two suspects have been arrested in the July theft of a U.S. government laptop computer containing sensitive information about more than 130,000 people and authorities said Tuesday it appears that no data breaches have occurred.

The U.S. Department of Transportation's Office of Inspector General said the suspects were arrested during a surveillance operation with the FBI and local police of a Miami-area Latin American Grill restaurant parking lot where the original DOT laptop was stolen from a government agent's vehicle on July 27.

Based on those arrests, officials said they uncovered a computer theft ring operating in the area that specialized in stealing laptops, loading new operating systems onto them and then selling them on the used-computer market mainly to high school students. Adding the new systems essentially masked the data previously on the computer hard drives.

"The ring did not target the data and did not even attempt to access the data on the laptops they stole," the DOT inspector general's office said in a statement.

The statement said that during the surveillance operation, one of the suspects used a device similar to that used in the DOT theft to "punch" open a lock on a passenger side door and steal a decoy laptop. The theft was caught on video.

Juan Esteban Calle, 25, faces trial Dec. 4 on federal charges of stealing U.S. property. Calle has pleaded not guilty and is being held without bail. The other suspect, 26-year-old Carlos Andres Leon, has pleaded not guilty to state charges of attempted burglary and criminal mischief. Leon is free on $6,000 bail pending trial.

The original stolen laptop has not been recovered. It contained information such as names, Social Security numbers and birthdates for about 133,000 Florida drivers license holders, pilots and commercial truck drivers.

The inspector general's statement said no evidence of credit fraud had occurred since the laptop went missing. But the agency also has contracted with a data breach analysis firm, ID Analytics Inc. of San Diego, to determine whether identity theft is occurring and how any data might be used.

A second DOT inspector general's office laptop was also stolen during a hotel conference in Orlando in April. It contained sensitive information on about 9,500 individuals, all of whom were on the stolen Miami laptop as well.

The Orlando investigation has made less headway and is continuing, the inspector general's office said. A final report on both thefts is expected by the end of this year.

Key Witness In Polygamist's Trial Describes ‘darkest Time' (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner

USA Today, November 22, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah — In tearful testimony, the lead prosecution witness against polygamist church leader Warren Jeffs said Tuesday that she was threatened with banishment if she did not marry her cousin at age 14.

The woman, now 20 and married to a different man, described being coerced by Jeffs and other leaders of the religious sect during a preliminary hearing. “This was the darkest time in my entire life.”

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging the marriage between the witness and her 19-year-old cousin. A judge must decide whether there is probable cause for a trial.

Jeffs, who sat nearly motionless at the hearing, is leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints (FLDS), which allows polygamy. The fundamentalist church was founded more than a century ago in defiance of the mainstream Mormon church's ban on polygamy.

The woman said she pleaded with Jeffs and others, weeping as she was fitted for the wedding dress and refusing to say the marriage vow until her mother joined those pressuring her.

Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband.

During cross-examination, defense attorney Tara Isaacson sought to portray the woman as a willing participant in the wedding and argued that Jeffs did not know the couple had sex.

DOJ_NMG_0097325

Isaacson introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from the girl's journal, in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage.

The woman testified that the entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner.

Isaacson also noted that the witness has filed a civil suit against Jeffs, suggesting that the criminal case was initiated for monetary gain. The woman denied that, saying she turned to authorities so other FLDS children would not be victimized. “It is my worst nightmare that my sisters will go through what I went through,” she said.

The Nevada marriage in 2001 was a “spiritual” bond not sanctioned by the state. The woman said she repeatedly tried to reject sexual overtures, to no avail. The couple separated in the fall of 2004.

USA TODAY does not identify alleged victims of sexual assault.

The woman, no longer with the church, married a man who she said rescued her from the FLDS. She is pregnant with his child.

Utah and Arizona prosecutors began a legal assault on the FLDS and Jeffs two years ago amid reports of child marriages, the banishment of teenage boys and financial abuses. Jeff's became a fugitive after his indictments in Arizona and Utah. He was arrested in August by a Nevada state trooper during a routine traffic stop.

Bride Felt 'Trapped And Defeated' In Arranged Marriage (SDUT/AP)

By Jennifer Dobner And Paul Foy, Associated Press

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 22, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah – A woman who claims she was forced at 14 to marry a cousin called it the “darkest time of my entire life,” telling a judge Tuesday that she agreed to a quick “peck” of a kiss before locking herself in a bathroom.

The ceremony at a Nevada motel in 2001 was “one of the most painful things I've ever been through. I just want to move on with my life and forget it happened,” the woman, now 20, testified.

She is the key witness in the case against Warren Jeffs, leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Jeffs, 50, is charged with two counts of rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in arranging the marriage between her and a 19-year-old man. A judge must decide whether there is probable cause to send Jeffs to trial.

Prosecutors completed their case Tuesday, and 5th District Judge James Shumate said the preliminary hearing would resume Dec. 14. Jeffs' defense team plans to call two witnesses, including the woman's current husband.

On Tuesday, one of Jeffs' lawyers introduced photographs of a smiling, laughing couple and got the woman to acknowledge Jeffs never explicitly ordered her to have sex with her new husband.

The lawyer, Tara L. Isaacson, also introduced sweetheart notes the couple had traded and quoted from girl's journal in which she expressed enthusiasm about being singled out for marriage. The woman testified that the journal entry was written before she learned the identity of her partner.

“Was every day with (the husband) miserable?” Isaacson asked.

“Many of them were,” the woman said.

Faithful church members revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to obey his every command, including marriage instructions, she testified.

“This was the darkest time of my entire life,” she said.

She said she refused to say “I do,” take her groom's hand or kiss him. Finally, she relented, submitting to a peck and then locking herself in the bathroom.

“I felt completely trapped and defeated,” said the woman, who has left the FLDS church. The Associated Press does not identify victims of sexual assault.

Jeffs' defense team has said he is being persecuted for his religious beliefs.

Looking gaunt and pale in a dark gray suit, Jeffs smiled slightly throughout most of the hearing, which included testimony from two of the woman's sisters.

The FLDS church practices polygamy and represents itself as an offshoot of the mainstream Mormon church, based in Salt Lake City. The Mormons, however, disavow any connection and renounced polygamy in 1890 as a condition of statehood.

Prosecutors allege Jeffs forced the woman into the marriage despite her repeated objections. They say he told her it was her religious duty to submit to the marriage and to produce children.

Raised in the faith since birth, Jeffs' accuser said she felt a heavy responsibility to “the entire community” in the days leading to the marriage ceremony.

“I was scared. I didn't have any place to go,” said the woman, who is married to a different man now and due to deliver a baby in two weeks. “I felt that if I didn't do what I was told, I would forever pay the consequences.”

DOJ_NMG_0097326

Based in the small border communities of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz., the FLDS practices arranged marriage for young girls and believes plural marriage secures exaltation in heaven. There are an estimated 10,000 members.

Security at the Washington County courthouse was extraordinary Tuesday, with police sharpshooters posted on the red rock hills that ring the building. No vehicles were allowed to park on the street.

FLDS Marriage A 'misery' (SLT)

By Brooke Adams, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, November 22, 2006

Women testify Jeffs compelled teens to wed older men

ST. GEORGE - For more than four hours Tuesday, Jane Doe IV testified about her unwanted marriage to a cousin and her attempts to get polygamous sect leader Warren S. Jeffs to release her from the union.

But Doe also admitted she never explicitly accused her husband of rape in those conversations with Jeffs.

"I said to Warren he was touching me and doing things I didn't like," said Doe, now 20. "I didn't tell anybody I was being raped."

Testimony by Doe and two of her sisters Tuesday provided the most detailed account yet of what allegedly happened in 2001 when she was married at 14 to a 19-year-old cousin - but also raised questions about her motives, character and her claims of rape.

Fifth District Judge James L. Shumate continued the hearing until Dec. 14, when he will decide whether there is sufficient evidence to order Jeffs to trial on two first-degree felony charges of being an accomplice to rape.

The charges, punishable by up to life in prison, stem from counsel Jeffs gave Doe to proceed with the assigned marriage and subsequently officiating over it and advising her to remain in the union.

Jeffs was arrested Aug. 28 during a traffic stop on Interstate 15 outside Las Vegas, ending his 15 months as a fugitive. He has been in the Purgatory Correctional Facility since Sept. 5.

He appeared more gaunt, his suit hanging on his tall frame and his face drawn. As he entered the courtroom in the morning, he exchanged smiles with 10 FLDS members - among them Hildale City Councilman Lamar Johnson, Sam Roundy Sr. and his half-brother Joseph Jeffs - who attended the hearing.

Jeffs sat motionless, flanked by attorneys Wally Bugden and Tara Isaacson of Salt Lake and Richard Wright of Las Vegas, calmly watching as Doe and her two sisters testified.

Doe said she learned from her stepfather, Fred Jessop, she was to be married, an assignment her sister Rebecca Musser said Jessop had pushed.

Her shock at the news deepened, Doe said, when she learned she was to be married to a cousin she described as a name-calling bully.

Her pleas to stop or put off the marriage were ignored by Jessop, her mother and Jeffs, she said. Doe acquiesced in the end because she considered the union a revelation passed by God to Rulon Jeffs, the aging president and prophet of the FLDS church.

Rebecca Musser, Doe's older sister, said she was 19 when she became a plural wife of Rulon T. Jeffs in 1995; Rulon Jeffs, then leader of the FLDS church, was 83.

Musser said Rulon Jeffs was incapacitated by a stroke in 1997 and, by the time of her sister's wedding, Warren was making decisions for his father.

The wedding took place in a motel in Caliente, Nev., with Warren Jeffs officiating, Doe said, adding that she wept for hours before and was all but speechless during the ceremony.

Weeping again on the stand, Doe said, "This was the darkest time of my entire life, one of the most painful things I've ever been through."

The marriage was consummated about a month later, said Doe, much to her shock.

She described herself as miserable throughout the 3 1/2 -year union, and unhappiness drove her to meet with or phone Jeffs five times seeking release.

At one meeting, Jeffs gave her a book called In Truth and Light, a compilation of biblical, Mormon and FLDS teachings about marriage and child-rearing.

Theresa Blackmore, a sister, said Doe looked like a "body with no soul" in the months after the wedding and "there was never a time she was happy about the marriage, ever."

Prosecutors focused on Doe's understanding of FLDS teachings about dutiful wives who are obedient and told to "keep sweet."

DOJ_NMG_0097327

Bugden and Isaacson countered that with passages from Jeffs' lessons and sermons in which he counsels FLDS faithful to be loving, kind and respectful - even advising them, in the words of a another religious leader, to treat their wives like "angels of God."

"This is something that was taught, but actions are different," Doe said.

Isaacson took most of the afternoon to carefully challenge Doe's reluctance to marry, her description of her husband's actions and her efforts to get out of the union.

She said Doe described her marriage as "all misery," but appeared to be smiling beside her husband in numerous photos taken during their marriage. Doe replied that she was faking it.

Isaacson also noted an entry in the young Doe's journal in which the girl, about a week before her marriage, pleaded with God for a husband.

Isaacson recounted statements Doe made to investigators about her poor treatment of her husband and asked her about love notes he had written to her.

Doe said she "sugared it up" at times, initiating and participating in sex with her husband to gain his favor during portions of their 3 1/2 -year union.

But, Doe said Tuesday, "I never wanted it."

Doe acknowledged Jeffs never explicitly told her to engage in sexual intercourse with her husband and said she used vague language to describe intimate acts she found unappealing.

Even when her mother-in-law questioned whether she was being treated well and advised her she could "say no," Doe never spoke out, Isaacson said.

Doe said her husband never forced her to have sexual relations but that "things happened between [them] that I didn't agree with."

Doe admitted that despite her unhappiness, she never sought help with leaving from sisters or her biological father or brothers who had left the faith and lived in Salt Lake City, where she also lived until moving to Hildale at age 13.

"That was never an option for me," Doe said.

Doe said she tried to make the marriage work but by 2003 had taken to living in her truck to avoid her husband.

That fall, she had also met "a gentleman I had decided to spend my life with," the man who is now her husband. Her first marriage collapsed, she acknowledged, after her husband found a receipt for condoms and a photograph of a trip she had taken with the boyfriend to Las Vegas.

"This all happened while you said you were trapped in Hildale," Isaacson told Doe.

In November 2004, Doe and her husband were called to a meeting with FLDS leaders; Jeffs, participating by telephone, expelled Doe from the faith.

She left the community that night with her boyfriend, pregnant with his child.

Isaacson also questioned Doe's motives in filing criminal charges against Jeffs, saying the allegations came only after she sued him.

Doe said she decided to participate in the criminal case because "I wanted to help other girls who were in the same situation."

Preliminary Hearing Starts In Case Against Polygamist (NYT)

By John Dougherty

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

ST. GEORGE, Utah, Nov. 21 — Appearing frail and gaunt, Warren S. Jeffs, the fundamentalist Mormon polygamist leader, appeared in court on Tuesday and heard testimony from a prosecution witness who said he had “spiritually” married her when she was 14 to her first cousin, who was then 19.

The witness, now 20, testified in a preliminary hearing that Mr. Jeffs, other religious leaders and her mother coerced her into marrying her cousin in a secret wedding ceremony conducted by Mr. Jeffs in Caliente, Nev., on April 14, 2001. She said she had never been wed to the man in a civil ceremony and had never received a state marriage license.

Mr. Jeffs is charged with two felony counts of rape as an accomplice in connection with performing the religious marriage and directing the couple to have sexual intercourse against the will of the teenage girl. If convicted, Mr. Jeffs could be sentenced to life in prison.

The witness said she had been given less than a week’s notice that she had been selected for marriage by leaders of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

DOJ_NMG_0097328

That group broke from the mainstream Mormon Church more than 110 years ago over the issue of polygamy. The Mormon Church, based in Salt Lake City, which embraced polygamy in the 19th century, now excommunicates any member who practices plural marriage.

The witness testified she had learned only a few days before the wedding the identity of her prospective husband.

"I was horrified when I finally realized who I was to marry," she said. "I was devastated."

Mr. Jeffs, 50, has been held in the Purgatory Jail in Washington County since his arrest on Aug. 28 after a traffic stop by the Nevada police northeast of Las Vegas.

He sat erect and stone-faced throughout the daylong proceeding, showing little reaction to testimony by the witness and two of her sisters.

The woman testified that she was first told she had been selected for marriage by a bishop of the group, Fred M. Jessop. She added that she had immediately called Mr. Jeffs and asked for a meeting with him and Mr. Jeffs's father, Rulon T. Jeffs. Both Fred Jessop and Rulon Jeffs have since died.

The woman testified that she had told Warren Jeffs that she did not want to be married. At the time of the conversation, Rulon Jeffs had suffered a series of strokes and his son was handling most of the church affairs.

The witness said she had told Mr. Jeffs: "I need some time to grow up. I'm not prepared for this responsibility, and I'm not ready to marry my cousin."

She said Mr. Jeffs had told her that her marriage to her cousin "was a revelation from God" and ordered her to prepare for the wedding.

She also testified that she had been afraid to disobey the orders of religious leaders because she believed her "salvation" was at stake. She testified that even if she had wanted to flee, she had had no means to escape.

Mr. Jeffs's lawyer, Walter F. Bugden Jr., told the news media after the hearing that the state was conducting "religious persecution" and predicted that Mr. Jeffs would be acquitted.

"There is no rape in this case," Mr. Bugden said. "Officiating at a wedding ceremony does not make Mr. Jeffs an accomplice to rape."

Judge James L. Shumate of the Fifth District Court said the hearing would continue Dec. 14.

Religion Key Witness Testifies In Case Against Polygamist (NPR)

By Michele Norris And Howard Berkes

NPR's All Things Considered, November 22, 2006

A young woman who says polygamist leader Warren Jeffs forced her to marry -- and have sex -- at age 14 offered dramatic testimony Tuesday in a courtroom in St. George, Utah.

Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, or FLDS Church. He's charged in Utah with two counts of "rape as an accomplice."

Tuesday's hearing was to determine whether the case will go to trial. It was the first time that Jeffs faced his accuser, the young woman who is the primary witness against him. NPR does not name alleged victims of sexual assaults.

She was 14, she told the court, when Jeffs ordered her into a "spiritual marriage" with her first cousin, a 19-year-old at the time, and then forced her to have sex with him. Such marriages are not legally recognized. Jeffs allegedly told the woman her salvation depended on her compliance.

In court, the young woman sobbed, cried and dabbed at tears as Jess watched her dispassionately. She described learning of her spiritual marriage, and said she was horrified and resisted. She also described the horror of her husband trying to consummate their marriage, which eventually he did.

The defense cross-examined Jess' accuser, showing photos of the couple smiling together. Defense lawyers also read from love notes her husband is said to have sent to the accuser. They also said that Jeffs gave the young woman religious advice and direction consistent with the tenets of his faith.

The hearing took place about 40 miles from the twin communities Jeffs and his group dominate. About 6,000 followers live in the border towns of Hildale, Utah, and Colorado City, Ariz. Jeffs and some of his followers also face charges in Arizona.

Some Curbs On Sex Offenders Called Ineffective, Inhumane (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

As convicted sex offenders go, they seem to pose little danger.

One is 100 years old. Another can barely walk and is in the late stages of Alzheimer's disease. Another is dying of heart disease in a nursing home.

DOJ_NMG_0097329

Yet under a new Georgia law, thousands of registered sex offenders, even the old and feeble, could be pushed from their homes and hospices.

"He doesn't really know anything about it," said Ruby Anderson, 77, whose husband was convicted of having sex with a minor in 1997 and, at 81, no longer recognizes members of his family because of Alzheimer's disease. "The trouble is, I just don't know where we can go."

As states around the country have sought in recent years to control the whereabouts of convicted sex offenders, Georgia's law stands out as one of the toughest, a testament to the daunting public fears regarding children's safety.

The roughly 10,000 sex offenders living in Georgia have been forbidden to live within 1,000 feet of a school, playground, church or school bus stop. Taken together, the prohibitions place nearly all the homes in some counties off-limits -- amounting, in a practical sense, to banishment.

"My intent personally is to make it so onerous on those that are convicted of these offenses . . . they will want to move to another state," Georgia House Majority Leader Jerry Keen (R), who sponsored the bill, told reporters.

Since the law's enactment in July, however, a federal judge, human rights advocates and even some of the sheriff's departments that are supposed to enforce the measure have suggested that the zeal for safety may have gone too far.

The residency law applies not only to sexual predators but to all people registered for sexual crimes, including men and women convicted of having underage consensual sex while in high school.

Advocates for the sex offenders say the law is unfair to people who have served their sentences and been deemed rehabilitated. Many police officers, prosecutors and children's advocates also question whether such measures are effective. Most predators are mobile, after all, and by upending their lives, the law may make them more likely to commit other offenses, critics say.

"We should be concerned when we pass laws for political purposes that are irrational," said Sarah Geraghty, a staff lawyer for the Southern Center for Human Rights, the Atlanta-based group that filed court actions against the law's provisions. "This law will essentially render thousands of ex-offenders homeless, and that's just going to make them harder to monitor."

Besides the practical complications, she said, "forcing a terminally ill man to leave his hospice . . . shocks the conscience."

Exactly what to do with convicted sex offenders once they return to the community has been the focus of growing national attention.

Before 1994, only a handful of states required offenders to register their addresses with police. Now all 50 states do, as does the District.

Those lists have focused attention on where the sex offenders live, and as of this summer, 17 states had imposed residency requirements for them, according to research by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

This month, Californians voted to bar sex offenders from living within 2,000 feet of schools or parks -- though a federal judge quickly blocked that provision.

In Iowa, which in 2002 became one of the first states to impose residency restrictions, police and prosecutors have united in opposition to the law, saying that it drives offenders underground and that there is "no demonstrated protective effect," according to a statement by the Iowa County Attorneys Association, which represents prosecutors.

"The law was well-intentioned, but we don't see any evidence of a connection between where a person lives and where they might offend," said Corwin R. Ritchie, executive director of the group.

Enforcing the law consumes lots of law enforcement time, he said, and leads some offenders to list interstate rest stops or Wal-Mart parking lots as their addresses.

"Our concern is that these laws may give a false sense of security," said Carolyn Atwell-Davis, director of legislative affairs for the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. "We're not aware of any evidence that residency restrictions have prevented a child from being victimized."

Much of the public fear surrounding sex offenders has arisen from the perception that most commit another offense. But that idea is a "myth," according to the Center for Sex Offender Management, an affiliate of the Justice Department.

Child molesters have a 13 percent reconviction rate for sexual offenses, according to research cited by the group, and rapists have a 19 percent reconviction rate for sexual offenses. Concrete measures of recidivism are difficult to come by, however, because most researchers believe that crimes against children are underreported.

Even amid all the restrictions imposed by states, Georgia's attempt to control the sex offender population stood out.

Among those swept up under its definition of sex offender are a 26-year-old woman who was caught engaging in oral sex when she was in high school, and a mother of five who was convicted of being a party to a crime of statutory rape because, her indictment alleged, she did not do enough to stop her 15-year-old daughter's sexual activity.

Moreover, by prohibiting sex offenders from living within 1,000 feet of school bus stops, the law would force all or nearly all the offenders living in some counties to move.

DOJ_NMG_0097330

That provision has been suspended, pending a federal court case. A consent order has temporarily halted the evictions of six elderly and disabled sex offenders, including Ruby Anderson's husband, Daniel.

But even without the bus stop provision, 78 of 129 registered sex offenders in Houston County, where the Andersons live, were required to move, according to the sheriff's department there.

Keen and other advocates have defended the legislation, calling it above all an effort to protect children.

"We felt if we were going to err on any side, we were going to err on the side of protecting the innocent rather than those who have already been convicted," he said.

He has no plans to alter it. As for those who feel it unfairly targets them, he said they can petition the local school board to move the bus stop.

Although the legal actions have focused attention on the rights of convicted sex offenders, he noted, the victims "have been given a life sentence."

"There's not a day goes by, if you pick up a newspaper or turn on the TV, that you don't see these crimes continue to happen," he said.

For those affected by the law, however, it seems to have reached too far.

"Every other block, there's a church," Ruby Anderson said. "Where can we go? I've checked."

Her husband, who was a janitor, was charged with statutory rape in 1996 for having sex with a girl younger than 14. He pleaded guilty on one count and was sentenced to probation, according to Houston County court records.

"At this late date for him, the law is very unfair," Ruby Anderson said. "He doesn't have any recollection of what happened."

FBI Opens Corruption Hot Line (PPG)

By Paula Reed Ward, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 22, 2006

In an effort to combat public corruption in Western Pennsylvania, the FBI has established a telephone hot line that people can call to file complaints of possible abuse by elected and appointed officials.

Tips via the FBI's line -- at 412-432-4722 -- can be made anonymously; they will be followed up on by investigators.

Public corruption has been stated as one of the highest priorities of the U.S. Department of Justice.

"We look forward to working with the citizens of Western Pennsylvania to root out corruption and restore credibility at all levels of government," said U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan.

FBI Subpoena Targets Records Of Grant Agency (NTP)

By Gordon Russell,

New Orleans Times-Picayune, November 22, 2006

Now-defunct state office oversaw charities linked to lawmakers

BATON ROUGE -- A state office that oversaw a series of controversial charities tied to African-American legislators is being scrutinized by the FBI, Gov. Kathleen Blanco's office confirmed Tuesday in announcing that it had complied with a subpoena for records from the department.

"The governor's office staff has complied with the FBI's request for information dating back to 1996 regarding certain programs funded by the former Office of Urban Affairs," Blanco's office said in a prepared statement.

The governor's office confirmed receipt of the subpoena Tuesday after a reporter inquired about it.

Before it was abolished earlier this year, the Office of Urban Affairs was in charge of overseeing grants to nonprofit agencies in the districts of black lawmakers. Critics commonly derided the grants -- and similar money doled out to rural districts -- as legislative "slush funds" that governors could use as an incentive to get reluctant legislators to vote their way.

Blanco's office refused to turn over a copy of the subpoena or divulge details about its contents, citing federal secrecy rules that bar such disclosures.

"Thursday, Nov. 16, staff members provided the documents requested and outlined the general operation of the office," Blanco's office said. "The governor's office is continuing to cooperate in this matter."

A source in the governor's office said the records that were turned over date back only to 2001, as earlier documents have already been destroyed.

Charities tied to Jefferson

It's unclear what the FBI is looking for. But earlier this year, James Bernazzani, the special agent in charge of the FBI's New Orleans field office, announced his intention to investigate two charities that were financed by the Office of Urban Affairs. Both of the groups -- Care Unlimited and Orleans Metropolitan Housing & Community Development -- have longtime ties to U.S. Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans.

The agencies attracted attention after former New Orleans City Councilwoman Renee Gill Pratt provided them with four vehicles that had been donated to the city after Hurricane Katrina.

Taping Police Sessions Urged (BSUN)

By Brent Jones, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 22, 2006

City Council bill would require video of interrogations

The Baltimore City Council is reviewing a bill that would require the videotaping of police interrogations of witnesses or suspects in violent crimes -- a measure opposed by police but endorsed by public defenders who represent suspected criminals.

Councilman James B. Kraft, chairman of the council's public safety subcommittee, said he introduced the legislation because he believes it would decrease the number of allegations of improper behavior by police officers. Kraft said a video would protect officers against false charges, and witnesses against intimidation or illegal questioning.

Representatives of the Police Department -- who say they generally record statements but do not use video -- said at a hearing Tuesday that they have doubts about using cameras, and one high-ranking detective called it "costly" and potentially harmful for prosecutors.

Col. Fred H. Bealefeld III, chief of detectives, said at the hearing that his department is studying a video system used in Chicago. Bealefeld said it cost that department millions of dollars to install and run the cameras in interrogation rooms.

But the Office of the Public Defender dismissed the cost issue and praised the proposal, saying it could be a significant development in criminal proceedings.

"From our perspective in the defense field, what it does is show you things you would not be privy to when somebody gets on the stand and testifies," said Deputy Public Defender Nancy S. Forster. "You look on video and can see if police coerce it out of them or trick it out of them. It allows us to question the credibility of the police officer. It also makes certain that the entirety is taped."

Del. Samuel I. "Sandy" Rosenberg has urged the General Assembly to pass similar legislation the past two years, but without success.

Rosenberg, reached by phone, said he understands such a system might be costly for local government.

"But you're talking about a matter of justice," Rosenberg said. "On a scale, that gives a greater weight than the cost."

During the hearing, police officials asked for time to study the feasibility of video-recorded investigations, a request backed by the city state's attorney's office.

Deputy State's Attorney Cynthia Jones said her office needs more information to determine the legal challenges that videotaped testimony could present.

The subject was first broached in September when Council President Sheila Dixon introduced a resolution inviting Commissioner Leonard D. Hamm to explain his department's policy.

"From our office's perspective, the thing we're looking for are the nuts and bolts of the legalities of having these custodial investigations," Jones said. "I think President Dixon putting this out there is based on calls she's getting from the public.

"It's a process. But before you say you're going to do it, you better know the pluses and minuses," she said.

Jones also questioned whether the city has the right to enact such legislation, echoing a comment made by Kraft during the public forum.

Kraft acknowledged that he is unsure whether state law gives the City Council the authority to force the Police Department to change the way it conducts interrogations. The councilman said financing the proposal would be the biggest obstacle. "That is the real No. 1 issue," he said.

Police officials also said they feared that a camera would malfunction at an inopportune time.

"You can't just sit a camera and a microphone in a room and expect it to work," said Jordan V. Watts Jr., a lawyer for the police. "There are a lot of problems with doing that in crucial times where you need that statement to come across. If you're doing an investigation, and [a suspect] bows his head or puts his head down, and you lose those words, it can become a problem."

Kraft said he hopes the measure will pass when it is scheduled for a first vote at the next council meeting Dec. 4.

Members of the Young Leaders 4 Baltimore attended the hearing and spoke in favor of the proposal. The group has demanded a change to the Police Department's interrogations policy after allegations that a detective raped a 16-year-old girl at a district police station in July.

Members of the group said a video recording would severely reduce claims of misconduct.

"This is for the betterment of the people," said Hassan Giordano, the first to speak at the hearing. "It's for the safety of the individual and the safety of the officer."

Judge Sentences Evans To Life Without Parole (BSUN)

By Jennifer Mcmenamin, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 22, 2006

Essex man killed stepdaughter, set body on fire

A 36-year-old convicted sex offender was sentenced Tuesday to life in prison without parole for stabbing, strangling and beating to death his 13-year-old stepdaughter before setting her body and their family's Essex rowhouse on fire to cover up the killing.

Carl Preston Evans Jr., whose arrest in August 2005 highlighted problems with the state's sex offender registry, also received two consecutive 15-year prison terms, one for the at tempted murder of his infant daughter and one for arson.

Baltimore County Circuit Judge Kathleen G. Cox, who pronounced sentence, characterized the killing as "a monstrous, monstrous crime," and pointed out that nothing Evans said, either in court or to an investigator who prepared a pre-sentence report, has shed any light on the motive behind it.

"The death of any child is tragic," Cox said. "To lose a child in the circumstances of this case, it's just unthinkable."

A Baltimore County jury convicted Evans in September of first-degree murder in the death of Breaunna Floyd, who was stabbed 24 times, strangled and beaten before being doused with gasoline and set on fire.

The jury also convicted Evans of arson for setting fire to the family's row home on Foxridge Lane in Essex in July 2005 and of attempted second-degree murder for leaving then-7-month-old Mosett Evans in the burning house.

In a knapsack that Evans left in his front yard that day, police found two knives -- one broken, both bloody -- as well as a towel and T-shirt. DNA analysis indicated that the blood on all four items came from Breaunna.

With firefighters and paramedics on the way, Evans fled. He was arrested 11 days later near a relative's house in West Baltimore.

Evans told the judge that he needed to take responsibility for his actions but stopped short of acknowledging any guilt in the crimes.

"Sometimes you make some crazy mistakes," he said quietly, his voice barely audible in a courtroom filled with his wife's relatives. "It cost me big time. It cost me everything. It cost me my family, including family that's sitting here today."

One man seated in the courtroom muttered in response, "We're ain't your family."

The sentences capped a brief hearing during which relatives described the family's lingering grief over Breaunna's death. Also, Evans' attorney argued that prosecutors could not ask for a sentence of life without parole because they had not properly notified the defendant of their intention to do so.

Public defender Gary D. Schenker told the judge that although prosecutors had sent him notice, they did not send such paperwork to Evans himself, which, he said, the statute requires. The judge, however, ruled that case law seems to require written notice without specifying to whom it must be delivered.

The Rev. Hillary Gaston Sr., the uncle of Breaunna's mother, spoke in court on behalf of his relatives, telling the judge how Evans was welcomed into the family after his marriage to Kenya and characterizing the defendant's crimes as "a betrayal beyond any magnitude."

"It's very difficult," he said. "We have lost young people, but never this way."

Convicted in 1991 of raping and beating a woman at gunpoint, Evans' arrest in the killing of his stepdaughter shed light on problems with Maryland's sex offender registry. In the days after Breaunna's death, authorities discovered that Evans had failed for several years to update his address with the registry as required and that authorities did not seek him out to correct the errors.

Evans' criminal record also includes convictions for burglary and armed robbery.

During his rambling remarks to the judge, Evans expressed regret for never having explained his actions to his family.

"I do want to say I'm sorry," he said. "I brought this on my family."

But prosecutor Michael S. Fuller told the judge that Evans deserved "absolutely no consideration from this court for what he did."

"Everything he has done to this point has been a charade," he said. The prosecutor later added, "He's clearly a danger to society. He should never see the outside of prison walls again."

Greek Authorities To Pursue Felony Charges Against Former Getty Antiquities Curator (LAT)

By Nikolas Zirganos, Ralph Frammolino, And Jason Felch

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097333

ATHENS — Greek authorities have recommended that felony criminal charges be filed against former J. Paul Getty Museum antiquities curator Marion True for her role in the acquisition of a 2,500-year-old gold funerary wreath considered one of the museum's masterpieces.

The Police Headquarters of Athens announced today that the city's chief prosecutor had concluded an initial investigation with the recommendation that five unnamed people -- three foreigners and two Greek citizens — be charged with looting, selling and receiving the gold funeral adornment.

The press release did not name the individuals involved and said only that the object was purchased by a "private American museum" in 1993 for $1.15 million. A senior Greek official familiar with the case said that the museum was the Getty and that True was among the five defendants.

Under the Greek system, the case will pass to an investigating magistrate who will conduct his own investigation, a process that is expected to take weeks or months.

Neither the Getty nor True's American attorney would comment on the development.

"Any comment at this time would be premature," said Harry Stang, True's attorney in Los Angeles.

The Greek announcement comes amid negotiations between the Getty and officials from the Hellenic Ministry of Culture over the return of the wreath and a statue of a female torso, or kore.

Already this year, the Getty has returned two other objects requested by Greek officials: a 5th century BC marble relief and a 4th century BC inscribed tombstone. The tombstone, or stele, was purchased by J. Paul Getty himself in 1955.

The most valuable and culturally significant item is the golden wreath, an explosion of delicately crafted stems and leaves adorned with colored glass. Greek officials claim it could only have originated from Greek Macedonia, the homeland of Alexander the Great.

Getty Museum Director Michael Brand said late Monday the museum is still evaluating photos and other evidence supplied by Greek officials to determine whether the objects had been looted, as Greek authorities claim.

"We have not made up our minds," Brand said.

A senior official with the Ministry of Culture said that the legal proceedings against True were independent of the cultural negotiations over the disputed objects.

The Times reported last year that True first saw the ornate burial wreath in 1992, when several men claiming to represent a European collector showed it to her in a Zurich bank vault.

According to internal Getty documents, they offered the wreath for $1.6 million but True lost interest when she became convinced the men were impostors. She wrote that the piece was "too dangerous for us to be involved with."

Four months later, she changed her mind and recommended that the Getty board buy the wreath through Basel antiquities dealer Christoph Leon. A subsequent German police investigation found that Leon acted as the intermediary for a Yugoslav and two Greeks, who had been carrying the object around Europe in a cardboard box.

The Getty contacted the Greek government in 1993 about the impending purchase but ignored warnings from Greek archeological officials that the wreath, as well as the kore and marble relief, were "almost certainly" illegally excavated and smuggled out of the country.

Greek authorities made a formal request for the return of the objects in 1996. True responded by suggesting that the wreath may have come from Italy, and the dispute went unresolved, documents show.

The Culture Ministry renewed the request in May 2005. After press reports about the wreath in Greece, prosecutors in Athens ordered a criminal investigation, which resulted in today's charges.

The senior Greek official, who asked not to be identified because he is not authorized to speak about the case, said that in addition to True, the investigation recommended charges against Leon, the Basel dealer; L.J. Kovacevic, a Yugoslav national; and Georgios Tsatalis and Georgios Kagias, Greek citizens.

Greek police raided True's house on the Greek island of Paros last March and found several unregistered antiquities -- many of which were fragmentary and of little value. No charges have been filed in that case and the investigation continues.

True is on trial in Rome on charges she conspired to traffic in looted art. The Getty has spent months negotiating with Italian cultural officials about 46 disputed objects. Today, the Getty agreed to return 26 of those objects and announced that it was ending talks about the remaining 20.

Getty Museum Ceases Talks With Italy Over Antiquities (NYT)

By Hugh Eakin And Elisabetta Povoledo

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097334

In an abrupt change of course, the J. Paul Getty Museum in Los Angeles announced yesterday that it had broken off negotiations with the Italian government and made a "unilateral" decision to cede only some of the antiquities that Italy says were looted from its soil.

In a six-page letter to the Italian culture minister, Francesco Rutelli, the Getty's director, Michael Brand, said the museum had decided to turn over 26 artifacts. Referring to other treasures sought by the Italians, he said that Italy had "no valid legal claim" to a prized bronze sculpture in the Getty's collection, and that evidence regarding a limestone cult statue it wanted returned was "inconclusive."

Mr. Brand also wrote that the Getty would continue to study the cult statue, regarded by experts as possibly depicting Aphrodite, and would transfer title to Italy if new research lent weight to the country's claim that it had been illegally excavated on its territory.

The museum's move carries significant risks for the Getty. Unlike deals to return disputed art that Italy negotiated this year with the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the ceding of art by the Getty carries no guarantee of loans from Italy or other reciprocal benefits.

"We will not get anything in return unless there is a change of heart on the Italian side," Mr. Brand said in a telephone interview.

The Getty's decision follows nearly a year of tense negotiations over an Italian claim for 52 objects in the museum's collection. The claim rests largely on evidence that has emerged in the trial in Rome of Marion True, a former Getty curator, and Robert Hecht, an American art dealer, on charges of trading in illegally excavated antiquities.

In Rome, Maurizio Fiorilli, a lawyer for the Culture Ministry, said the government had not taken an official position on the Getty's move. But noting the ministry's role as a civil plaintiff in the trial, Mr. Fiorilli said the 26 objects to be yielded would be held by the Rome tribunal as evidence supporting the indictments of Ms. True and Mr. Hecht.

"If Mrs. True is found guilty, the pieces will revert to the Italian government; if she is found innocent, the Getty will decide what to do," Mr. Fiorilli said in a telephone interview yesterday. "The pieces will come to Italy not as a concession on the part of the Getty but as a seizure, the result of a procedure that is part of our legal process."

Mr. Brand said the museum's parent, the J. Paul Getty Trust, reached its decision on Monday after his return from an unsuccessful meeting on Friday with Mr. Rutelli in Rome.

An impasse emerged after an Oct. 5 meeting in Rome in which lawyers for the Getty and the Culture Ministry signed a memorandum meant to lead to a final joint agreement.

In that document, a copy of which the Getty provided to The New York Times yesterday, the museum said it intended to return 26 objects: 25 requested by Italy and an additional artifact that its own research had determined belonged to Italy. Those objects include fresco fragments acquired in the early 1970s, red-figure Attic pottery and a rare antefix. The document also said Italy was removing six other objects from the original claim of 52.

The document indicated that the Getty was preparing a formal response to the Italian claim for the bronze sculpture — a life-size Greek youth believed to date from 300 to 100 B.C. — and that Italy and the Getty could have joint title to the Aphrodite while further research on its origins was pursued.

But relations between the sides soon fell apart, with Mr. Rutelli publicly expressing "dissatisfaction" with the talks.

On Oct. 20, the Getty received a letter from a Culture Ministry lawyer "making it clear that the ministry was repudiating" the Oct. 5 document, Mr. Brand wrote in his letter to Mr. Rutelli.

After news reports this month that the ministry was preparing to break off negotiations, the museum decided that Mr. Brand should go to Rome to make what he called "a final offer": the Getty would return the 26 objects promised in the Oct. 5 document and give Italy "full title immediately" to the Aphrodite, provided that the government agreed to "undertake further title research jointly."

But in the meeting on Friday, which lasted more than three hours, this proposal was turned down, and no agreement was reached.

In his letter to Mr. Rutelli and in the interview, Mr. Brand described the October document as an "agreement" that bound the ministry "to provide a formal agreement to the Getty within 10 days."

Mr. Brand said yesterday that the ministry had reneged on that agreement by insisting on the unconditional return of the bronze and the Aphrodite and by threatening the Getty in the news media with punitive "embargoes" before it had received the museum's final assessment of Italy's claim to the disputed objects.

But Mr. Fiorilli, the ministry lawyer, said in the interview yesterday that the Oct. 5 document did not have the status of an agreement and had been signed only as the "basis of a future accord" should both parties reach a consensus in negotiations.

Giuseppe Proietti, the Culture Ministry official who signed agreements covering the return of antiquities by the Met and the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, said yesterday that he was surprised to hear that the Getty had said his ministry had repudiated anything. "That's not an accord," Mr. Proietti said of the October document.

Mr. Brand's characterization of the document contradicts his own comments to a reporter on Nov. 3 in which he described it as simply a memorandum between the parties. "It's not as though there's an almost final draft that we are just checking the situation on," he said then.

It remains unclear whether the Italian ministry will carry out its earlier threat of breaking cultural ties with the Getty, a threat it previously used in postponing antiquities loans to the museum and in trying to win back objects from other institutions like the Met.

Justice Courts For Small New York Towns To Be Overhauled (NYT)

By William Glaberson

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

ALBANY, Nov. 21 — New York's top judicial officials outlined a plan on Tuesday to begin reforming the state's 300-year-old system of town and village courts, which have been criticized for decades as outmoded, poorly supervised and unfair.

The plan, announced here by the state's chief judge, Judith S. Kaye, included changes that have been recommended for years by defense lawyers and legal experts. Among them were plans to increase training for the justices, to improve their supervision and to better monitor whether they are protecting basic legal principles like the constitutional right to a lawyer.

The courts — known as justice courts — are also to be required for the first time to keep a word-for-word record of their proceedings, like other courts in the state.

While the officials said that many town and village justices are diligent, Judge Kaye said a sweeping reform program was called for by what she called enduring concerns about the courts. The system has survived a century of calls for radical overhaul by governors and commissions, and an important legal challenge in the 1980s.

As outlined by a series of articles in The New York Times in September, the courts have survived in part because the justices — most of them not even lawyers — have longstanding and deep ties to the upstate political system, and because of the substantial cost of replacing them with more professional courts.

The plan announced on Tuesday is the most specific and ambitious effort in years to address significant parts of the system's troubled dealings.

Most of the measures, like requiring verbatim records and increasing the justices' training and monitoring, can be instituted through orders from Judge Kaye, effective immediately.

"These courts must provide the same high standard of justice the public expects and deserves from any court in New York," Judge Kaye said.

But the judiciary's plan still stopped short of calling for legislative changes in features of the justice court system that disturb critics most.

Those critics — defense lawyers and prosecutors, elected officials and legal experts — say the current threadbare system effectively leaves the state with two types of justice: a modern and professional one for the cities and a second, rudimentary and sometimes abusive one for suburban and rural areas.

The State Assembly is to begin a broad examination of the justice court system at a hearing next month. That hearing is to tackle several of the most serious concerns, like the fact that three quarters of the town and village justices are not lawyers. It will also focus on the fact that unlike all other courts in the state, these courts are financed not by the state but by towns and villages, limiting state control and often resulting in impoverished courts and justices who are paid $1,200 a year or less.

The justice courts are a sprawling system of more than 1,200 courts that are often the first—and frequently the only—stop in the state legal system for people in the 57 counties outside New York City. Dating from Colonial times, the courts occupy something of a time warp, with often poorly trained justices, sometimes convening in town firehouses or highway department garages — or their own kitchens — and dispensing a form of justice unlike any other in the state.

The courts usually handle landlord-tenant cases, small civil cases, traffic infractions and misdemeanors. Yet these courts have considerable powers to jail people, evict tenants and set bail in cases as serious as murder and rape. They handle two million cases a year and collect $210 million in fees and fines.

A state takeover of the financing of the justice courts or a requirement that the justices must be lawyers would require legislation. Judge Kaye and other court officials pointedly declined to say whether they might call for such changes in the future.

Judge Kaye said the judiciary would ask the Legislature for $10 million in next year's budget to begin making the changes announced on Tuesday, for expenses like training, recording equipment and improving the courts' physical facilities.

The judiciary's plan also outlined steps to toughen the examinations justices must pass before they take the bench, and to provide the courts with computers, fax machines, basic security devices and digital recorders to tape their proceedings.

Top court officials said they would begin a new program to require annual audits of justice courts' books, and to increase the size of a small staff of lawyers who answer justices' legal questions, usually by telephone. The officials said they would appoint supervising judges across the state to oversee the justice courts, but it was not clear how much power they are to have.

In September, The Times described many justice court cases in recent years in which defendants were jailed illegally, subjected to racial and sexual bigotry and denied fundamental guarantees, like the right to a lawyer or a trial. The articles also detailed many failed efforts over the last century to change or replace the courts.

The court officials' announcement, and a 68-page report that accompanied it, showed that court officials have chosen for the moment not to take on what could be the considerable political, financial and organizational problems that would accompany any call to overhaul or do away with the courts.

"Our focus is on what we can do now" under current law to improve the justice courts, Jonathan Lippman, the state's chief administrative judge, said. Judge Kaye has asked a state commission to study the justice courts and she said she would study its recommendations, expected early next year.

Tuesday's proposals were greeted by some lawyers and experts on the court system as long overdue. But some said that by failing to face basic issues concerning the courts, the plan seemed to leave much work to do.

"I don't understand how it is possible for them to assure the citizens they're going to get justice in these town and village courts," said Robert L. Spangenberg, a national expert on local court systems who studied the justice courts last year for a commission appointed by Judge Kaye.

Donna Lieberman, the executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, said that while the reforms suggested by Judge Kaye were welcome, "these are Band-Aids on a system that needs serious systemic reform." She said her group was considering a lawsuit to challenge the justice court system if the state did not quickly make broad reform in the courts.

David O. Fuller Jr., the president of the State Magistrates Association, the justices' organization, said the court officials' plan was a positive development. He added that the state's justices continued to believe the network of justice courts "is really a very good system" that does not require fundamental change.

The court officials' plan is to increase the classroom training for nonlawyer justices to two weeks from one and, for the first time, to require that lawyers who are elected to town and village courts receive judicial training before they take the bench.

In recommending such improvements, the report did not shy away from making clear the depth of the problems in the justice courts. The report said that some courts do not even have a judge's bench or a single court clerk. As for the current system of training nonlawyer justices, it said analysis of the results "reveals that this approach too often fails to facilitate real learning."

Laced through their remarks as well were suggestions that the court officials find the current justice court system frustrating to meaningfully oversee and police. Their report said current law gives state court officials "very little effective structural or operational control" and that this "balkanization of responsibility for the Justice Courts," is an issue New York policymakers should consider.

It observed that the legal system had grown far more complex in the 40 years since the Legislature last approved using justices who were not lawyers. Ensuring that all justices are minimally proficient in the law, it said, "is among the great challenges in New York governance."

Whistle-Blowers Bring Govt. Payback (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Whistle-blowers tipped off the government to $1.3 billion worth of fraud cases over the past year, largely at hospitals or other health care providers, the Justice Department said Tuesday.

In all, the department recovered $3.1 billion in settlements -- what prosecutors said was a record amount -- from individuals and companies during the 2006 fiscal year that ended Sept. 30.

"Many of these cases were initiated by whistle-blowers," said Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler, who oversees the department's civil division.

He called the $1.3 billion identified by whistle-blowers a recovery level "probably greater than most years, smaller than a couple." In return, whistle-blowers were paid $190 million over the year for alerting the government to the fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0097337

The single largest settlement, worth $920 million, came against Dallas-based Tenet Healthcare Corp., the nation's second-largest hospital chain. Following claims from six whistle-blowers, prosecutors accused Tenet of overbilling the government for $806 million in Medicare payments and paying $49 million in kickbacks to doctors who referred patients to the health care chain.

Tenet operates 66 hospitals in 12 states, mostly in the Southeast. Overall, fraud settlements with health care companies accounted for $2.2 billion -- more than two-thirds of the annual total.

Whistle-blowers have helped the government recover an estimated $18 billion since 1986, when Congress approved laws to strengthen their protections.

"Today, individual citizens are making the same kind of important difference in exposing fraud by those who do business with the government," said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, who helped write the laws.

Until now, the government had never recovered $3 billion or more in fraud cases, and passed the $2 billion mark for the first time in 2003, Keisler said.

The overall total also includes a $565 million settlement with Boeing Co., closing two investigations into claims that the aircraft manufacturer improperly sought and carried out contracts with the Pentagon and NASA. Additionally, two whistle-blowers led the government to the single settlement over the past year related to Iraq reconstruction contracts. Houston-based EGL Inc., a subcontractor for Kellogg, Brown & Root, paid $4 million to resolve accusations that it added fake "war risk surcharges" while billing the government. Kellogg, Brown & Root, also known as KBR, is a subsidiary of the Halliburton Co., the Houston-based oil services conglomerate.

There was no immediate total for fraud payments related to hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year.

Federal Court Favors Newspaper Group In Fight For Records (AAS)

By Rebecca Carr, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, November 22, 2006

At issue is whether data on illegal immigrants who are convicted of crimes should be released to public.

WASHINGTON — A federal court of appeals ruled Tuesday that a lower court erred in dismissing a case that sought records under the Freedom of Information Act about illegal immigrant convicts who are not deported.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ordered the trial court to settle factual disputes between Cox Newspapers, which owns the Austin American-Statesman, and the Justice Department over the privacy rights of illegal immigrants convicted of a crime. At the heart of the case is whether privacy rights outweigh the public's right to know that they have been released into the community.

"We're gratified that the judges agreed with us that the trial court shouldn't have granted the government's motion for summary judgment," said Andrew Alexander, chief of the Cox Washington bureau. Cox will confer with its lawyers to determine how to proceed, he said.

The information is essential for assessing whether the government is properly enforcing deportation laws, Alexander said.

"At its core, the case involves a bedrock American principle that citizens should have access to information that enables them to evaluate the performance of their government," he said.

The Justice Department declined to comment other than to say it would review the five-page ruling.

The department's lawyers have argued that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act request filed three years ago, including the convicts' native countries, dates taken into custody and dates of release, the legal documents show.

But personally identifiable information such as full names, dates of birth, alien registration numbers and FBI numbers would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs.

Benjamin Johnson, director of the Immigration Policy Center, an immigrant advocacy group, said the public has the right to know the dysfunctions of the immigration system and how it might be failing. But that does not mean it should release personal information, because immigration officials make mistakes, he said.

Other immigrant groups have said they support the release of such information.

An improving economy isn't good news for everyone. With fewer businesses going broke, the pace of traditional work for bankruptcy lawyers has slowed considerably -- for now.

Industry experts say a big reason is because money is flowing more freely -- especially from hedge funds and private equity groups -- to keep businesses afloat that might have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in leaner times.

But bankruptcy lawyers are evolving, and some even say the rivers of money may run dry in the near future -- possibly during the next economic downturn.

"There has never been liquidity like this before -- never close to it in my 32 years," said Frederick Holden Jr., a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's bankruptcy and debt restructuring practice group in San Francisco. "I hope for everyone that it doesn't cause any problems, but it seems unlikely."

Holden, who launched his career as a bankruptcy lawyer during the mid-1970s recession, said money alone can't solve the problems that failing businesses are facing.

"Now you have a lot of hedge funds coming in buying debt," he said. "That's all wonderful for the company, but if the company keeps losing money, that can only go on for so long."

Legal recruiter Lawrence Mullman said some firms are planning for just that. Though bankruptcy lawyers aren't flying off the shelf like IP or corporate lawyers, there is some interest, he said. Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom and Kirkland & Ellis are among the firms beefing up their bankruptcy practices, according to the The National Law Journal.

"The demand is less, but some firms see what's coming and are looking to make some strategic hires," said Mullman, who works out of New York. "I think that they recognize that the cycle is going to begin again."

While not a universally held belief, Holden and several other bankruptcy lawyers told The Recorder they expect to see more Chapter 11s filed by late 2007.

It would certainly be better for business, because in the last two years filings have dropped dramatically. In the 2004 fiscal year, a total of 10,113 businesses filed for Chapter 11 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court. In 2005, 5,856 businesses filed, and in 2006, only 5,475 businesses filed, according to statistics released by the courts.

"The significant decline in local Chapter 11s means there's less work on the West Coast, and we're not immune to that," said Peter Benvenutti, a partner in Heller Ehrman's bankruptcy and restructuring practice in San Francisco.

Benvenutti said the practice group -- like many others on the West Coast -- hasn't been hiring additional attorneys in recent years.

EVOLVING AND KEEPING BUSY

For Robert Eisenbach III, a Cooley Godward Kronish bankruptcy lawyer, the trend has meant a change in the focus of his work to what's currently the rage: hedge fund financing.

"During the 2001 to 2004 time period, there were just a lot more Chapter 11s being filed," said Eisenbach, partner in charge at Cooley's San Francisco office. "As the number of bankruptcies goes down, we tend to get involved in more of out-of-court restructurings and litigation."

More and more, he's been working with credit and finance lawyers on complex deals where hedge funds and private equity groups are injecting money into failing companies to steer them clear of bankruptcy court.

"Unless there's a strategic reason to be in bankruptcy, there are economic incentives to do restructuring out of court," said Joseph Scherer, the partner who heads Cooley's credit finance group.

In the last four years, Scherer said he has worked with bankruptcy lawyers on a more regular basis, in large part because of the growing popularity of second lien loans instead of unsecured mezzanine financing. Expertise concerning what rights the second lien holder will get in bankruptcy is often needed, he said.

It's a trend recruiters are noticing, too.

"[Demand] is actually starting to increase, and bankruptcy lawyers are looking for firms with strong bond and hedge fund practices," said Lawrence Watanabe, a legal recruiter based in San Diego.

Orrick's Holden said there's also bankruptcy work in some industries that, for whatever reason, are not necessarily buoyed by the strong economy or free flow of financing. For instance, any industry that depends on energy may struggle when oil prices go up, he said.

Although such cases haven't rolled into Orrick's San Francisco office, Holden said he's still working on bankruptcy cases stemming from another industry-specific problem -- exposure to asbestos litigation.

Earlier this year, Holden finished up his work representing a committee of retirees inKaiser Aluminum's Chapter11 case, setting up a trust with the company's stock that will fund their pensions.

Geography can also play a role in bankruptcy work. In the late 1990s, companies filing for bankruptcy and their lawyers headed for Delaware, because of a predictability when it came to the amount of fees awarded. But now the center of gravity has shifted to New York, Benvenutti said.

DOJ_NMG_0097339

"New York is generally considered to be a more user-friendly district," he said.

That's good news for New York firms and major Bay Area firms like Heller, Orrick or Cooley that have New York offices.

THE ROARING EARLY 2000S

Still, the bankruptcy market for lawyers is nothing like it was just a couple of years ago when the likes of Enron and Worldcom went bottoms up.

"It was a terrific time for the bankruptcy bar: You had K-mart and United Airlines -- we did work with Aloha Airlines," said Richard Lapping, co-chair of Thelen Reid Brown Raysman & Steiner's bankruptcy and creditors' rights group. "These were huge bankruptcy cases that meant a lot of work for a lot of lawyers."

Lapping, like other bankruptcy lawyers, said that trend might return.

"There's a little bit of tension in the economy, and we're getting calls that there may be work in the offing looking forward," he said.

Md. Challenges Federal Report (BSUN)

By Greg Garland, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, November 22, 2006

Administration disputes U.S. finding that juvenile-offender center is unsafe

The Ehrlich administration has sent a sharply worded letter and nearly 500 pages of supporting documents to the U.S. Justice Department, challenging a finding that the state has run a Baltimore center for juvenile offenders in an unsafe and unconstitutional manner.

A Justice Department report issued in August said youths held at the 144-bed center on North Gay Street "suffer significant harm and risk of harm" because there isn't enough staff on hand and treatment plans are inadequate.

The report noted youth-on-youth assault rates 47 percent higher than the national average for such facilities.

But state officials say the report was written nearly a year after federal officials inspected the Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center in September and October 2005 and that the concerns they raised have been addressed.

"We strongly disagree with the Justice Department's findings," said Edward Hopkins, a spokesman for the Maryland Department of Juvenile Services. "We believe their conclusions are wrong."

The highly critical Justice Department report was regarded as an embarrassment for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., who had made juvenile justice reform a key issue when he campaigned for the office four years ago. The report lays the foundation for a possible lawsuit that could lead to a court order forcing the state to change the way it runs the juvenile center.

In a 16-page, footnoted letter dated Nov. 6, Maryland Juvenile Services Secretary Kenneth C. Montague Jr. called on federal officials to drop the matter. The letter was released yesterday after The Sun requested a copy.

"DJS believes that, as of October, 2006, children confined to the [Baltimore City Juvenile Justice Center] do not suffer the harm or significant risk of harm described in your letter and that there are certainly no risks [of] violating the constitutional or federal statutory rights of these youths," Montague wrote.

While youth-on-youth assaults at the center are higher than the national average, Montague wrote, the number has been reduced sharply since federal officials visited more than a year ago.

Many of the problems highlighted in the Justice Department report were resolved well before it was issued in August, Montague said.

For example, he said, the center "has replaced its lightweight plastic chairs with large boxy chairs which are more difficult to lift and too cumbersome to be effectively used as a weapon." And, he said, toothbrushes have been replaced with a "shank-proof" variety that can't be fashioned into weapons.

In addition, Montague wrote, the Maryland State Department of Education was brought into the center in January to take over its education programs, including special education services.

The Justice Department "nonetheless baldly asserts that that the Justice Center 'fails to provide adequate special education services.' ... The DOJ is wrong," Montague wrote.

He said further that, on the subject of educational programs, the Justice Department's report "contains basic factual mistakes and reaches conclusions that are simply unfounded."

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, said the federal agency would have no comment on the details of the state's response.

"We stand by our letter, and we remain willing to work with the state to reach a resolution," Magnuson said.

DOJ_NMG_0097340

Although Montague wrote in his letter that staffing and other issues at the center have mostly been resolved, reports by the state's independent juvenile justice monitor tell a different story.

As recently as Aug. 31, then-monitor Katherine A. Perez wrote Montague about "the ongoing issue of staffing shortages and the threat to life, health and safety this presents to children" housed at the Baltimore juvenile justice center.

Juvenile Centers Still Not Up To Standard, Monitor Says (JCL)

By Julie Goodman

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, November 22, 2006

A court monitor for the state's two juvenile training facilities has once again reported that the state has failed to meet most of the conditions required under an agreement to bring the schools up to standard.

In May 2005, Mississippi entered a four-year decree to end a Justice Department lawsuit over abuse allegations at the Oakley and Columbia training schools.

The fourth report from monitor Joyce Burrell, filed Wednesday, covers the period May 1 through Aug. 31.

It says that while some progress was made during that period, much more is required to come into compliance.

Burrell noted improvements in student staffing ratios, and the improved cleanliness of floors, walls, ceilings, baseboards, youth rooms, bathrooms and common rooms. "In the short term, staff are to be commended for pitching in many extra hours to do a thorough cleaning and some painting of the buildings," she wrote.

But she also noted unresolved setbacks in education and staffing issues, including difficulty in retaining new hires long enough to get problems under control. The problem must be addressed, she said, so that the department's youth services can reach optimum staffing levels and cut down on overtime.

DHS Executive Director Don Taylor was not available for comment today, but has said in response to previous reports that improvements have been slow but continual.

The recent report also detailed continued problems with reports of abuse by students, noting that the actual student complaints are coming through attorneys from the Department of Justice or the Southern Poverty Law Center.

"The fact that students/cadets are not comfortable reporting issues to staff of the Division of Youth Services is troubling and suggests that they are still either afraid ... or they do not have the skills to effectively use the tools that are available to make reports."

During this reporting period, there were too many serious allegations of youth-on-youth and staff-on-youth abuse at Oakley. A major communication problem is to blame for those serious complaints which do not progress up the chain of command.

Staffers "dropped the ball," she said, when they decided not to pursue an allegation from a youth who choose to withdraw the complaint.

As she has noted in the past, Burrell said staffers still don't understand what constitutes abuse at Oakley.

She recommended that an ombudsperson join the staff, and that tape recorders be used for students who have trouble reading and writing their complaints. She also suggested better regular assessments of how safe students feel.

Day Laborers Win Racial Lawsuit (FINDLAW/AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

(AP) - WHITE PLAINS, N.Y.-A suburban village discriminated against Hispanic day laborers when it closed a hiring site and stepped up police patrols on the streets where they looked for work, a federal judge ruled Monday.

"Since August 2004, and continuing into this past summer, the defendants have engaged in a campaign designed to drive out the Latino day laborers who gather on the streets of Mamaroneck to seek work," Judge Colleen McMahon wrote. "The fact that the day laborers were Latinos, and not whites, was, at least in part, a motivating factor in defendants' actions."

McMahon did not specify a remedy for the village of Mamaroneck, about 25 miles north of New York City, giving the two sides 10 days to make suggestions. And in a footnote at the end of the decision, she suggested there was still time for a settlement.

Attorney Kevin Plunkett, who represented the village, said it was a stretch for the judge to determine that discrimination played a role in the crackdown. He said the quality of life for residents of Mamaroneck - not race - was the chief concern of village officials.

"This group of people just happens to be Hispanic," he said. "What happens if 50 other people were assembled in the community? That has to be addressed."

Plunkett said he and village officials would review the ruling and discuss what steps to take next.

DOJ_NMG_0097341

The village had argued that it was only enforcing existing laws when it beefed up the police presence in the area around the park and set up traffic checkpoints that inconvenienced the contractors who came looking for temporary workers.

Six Hispanic immigrant workers - all identified as John Doe for fear of retaliation by police or immigration authorities - took the village to court in September, seeking an injunction against what they called selective law enforcement and ethnic discrimination. They said the village violated their right to equal protection when they cracked down on the laborers.

"We're very pleased," said Cesar Perales, president of the Puerto Rican Legal Defense and Education Fund, which represented the day laborers. "The court found that indeed the village of Mamaroneck had engaged in intentional discrimination and was motivated by racism."

The ruling could influence the treatment elsewhere of day laborers, who have become an increasingly visible symbol of the immigration issue as they solicit construction and landscaping jobs.

The victory is at least the second this year for day laborers in federal court. In May, a federal judge prohibited the city of Redondo Beach, Calif., from arresting day laborers for violating a local ordinance against soliciting work in public.

Ga. Prosecutors Review Shootings By Cops (FINDLAW/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

(AP) - ATLANTA-Prosecutors in a suburban county plan to review 14 shootings by police, including eight fatalities, amid concern about the high number of killings compared with the nation's two largest cities.

DeKalb County prosecutors will also investigate the death of another person in police custody who was not shot, and they expect to be asked to look into four more fatal shootings by police, Adora Andy, a DeKalb County district attorney's office spokeswoman, said Monday.

"We will review the documents, and we will determine the appropriate course of action," Andy said.

Prosecutors could pursue criminal charges against officers if warranted.

The review of shootings and in-custody deaths involves 15 incidents from Jan. 1 through Sept. 12, Andy said, adding that her office expects to get another request from the police department to review the shootings since then.

Monday's police materials omitted a fatal police shooting Sept. 2, and Andy said she expected to get that later.

Andy declined to say why Police Chief Nick Marinelli made the request. She also would not disclose what reports he has turned over.

A police spokesman did not return calls seeking comment beyond a Police Department statement that said the DA office's investigation had been requested.

Marinelli has defended the department's actions since an Associated Press investigation published Sept. 28 showed that the nine fatal shootings this year by DeKalb County police at that time was more than the six in New York City and equal to the Los Angeles number.

It also was three times the number of fatal shootings DeKalb police had recorded last year in the county of 700,000.

Nationwide, justifiable killings by officers while on duty declined from 378 in 2001 to 341 last year, according to the FBI, which does not catalog fatal police shootings that are accidents or not justified.

Records obtained by the AP through an open records request showed that some of the department's required in-service training in the use of deadly force had been reduced, along with instruction in the use of batons.

The toll led to an independent review of police training and use-of-force procedures by a consulting firm that found some deficiencies, including a lack of emphasis on de-escalation of tense situations. County CEO Vernon Jones said at the time that there were no widespread problems at the department.

Since September, there have been three more fatal shootings by DeKalb police. Now, the police chief has asked for a review by the prosecutor's office to remove any doubt in the public's mind, police said Monday.

The review request comes as police have released details of an internal probe into the shootings. A police review board found that an officer in one fatal shooting was unjustified in using deadly force and that officers in three nonfatal shootings were unjustified.

The officers in the remaining shootings through September were either found to be justified, or no determination was made.

Gay Custody Case Stalls In Court (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

Two Baltimore County judges have delayed ruling in a child- custody case that has forced a 7-year-old girl to spend time with her adoptive mother's former lesbian partner, despite objections from a court-appointed child-welfare specialist.

DOJ_NMG_0097342

A social worker for Baltimore County Circuit Court reported in August that the ex-partner's overnight visits with the girl "probably caused acute underlying turmoil" for the child, according to court records.

"At this time, she seems emotionally vulnerable and experiencing severe anxiety in response to the crisis that this dispute has precipitated," social worker Cheryl Taylor says in the report. "Overnight weekend visits seem to pose particular separation threats and anxiety for [the girl] at this time."

The report remains sealed, but excerpts of Miss Taylor's findings are cited elsewhere in the court record.

Miss Taylor notes that the girl told everybody involved in the case -- including her mother, her mother's former partner and the family pediatrician -- that she does not want the visits to continue. The social worker also has recommended that the child "remain in long-term psychotherapy."

Still, two successive judges presiding over the case have delayed ruling on the emergency request by the mother, identified as Janice M., to stop the court-ordered visitation.

Judge John O. Hennegan put off ruling on the mother's request in August. The case last month was transferred to Judge Michael J. Finifter, who scheduled a hearing for Jan. 28.

The Washington Times is withholding the full names of Janice M. and her former lesbian partner, Margaret K., to protect the identity of the girl, who was adopted from an orphanage in India in 2000 by Janice M.

Both women declined to be interviewed for this report.

"The little girl doesn't even know what a lesbian is," said Susie Banks, 49, whose 7-year-old daughter is best friends with Janice M.'s daughter. "She has no clue why this woman is doing this to her. ... She wrote a note to her mother last Christmas saying she wants a dad and a dog."

Mrs. Banks, a homemaker from Ellicott City, has appeared as a witness for Janice M.

Margaret K., who was Janice M.'s live-in girlfriend from 1987 until 2004, won visitation rights to Janice M.'s adoptive daughter in a court ruling in February.

The ruling, which denied Margaret K. custody of the girl but required that she have visitation with the child every Wednesday and every other weekend, was upheld this month in a decision by the Court of Special Appeals.

The courts found that Margaret K. is the child's de facto parent.

Homosexual rights groups and the American Civil Liberties Union have rallied behind Margaret K.

The case also has energized proponents of same-sex "marriage" who say that issues of child custody and visitation would be resolved more easily if homosexual unions were legally recognized.

In January, a Baltimore City Circuit Court judge ruled that the state's 33-year-old ban on same-sex "marriage" is unconstitutional. The case will be argued next month in Maryland's highest court, the Court of Appeals.

Dan Furmansky, executive director of the homosexual rights group Equality Maryland, said he was pleased that Margaret K.'s case was being judged solely on the basis of what was in the best interest of Janice M.'s daughter.

"Sexual orientation has no bearing on the ability to take care of a child," Mr. Furmansky said. "Our position is that every case should be decided individually, and the best interest of the child is what would be determined."

The social worker's report also cites a report by the girl's pediatrician who "did not see anything beneficial about forcing the visits," according to court records.

Margaret K.'s attorney, Jennifer S. Fairfax, challenged Miss Taylor's conclusions.

"Ms. Taylor's ultimate findings are remarkably inconsistent with her specific and detailed findings, particularly her findings with regard to what [Margaret K.] has to offer" the child, she said in correspondence to the court.

She cited Miss Taylor's findings in the report that Margaret K. is "a loving, caring, positive and important influence on [the girl's] life and under less stressful conditions could be an appropriate parent care-giver to the child."

Miss Fairfax noted that the report says Margaret K. "puts [the girl's] needs above her own" and should remain an "extremely constant and steady influence in [the girl's] life."

Mothers Rally To Back Breast-Feeding Rights (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Karen Gral knows how difficult it is to travel with small children: standing in long lines with squirming toddlers, dealing with new security rules that prohibit liquids -- including some baby foods -- and lugging strollers, car seats and diaper bags through airports.

For her, the finish line is sitting on the airplane and breast-feeding her hungry and worn-out 16-month-old to sleep.

So when the Alexandria mother of two heard that a family was kicked off a Delta Air Lines flight last month because the mother refused to cover her baby with a blanket while breast-feeding, Gral decided to join 70 people at Reagan National Airport yesterday for a "nurse-in" in front of the Delta ticket counter. Similar protests were held at more than 30 airports around the country, including Baltimore-Washington International Thurgood Marshall Airport, where 62 people gathered in support of Arlington native Emily Gillette.

"Breast-feeding is the most natural thing in the world. What was Emily supposed to do? Not feed her child? Not give her child comfort?" said Gral, while nursing her son, Garrett, who was wearing a white onesie that read, "I'm a Breast Man."

Delta has said it regrets the incident with Gillette, which took place aboard one of its contract carriers, Freedom Airlines.

"Delta Air Lines fully supports a mother's right to breast-feed on board our aircraft, and we were very disappointed in the decision to move Ms. Gillette from the flight," said Gina Laughlin, a Delta spokeswoman.

According to Gillette's attorney, Elizabeth A. Boepple, the family boarded a flight from Burlington, Vt., to New York on Oct. 13 after a two-hour delay. On board, Emily began to nurse her toddler daughter in her window seat before takeoff. Gillette's husband, Brad, sat in the aisle seat to provide his wife and their daughter some privacy.

A flight attendant handed Emily Gillette a blanket and said, "You need to cover up. You are offending me," according to Boepple.

Gillette refused, saying, "No, thank you. I will not put a blanket on top of my child's head," according to Boepple.

Moments later, the Gillettes were escorted off the plane by a ticket agent and put on a flight the next day.

The Gillettes have filed a complaint with the Vermont Human Rights Commission.

Many showed up at National to push airlines to adopt more supportive policies for nursing mothers and to encourage federal legislation that protects breast-feeding in public and pumping milk in the workplace.

"This is not a protest. We want to show people that breast-feeding is completely normal," said Robin Abadia, 31, who took time off from work to attend the event with her husband and two children.

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-N.Y.), reintroduced legislation to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to protect breast-feeding in public, provide tax incentives for businesses that establish private lactation areas in workplaces, and allow tax deductions for breast-feeding equipment.

A "nurse-in" was staged in front of ABC studios in New York last year after "The View" co-host Barbara Walters made what many considered to be disparaging remarks about a woman breast-feeding next to her on a plane trip.

Many pediatricians recommend that nursing mothers breast-feed their children on the ascent and descent of flights, to help open children's ear canals as cabin pressure changes with altitude. The World Health Organization recommends that infants be exclusively breast-fed until they are at least 6 months old.

US Lags Behind In Gender Gap Study (FT)

By Scheherazade Daneshkhu In London

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

The US lags at 22nd place behind developed and even a couple of developing countries in a study of inequality between men and women, mainly because it has few women in politics. This is in spite of the ascent of Nancy Pelosi who is set to become the first woman to head the US House of Representatives.

Sweden is the only country where men and women form equal numbers among all ministers and parliamentarians. Cherie Booth, a human rights barrister and wife of Tony Blair, UK prime minister, said there were more women in parliament in Iraq and Afghanistan – two countries not covered by the report – than in the UK.

The study of 115 countries published on Tuesday by the World Economic Forum, a Swiss-based think-tank, measures the gender gap based on economic, political, educational and health-based criteria in a benchmarking exercise aimed at improving women's position in society.

The individual country rankings show Sweden, Norway and Finland at the top of the league, having closed about 80 per cent of the gender gap, with Yemen, Saudi Arabia and Chad at the bottom, with a gender gap of about 50 per cent.

The Philippines is the only Asian and developing country in the top 10. The US falls short of the top 20 but other economically-advanced countries are ranked lower. France and Italy are ranked 70 and 77 respectively, while Japan takes 79th place. The UK is in ninth place.

The index focuses on the relative extent of the gender gap regardless of a country's wealth – by assessing how well countries divide their opportunities and resources between men and women.

Although no country offers women equal treatment with men, countries have made big progress in education and healthcare for women, having closed 90 per cent of the gap with men in these areas.

When it comes to political empowerment – the ratio of women to men in parliament, ministerial positions and executive office – just 15 per cent of the gap with men has been closed.

DOJ_NMG_0097344

There was a positive correlation between national income per head and the WEF's analysis of the relative position of women in society, with women in richer countries tending to fare better than those in poorer societies.

Muni Dealers Brace For U.S. Probes (WSJ)

By Stan Rosenberg

Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Leading Providers of GICs Are Among Those Receiving Federal Subpoenas Recently

Municipal-bond dealers held their cards close to their vests as the market faces nationwide criminal and civil probes into possible abuses over their dealings in a wide range of muni-bond transactions.

The U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Securities and Exchange Commission are investigating questionable practices at a number of firms, with leading providers of guaranteed investment contracts, or GICs, having received federal subpoenas recently.

The Bond Buyer, a leading muni-bond publication, reported yesterday that the practices may go beyond GICs and could include "virtually every investment product or derivative" brokered or provided by various firms over the past six to 14 years.

Most executives at dealer firms, as well as portfolio managers, declined to comment on the situation.

"In general, everybody's just looking at it and seeing what's going on here, doing a lot of work to get the material together that they're looking for," said one senior executive at a Wall Street investment firm. Asked if most of the major firms have been subpoenaed, he said: "I have no idea because I'm not talking to anybody about it."

An executive at a smaller West Coast-based firm said he had seen no impact on the muni market since news of the investigations broke. However, activity in the market -- as in other areas of the financial markets -- has been muted this week ahead of the Thanksgiving Day holiday.

According to the Bond Buyer, "dozens" of firms in the $2.2 trillion muni market have been asked for information by the Justice Department and SEC. The Bond Buyer said the parallel criminal and civil investigations "go far beyond GICs and may cover thousands of investment products and derivatives entered into in connection with muni-bond transactions that could total hundreds of billions of dollars." Yet, only a small amount of these transactions will be subject to criminal or civil allegations, the publication reported.

As reported by Dow Jones Newswires Monday, a federal official said a conservative estimate would be that a cloud of potential taxability hangs over $10 billion to $15 billion of bonds sold to investors as tax-exempt securities.

While the spotlight of the federal investigations has been on suspected GIC bid-rigging, the bond transactions under scrutiny also present tax issues by diverting arbitrage profits away from the federal government to participants in bond deals.

Such arbitrage windfalls in the muni market are made by investing tax-exempt bond proceeds in high-yielding obligations, and are supposed to be rebated to the Treasury. The Internal Revenue Service can tax bondholders, although it has tried to settle most such cases with issuers. One of the most flagrant instances of such abuse was known as "yield burning" and resulted in federal enforcement action against dozens of securities firms more than six years ago.

GICs offer an issuer a place to park bond-issue proceeds at stipulated interest rates until they need to be used. There are various GIC providers. At least three bids are supposed to be received, but in some instances, one bid is far superior than the others, and there are suspicions that GIC brokers can fix the bidding, rewarding favored firms with business.

"I guess it doesn't really surprise me that they would be evaluating the propriety of the pricing of these products," said Ben Watkins, director of Florida's Division of Bond Finance. "I don't think there is the level of transparency in that market that there should be, and I don't think that issuers are as diligent as they should be in obtaining fair pricing for these products."

Treasurys Rise on Quiet Day

Treasury bond prices ended higher in a quiet trading session, with little in the way of data or Federal Reserve commentary to move the market.

Scott Gewirtz, head of Treasury trading at Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., said buying was driven by investors who had "gotten short at the top of the range and were forced to cover," meaning they bet prices would fall further and were forced to buy after the price decline reversed itself.

At 4 p.m., the benchmark 10-year note was up 5/32 point, or $1.5625 per $1,000 face value, at 100 11/32. Its yield fell to 4.582% from 4.601% Monday, as yields move inversely to prices. The 30-year bond rose 12/32 point to 97 16/32 to yield 4.658%.

Municipal Bid-Rigging Subpoenas Seek Information On Derivatives (BLOOM)

By Darrell Preston And William Selway

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

Nov. 21 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. investigators have demanded that banks and brokers provide information on derivatives as part of an investigation into anti-competitive practices in the $2 trillion municipal bond market, according to a lawyer hired by one of the firms subpoenaed in the probe.

The Justice Department is looking into whether bids were rigged on investment contracts sold to local governments. Investigators are also seeking information on interest-rate swaps and other financial products that governments buy to guard against swings in borrowing costs, said Mark Scott, the former director of tax-exempt bonds for the Internal Revenue Service who is now a partner with Vinson & Elkins in Washington.

``It's pretty broad," said Scott, who is representing a client subpoenaed by investigators whom he wouldn't identify. ``They are going to get truckloads of information."

The investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission, is the broadest criminal probe ever of the municipal bond industry and has resulted in more than a dozen subpoenas being issued last week to brokers, banks and insurance companies, including American International Group Inc. and General Electric Co.

Regulators are looking at whether brokers for U.S. local governments violated the law while arranging bids for guaranteed investment contracts, where a portion of the hundreds of billions of dollars raised in the tax-exempt bond market every year is placed until it is needed for projects.

Serving Two Roles

Guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, are sold by Wall Street banks and insurance companies, some of which also sell swaps and other municipal finance products. A swap, a type of derivative contract, is an agreement to exchange interest payments, usually a fixed payment for one that varies based on the movements of benchmark indexes or rates used by banks to track borrowing rates.

In some bond issues, the winner of the bidding for a guaranteed investment contract has also performed a second role, such as bond insurer or provider of options. Those dual roles can raise conflicts of interest.

Three brokers of guaranteed investment contracts subpoenaed last week -- Beverly Hills, California-based CDR Financial Products Inc., Pottstown, Pennsylvania-based Investment Management Advisory Group Inc. and Sound Capital Management of Eden Prairie, Minnesota -- also advise governments on swaps.

Documents Sought

The subpoenas seek documents ``for all relevant municipal contracts awarded through competitive bidding," said Scott, who read from the subpoena sent to his client. That includes documents on financial agreements including interest-rate and ``basis" swaps, ``swaptions" collateralized CDs and other vehicles for hedging investment-rate risk, he said.

``They're looking for the smoking gun," said Scott. ``Why would you raid an office if you weren't looking for a smoking gun?"

The information on swaps sought in the subpoenas was reported earlier in the Bond Buyer newspaper.

Joe Norton, a spokesman for New York-based AIG, previously disclosed that the company had been subpoenaed by the SEC and the Justice Department without commenting on the content of the requests. Fairfield, Connecticut-based GE spokesman Russell Wilkerson said the company is cooperating with the requests.

CDR, Investment Management Advisory Group and Sound Capital also all said in separate statements last week that they are cooperating with investigators.

``This is indeed an industrywide investigation that appears to be growing by the day," CDR said in a further statement yesterday.

Yield Burning

The criminal investigation stems from a probe by the Internal Revenue Service, which enforces rules that prevent local governments from profiting by borrowing at tax-exempt interest rates and reinvesting the money in higher-yielding securities. While local governments reinvest bond proceeds until the money is needed, their earnings must be paid in taxes to the IRS.

The IRS has looked into whether improper bidding practices for guaranteed investment contracts deprived the U.S. government of those taxes, just as the sale of overpriced Treasury bonds did during the so-called yield-burning scandals of the 1990s. In those cases, banks raised the price on the bonds, driving down, or burning, the yield. That reduced the investment earnings that should have been sent back to the IRS.

Swap Fees

Last year, the IRS also said it was investigating whether financial advisers to states and municipal governments made excessive fees on interest-rate swap contracts or allowed banks to make inflated commissions.

The subpoenas, which Scott said were received by a small client he declined to identify, seek a broad swath of information from the 25 or so firms that received them. CDR in its statement yesterday said investigators were seeking documents back to 1992.

The documents seek detailed information including organization charts, lists of directors and officers, birth dates and home addresses of employees, calendars and appointment books, travel and expense records, telephone records and all records relevant to the awarding of bids, said Scott, reading from a subpoena.

``This is going to generate hundreds of boxes of information," said Scott.

Prosecutors: Vista Apparently Complies With Microsoft Antitrust Judgment (INFOWEEK)

By Antone Gonsalves, InformationWeek

Information Week, November 22, 2006

U.S. prosecutors say Windows Vista and the latest version of Internet Explorer apparently comply with the requirements of the 2002 antitrust judgment against Microsoft.

In a joint status report filed Tuesday with the U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., prosecutors said Microsoft appeared to be complying with the judgment, which found Microsoft abused its Windows monopoly and set down rules for the software maker to follow to avoid future anti-competitive behavior. Prosecutors and Microsoft have been submitting joint reports on compliance to the court every six months.

The Justice Department and a court-approved technical committee are monitoring the development of Vista to assure compliance with the court order. The monitoring includes extensive testing of Vista and Internet Explorer 7 betas.

The committee and Microsoft developed a bug-tracking system to help ensure that Vista ships without any "known issues related to its treatment of middleware under the final judgments," prosecutors said in the report.

"Plaintiffs are pleased to report that this system has been a success," prosecutors said. "Microsoft addressed all outstanding middleware-related bug issues prior to Vista being released to manufacturing."

Since issuing the last report May 12, the Justice Department has received 25 third-party complaints, but none of them raised issues related to Microsoft's compliance with the court order, prosecutors said. "Each of the non-substantive complaints received a simple response acknowledging their receipt."

One issue that remained outstanding was Microsoft's continuing effort to improve the technical documentation on certain Windows technology it is required to provide on reasonable and non-discriminatory terms to any other software maker. In the 2002 judgment, Microsoft was found to have taken illegal advantage of its monopoly in desktop operating systems by ensuring its software ran better on Windows than competitors' platforms.

Prosecutors said there were indications that the new documentation "is substantially higher in quality than the prior version."

"In summary, plaintiffs have not yet reached any conclusions about Microsoft's technical documentation rewrite project," prosecutors said. Microsoft, so far, has met its deadlines for providing rewritten documentation to licensees.

The Justice Department has raised concerns with the quality of the technical documentation Microsoft has provided to licensees, and with the length of time it was taking to improve the documentation. The technology in question relates to the protocols used by computer servers to communicate with client PCs running Windows. The interoperability technology covered under the judgment is available for licensing for minimum five-year terms that would run at least through Nov. 11, 2017.

The original antitrust ruling was set to expire next year. However, portions have been extended to Nov. 12, 2009, with the DOJ having the option of requesting an additional three-year extension.

Justice Dept.: Vista Satisfies Antitrust Deal (CNET)

CNET News, November 22, 2006

Microsoft's soon-to-be-released Windows Vista operating system does not appear to raise antitrust concerns, federal and state prosecutors said Tuesday in a court filing.

In a periodic joint status report, required as a part of Microsoft's 2002 antitrust settlement with the U.S. Department of Justice and state plaintiffs, the government attorneys said a technical committee charged with overseeing the software giant's compliance had found no outstanding issues after "extensive testing" of Vista and Internet Explorer 7.

According to the report, Microsoft and the technical committee have been offering a downloadable program that is designed to help Microsoft's competitors in the fields of Web browsers, e-mail and instant-messaging clients, and media players to make their programs "Vista-ready" before the new operating system ships.

The program serves as a single source for all the registry settings needed for applications "to attain equal visibility on Windows XP and Vista systems," the technical committee said. The program's goal is to reduce the chance that people will experience difficulties in changing default software to non-Microsoft products, for instance. It also aims to make it easy to locate third-party applications in the start menu, desktop, task pane and other commonly used surfaces, after installing them.

Microsoft said it had also contacted 30 competing software makers and had invited them to work alongside company engineers at its Redmond, Wash., campus lab for Vista Readiness.

Since the last status report filing in May, government attorneys said they received 25 complaints alleging antitrust concerns about competing middleware but said they concluded that none of those gripes had merit.

Although the matters were not raised by U.S. regulators, some possible antitrust repercussions of security and file-formatting features in Vista were recently flagged as concerns by European and Korean regulators. Microsoft said last month that it had implemented changes that address those complaints.

The latest status report said Microsoft appears to be making some progress on what has become one of the thornier components of the settlement: rewriting documentation for licensees of its Microsoft Communications Protocol Program. The MCPP, another requirement of the antitrust settlement, is designed to help third-party developers create software that works with Windows.

But government attorneys said they remain worried about the project staying on track. Microsoft has already endured scolding for alleged "foot-dragging" on that front from the plaintiffs and the federal judge presiding over the case, who ultimately approved a two-year extension for that project's deadline.

"Microsoft's full commitment will be essential if the project is to stand any chance of producing complete and accurate documents on the schedule that Microsoft has provided to the court," the government wrote in its portion of the status report.

In a separate battle in Europe, Microsoft faces a Thanksgiving Day deadline for completion of a similar documentation project.

Microsoft Jury Selected; 7 Men, 5 Women (DMR)

Des Moines Register, November 22, 2006

Jury selection in the Microsoft anti-trust case in Polk County District Court was completed today with seven men and five women selected to hear the class action law suit.

The case is expected to take several months to try with witnesses that will include Microsoft founder Bill Gates and chief executive officer Steve Ballmer.

Plaintiffs' lawyers, led by Des Moines attorney Roxanne Conlin, are seeking damages of up to $329 million for Iowans who purchased Microsoft product between 1994 and this year.

The crux of their case is that anti-competitive actions by Microsoft resulted in overcharges and extra expenses to Iowa consumers.

The Iowa case is the last of several dozen state lawsuits against the giant computer software company. The state cases were filed after a federal anti-trust action against Microsoft was settled in 2000.

None of the other state cases has ever gone to a jury for a decision. All were either settled out of court or dismissed, officials for both sides have said.

The jury is expected to be seated late next week. The trial will begin with what is expected to be a lengthy list of jury instructions from Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg about how Iowa law applies to the situation and how the case will proceed.

Opening statements could begin as early as Nov. 30 and are expected to consume several more days before witnesses begin testifying.

Jury selection took more than a week with one full day devoted to having potential jurors fill out a 30-plus page questionnaire and another day for lawyers to assess the answers.

Each side has a jury consultant. Hale Starr of West Des Moines-based Starr Litigation Services is assisting Conlin and the other plaintiffs' lawyers, while Theresa Zagnoli is helping Microsoft lawyers. Zagnoli, who once worked for Starr in Des Moines, is now a partner in Zagnoli, McEvoy, Foley, a Chicago-based research firm.

Each side has also hire local public relations firms to help manage publicity about the case. Jamie Buelt of En Q Strategies is working with Microsoft and Eileen Wixted of Wixted Pope Nora Thompson & Associates is working with the plaintiffs' lawyers.

Fewer than 100 people from a potential jury list of 450 registered voters were actually interviewed to obtain the 12-person jury, an official said.

Several of the individuals selected as jurors indicated during questioning that they have purchased Microsoft products during the past 12 years, thereby making them eligible for damages, if any are awarded. But all told the court they believed they could hear the evidence with an open mind and make a fair decision.

Several pre-trial motions remain to be ruled on by Judge Rosenberg, including a request by Conlin to be able to play video excerpts from an earlier deposition by Gates.

Normally, depositions are not entered into the court record when a witness is available to testify in person, except as evidence to challenge live testimony. Conlin had earlier received permission from the judge to call Gates as a hostile witness when she presents her case.

Feds Clear Oshkosh Truck's $3.2B Offer For JLG (MILBIZ)

Milwaukee Business Journal, November 22, 2006

Oshkosh Truck Corp.'s proposed purchase of JLG Industries Inc. has cleared federal regulatory review with the passage of a required waiting period for the deal.

The companies jointly announced Tuesday the expiration of the 30-day waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 in connection with the proposed merger of a wholly-owned subsidiary of Oshkosh with JLG.

The expiration of the Hart-Scott-Rodino waiting period satisfies one of the conditions to Oshkosh's acquisition of JLG. Consummation of the merger, which is expected to occur in early December, remains subject to other customary closing conditions, including approval of the merger by JLG's shareholders.

Specialty truck manufacturer Oshkosh Truck (NYSE: OSK) announced Oct. 16 that it agreed to buy JLG Industries (NYSE: JLG), a maker of aerial work platforms and telehandler vehicles, in a transaction valued at $3.2 billion.

The addition of JLG's $2.3 billion in revenue will make Oshkosh Truck a $6 billion manufacturer of specialty trucks.

Franchisees Accuse Quiznos Of Fraud In Suit (MJS)

By Paul Gores

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, November 22, 2006

Owners say they are made to pay inflated prices for food, supplies

A lawsuit accuses Quiznos Sub of forcing Wisconsin franchisees of the sandwich chain to buy food and supplies at inflated costs and sell food at artificially low retail prices, making the restaurants unprofitable.

The class-action lawsuit, filed in federal court in Green Bay on behalf of 28 Wisconsin franchisees of Denver-based The Quiznos Franchise Co. and its affiliates, seeks compensation for lost investments and asks for punitive damages and an end to what it calls an "illegal business scheme."

Quiznos did not return calls for comment Tuesday.

The lawsuit alleges the company has systematically defrauded its franchisees by building the brand at the expense of its operators in the field.

The suit contends Quiznos omits or misrepresents key facts about Quiznos business operations in an effort to induce people to buy a franchise.

But too many people who buy a franchise find that the cost of food and supplies in comparison to the selling price of items on the menu keeps franchisees from realizing a profit, Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisee Association, said Tuesday. That's because, the lawsuit alleges, Quiznos forces franchisees to work with Quiznos-mandated suppliers and pay them what the lawsuit describes as "excessive prices for goods and services."

"The numbers just don't add up, and that's the problem," Bray said.

The lawsuit also asserts, among other allegations, that Quiznos makes franchisees accept coupons from customers for free or highly discounted food without reimbursement, and that it saturates markets with outlets.

The average start-up cost for a Quiznos outlet, which includes a $25,000 franchise fee, is about $220,000, Bray said.

The lawsuit contends that when a franchise fails, lenders sell the equipment at lower cost to a new operator, putting the location back in business and continuing to operate "on the backs of those with no control."

According to the suit, the Quiznos "scheme" is intended to fuel revenue growth needed in order to bring about the sale of the remainder of the company to investors.

The lawsuit alleges fraud, breach of contract, violations of federal and state antitrust laws and violations of the Wisconsin Fair Dealership Law.

Plaintiffs in the suit, who are represented locally by the firm Whyte Hirschboeck Dudek, include franchisees from all corners of the state.

Wisconsin Franchisees Sue Quiznos Sub, Alleging Fraud

GREEN BAY, Wis. (AP) -- Quiznos Sub forces its franchisees to buy food and supplies from the company or its approved vendors at unfair prices and sets retail prices too low for the stores to make a profit, according to a lawsuit filed by 28 operators of Quiznos franchises in Wisconsin.

The class action lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court on Monday, said Denver-based Quiznos has systematically defrauded its franchisees in a scheme designed to build the brand at the expense of the store owners.

The lawsuit, which seeks millions of dollars in damages for lost investments, accuses Quiznos of fraud, violations of federal and state antitrust laws, racketeering, breach of contract and violations of Wisconsin's fair dealership law, attorney Justin Klein said Tuesday.

Tamani Chio, a spokeswoman for Quiznos at its headquarters in Denver, did not immediately return a telephone message Tuesday.

The first Quiznos, featuring toasted sandwiches, opened in Denver in 1981 and the company has grown to more than 4,500 restaurants, becoming the fastest-growing restaurant chain in the country, trailing only Subway as the nation's No. 2 sandwich shop -- not counting hamburgers.

"Quiznos has been taking advantage of its franchisees for years through practices that we contend are illegal and in violation of the franchise agreement," said Chris Bray, president of the Toasted Subs Franchisees Association Inc., a trade group that help organize the class-action suit.

Bray, who owns two Quiznos stores in Texas and has been a franchisee for nine years, said Quiznos "has slowly, methodically and deliberatively modified the business model, year over year, to make it economically favorable to them, to the detriment of the franchisees. It is time to put a stop to this."

Among the named defendants in the lawsuit are The Quiznos Franchise Company LLC of Denver; Richard E. Schaden of Lafayette, Colo., and Richard F. Schaden, of Westminster, Colo., the father-son owners of Quiznos; and Cervantes Capital LLC of Denver, which the lawsuit says runs the Quiznos operations.

According to Klein, a similar lawsuit was filed in New Jersey earlier this year by some Quiznos franchisees there. "We are in the preliminary stages of that case," he said.

Klein said the allegations against Quiznos involve restaurants in many states, but Wisconsin was chosen for one of the first lawsuits because it has "very good" laws that protect franchisees.

"There are suits soon to be filed in other states," the attorney said.

A Quiznos franchise costs $25,000, and to open a restaurant and get it running requires an investment of between $300,000 and $400,000, Klein said.

"They tell you who you can buy from and who you can't buy from," he said. "The prices are unreasonably high. Quiznos gets rebates from approved vendors."

Between 2002 and 2004, Quiznos leaped from 1,765 stores to 3,339, an annual growth rate of nearly 45 percent, with company sales climbing 48 percent to $1.27 billion.

What's New? Justices May Help Define Standard In Patent Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, November 22, 2006

Call it the case of the gas pedal, prescription drug and gift bow.

The variations and costs of those and many other items could be affected by a Supreme Court patent case that could be one of the most important intellectual-property disputes to ever come before the justices.

With abortion, affirmative action and other high-profile issues before the court this term, a patent case normally would be a yawner. However, KSR International v. Teleflex, a dispute between competing makers of adjustable gas-pedal systems in vehicles, arises as the justices have shown increasing interest in U.S. law protecting inventions.

The case essentially tests how to determine when an invention is truly new and different, and should receive a patent that entitles its inventor to the exclusive right to make, use and sell the item. That standard can make a difference in how people and companies spend time and money on inventions. If it is too easy to get a patent for a small variation on a previous invention, there is more of a chance that competitors could infringe on it, so companies might acquire patents solely for defensive reasons. If it is too difficult to get a patent for a small but unique adaptation of an item, it could discourage research and development.

The question in the oral arguments scheduled for Tuesday focuses on how to determine when an invention is "obvious," and therefore not worthy of protection. At issue is whether a standard used by the U.S. appeals court that hears patent cases allows patents for changes too small to matter.

The dispute is being watched closely by manufacturers, from the tiremaker Michelin to gift-packaging producer Hallmark.

"The issue in this case is one that strikes at the very heart of the patent field," says lawyer Peter Sullivan, who represents a group of manufacturers backing KSR.

Last year, the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office granted 183,187 patents, a number fairly typical of recent years, says Patent Office spokeswoman Brigid Quinn. (One product can involve many patents.) Meanwhile, applications are up. Last year, 443,652 requests were received, more than twice the total from 1995.

The KSR case involves an adjustable gas-pedal system that was developed for use by short drivers in large vehicles. Teleflex says its pedal assembly, patented in 2001, has a distinctive electronic throttle control and pivot that stays in place.

KSR devised a pedal system that drew a patent-infringement lawsuit from Teleflex, alleging that the KSR system used a feature of Teleflex's system. KSR countered that the Teleflex patent was invalid because it was an "obvious" combination of existing works. A trial court agreed.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, to which patent disputes are appealed, ruled that KSR did not make a sufficient case for "obviousness." It said KSR did not show that prior technology offered a "teaching, suggestion or motivation" for their system.

KSR's attorney, James Dabney, urges the justices to reject the "teaching, suggestion or motivation" standard. He says the test should be whether someone in the field would have been capable of adapting existing technology to achieve the new result, not whether the motivation was there.

Dabney says current rules make it difficult to challenge patents for trivial adaptations.

Teleflex lawyer Thomas Goldstein says the appeals court got it right.

"Because inventions are so often evolutionary rather than revolutionary," he says, "an obviousness standard that merely compares an invention to the prior (work) will often produce the mistaken conclusion that the former was obvious."

Goldstein says the "teaching, suggestion or motivation" standard minimizes "hindsight" by focusing the test on how a person would have combined the elements of an invention from existing works.

In a court brief, the American Intellectual Property Law Association, siding with Teleflex, cites the difficulty of deciding what is new and how hindsight can distort assessments of whether a variation of an invention is patent-worthy.

The court's resolution could affect the development of drugs and other therapies for disease, according to advocates on both sides. The Biotechnology Industry Organization, emphasizing patent protection for various stages of drug development, is backing KSR. AARP, the largest U.S. seniors group, is with Teleflex. The group says improper drug patents delay the entry of generics into the market.

Sullivan, who represents several companies siding with KSR, notes that one of them, Hallmark, was sued for patent infringement over a machine it devised to curl ribbons for decorative bows. The Federal Circuit court rejected Hallmark's claim that the competitor's patents were "obvious," based on prior inventions.

Like KSR, he says patents too often are granted to routine variations on existing creations.

But what might seem routine may really be new.

The Intellectual Property Law Association contends that what counts is how old things are put together in new ways. It warns that many things look obvious only in hindsight, and the group recalls movie director Billy Wilder's famous line: Hindsight "is always 20/20."

Place Your Bets, Please: Takeover Wheel Spins (WSJ)

By Gregory Zuckerman

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Who's next?

That's the question on the lips of investors, traders and investment bankers on the heels of a deluge of mergers and acquisitions.

Some say consumer-oriented stocks, health-care providers, gaming and tech companies could become acquisition targets in the months ahead. Some point to Sprint Nextel, Hilton Hotels, and home builders such as Lennar, Ryland Group and D.R. Horton as possible targets. Private-equity firms are circling home-service company ServiceMaster, say people familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0097351

Others are focusing on companies with steady cash flows and a large percentage of shares owned by company executives, or companies run by older executives who may be willing to sell out.

There has been so much deal activity this year that it looks like anyone could be fair game. Targets have included companies with stable cash flows but poor growth prospects, even in sectors that haven't seen many mergers in the past.

"Deals tend to feed on themselves," says Sam Schwartz, a managing director at Credit Suisse. "Financial sponsors who have purchased companies [in leveraged buyouts] soon are going to look for exits, through initial public offerings of stock or mergers and acquisitions, as long as the financing market remains robust."

But investors shouldn't get carried away betting on possible takeovers. Not only are they tough to predict, these deals also are somewhat less lucrative than they once were. The average premium paid over market prices for shares of companies subject to an acquisition bid this year is 17%, down from 25% in 2000, according to Thomson Financial.

Some analysts say the acquisitions are a sign that stock prices remain reasonably priced, despite the recent run-up in the market that has pushed stock indexes to new highs. Some short sellers -- investors who bet on stock-price declines -- have become cautious. They are reluctant to establish big positions against even stocks with weak outlooks, worried that any wager against a company will turn into a loser on word of a lucrative deal. This wariness is adding to the market's upward momentum.

Mostly, all the wheeling and dealing stems from lots of money sloshing around the global markets, as interest rates remain low. Investors are shoveling money at private-equity firms, which buy public companies or businesses with an eye toward reselling them later at a profit, and at high-yield but risky loans and junk bonds backing acquisitions. That suggests many deals are financial bets, not strategic business moves, perhaps reducing their chance for success.

The bankers who say well-known, consumer-oriented companies and some real-estate investment trusts could see more offers note that some of these stocks have been weak amid worries about how troubles in the housing market will affect various companies. Some private-equity specialists are focusing on companies with strong brand names, steady cash flows and valuable real estate.

Amid all the activity, the total dollar value of takeover offers by U.S. companies is down 1% so far this year compared with the same period last year, according to Richard Peterson, senior researcher at Thomson Financial. Meanwhile, the value of leveraged buyouts -- deals by private-equity firms financed by debt backed by the target's assets and repaid with its cash flow -- has nearly tripled.

NEW HEIGHTS

· Graphic: Where the Deals Are1 | FAQ: Buyout Boom2

More than 40% of the $1.28 trillion of announced U.S. mergers this year has come from private-equity firms or foreign buyers, up from less than 24% last year, Thomson says. Five of the six largest U.S. acquisitions unveiled so far this year were by leveraged-buyout firms.

Some companies once considered too big to become private-equity prey now are seen as possibilities, as private-equity coffers grow. Among them: Sprint, whose shares have dropped almost 12% in the past year but still has a market value of $58 billon, as well as Hilton and Avis Budget Group Inc.

Their stock prices have climbed in recent months. Sprint shares are up more than 25% since hitting a 52-week low in late August. Hilton has jumped more than 33% in three months, giving it a market value of almost $13 billion. Avis Budget, which hit a 52-week low in mid-August, is up about 19% since then, for a market value of just over $2 billion.

A report this month from analysts at Morgan Stanley ranked Lennar, Ryland and D.R. Horton atop its list of leveraged-buyout candidates, based on various metrics such as volatility of free-cash flow.

Home builders have grown by buying smaller competitors in recent years, but have generally shied away from big acquisitions. Although the sector's volatile cash flows can dissuade private-equity firms, some analysts say that as housing slows and these companies do fewer new projects, they will generate more cash flow that might be used to repay debt in a leveraged buyout.

Spokesmen for Sprint and Hilton wouldn't comment. Representatives for Hilton, Ryland, Lennar and D.R. Horton couldn't be reached.

It had been thought that the gambling sector would be immune from the LBO wave, in part because it can be a challenge to obtain a gaming license. Last month's proposed purchase by Texas Pacific Group and Apollo Management of Harrah's Entertainment for about $15 billion suggests the challenges can be surmounted. Casino companies sometimes own valuable real estate that can be used as collateral to raise debt for a leveraged buyout, bankers note.

Bankers say there have been takeover talks involving health-care companies, which are seeing lower growth rates but still churn out cash flow that can be used in a deal financed by heavy debt. Some investors also expect deals in the oil patch, where companies are sitting on loads of cash but shares have slipped as energy prices have fallen. Nabors Industries, which has $9.8 billion market value, has been mentioned as a possible target. A spokesman declined to comment.

Qantas Gets Takeover Approach From Texas Pacific, Macquarie (WSJ)

By Lyndal Mcfarland

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- Qantas Airways said it is considering a takeover approach by Texas Pacific Group and Macquarie Bank Ltd., amid market speculation it will soon receive an offer valuing the Australian flag carrier at up to 11 billion Australian dollars (US$8.5 billion).

In a brief statement, Qantas didn't provide further details on the nature of the approach, but a senior dealer said the group is expected to offer up to A$5.50 a share. Qantas shares soared on the news, with its stock gaining as much as 20% to a morning high of A$5.25 in Australia.

"The approach is confidential and incomplete and is being investigated by Qantas," Cassandra Hamlin, the carrier's acting company secretary, said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange, indicating other options such as a regional merger with Singapore Airlines might be on the table.

Qantas also said in a statement it has "undertaken over a period of years discussions with a range of individuals and companies, including airlines, on possible partnerships, joint ventures and acquisitions."

SIA, which competes with Qantas for passengers on lucrative routes to Europe and North Asia, said it isn't in talks with Qantas.

Macquarie Bank said it has no comment on the Qantas statement, repeating a statement made to Dow Jones Newswires late Tuesday in Australia when speculation of a bid first emerged. Texas Pacific also said it has no comment.

The private-equity sector has targeted Australian companies in recent months with multibillion dollar bids. To date, the largest bid has come from a consortium led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co and including Texas Pacific, Blackstone Group LP and Bain Capital LLC, for Coles Myer Ltd. The retailer recently rejected the A$18.2 billion bid as inadequate.

A senior institutional trader said the bidding consortium has been lured to Qantas as it has low debt and operations such as terminals, freight, maintenance and catering that could be spun off or put into funds. Macquarie Bank could hedge the oil-price risk internally as well, the trader said.

But analysts said any takeover of the iconic airline known as the "Flying Kangaroo" will face significant hurdles with Canberra imposing stiff shareholder restrictions following its privatization 11 years ago.

Any bid for Qantas will place the national government in a difficult position as it confronts criticism from lawmakers and labor unions about the likelihood of large layoffs and cost-cutting measures by the consortium, analysts said.

Also, current ownership restrictions limit a single investor from holding more than 25% of Qantas, with foreign investors limited to owning a total of 49.9%. National Australia Bank credit analysts said the bidding group will need the 25% shareholder limit to be removed, along with approval from Treasurer Peter Costello.

"These are high hurdles to overcome, and though Qantas is a very different case, it is worth remembering that in 2001 the treasurer rejected Shell's takeover approach for Woodside Petroleum on national interest grounds," the bank said.

Analysts noted that airlines haven't been a traditionally attractive target for private-equity groups, given the exposure to fluctuating oil prices, tough price competition and volatile passenger demand.

Texas Pacific already has an interest in the airline sector. It bought a US$200 million stake in US Airways Group Inc. after the airline filed for bankruptcy protection in 2002.

The approach adds to the list of ambitious takeover attempts by Sydney-based Macquarie Bank. In the past year, Macquarie has failed in several high-profile deals, including bids for the London Stock Exchange and Hong Kong-based telecom group PCCW Ltd.

Suez-Gaz De France Pact Clouded By Ruling That Marks Union Win (WSJ)

By David Gauthier-Villars

Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

A Paris court ruling could upset the schedule for the planned €43.43 billion ($55.65 billion) merger of French utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA, and potentially thwart the deal altogether, handing a victory to French energy-sector workers and dealing a major blow to France's government.

The unexpected ruling, which GdF tried but failed to get annulled last night via an appeal, said state-run GdF can't approve the merger until it gives unions more information about the deal's impact on jobs. This means a crucial GdF board meeting that had been called for today to determine the merger's final terms is likely to be called off.

The ruling, which was upheld late last night by an appeals court, may cause the merger schedule to be pushed back at least until March -- missing the original year-end deadline -- because Suez and GdF will have to redraft merger terms to factor in 2006 earnings, according to lawyers involved in the deal. Pushing through the highly politicized merger in the middle of the French presidential elections, planned for April, could also be tricky because the opposition left-wing Socialist Party opposes the deal.

Soon after the appeals court upheld the ruling, GdF and Suez issued a joint statement saying they intend to complete the merger "as soon as possible."

Yesterday's court ruling represents a victory for French energy workers, who, like many of their counterparts across Europe, have battled against the deregulation of power and natural-gas industries in Europe, saying they should remain in state hands.

The ruling is another setback for the two companies and for the center-right government of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, who helped orchestrate the merger and pushed through a bill in parliament allowing for the privatization of GdF. The state owns 80% of GdF and is expected to own 34% of the merged company if the deal is completed. A spokesman for the prime minister's office declined to comment.

Opposition to the deal has also been mounting among Suez shareholders, who say they are getting shortchanged because their company is more valuable in the market than GdF. Several shareholders, including big European and U.S. funds, have threatened to reject the merger unless the terms are changed.

Under the original terms of the deal, Suez and Gaz de France have proposed a 1-for-1 stock swap plus a €1-a-share special dividend to be paid to Suez shareholders to compensate for Suez's higher market valuation. Some Suez shareholders say they deserve a dividend of at least €4 a share to bring the companies' valuations back into line.

Company Exonerated In Antitrust Probe Wins Award (USAT)

By Del Jones

USA Today, November 22, 2006

A San Diego company that in 2002 was the target of Senate antitrust hearings on Tuesday was one of three companies awarded the 2006 Malcolm Baldrige National Quality Award, perhaps the most prestigious award given to business by the federal government.

Premier purchases $27 billion a year of medical supplies and services for 1,500 hospitals. In 2002 the company was accused of accepting something akin to payola from large manufacturers that kept small companies and their cutting-edge products from being sold to hospitals.

The accusations were untrue, CEO Richard Norling said in an interview Tuesday, but the scrutiny proved to be a learning experience for the company. He says Premier also learned as it went through the Baldrige process and made changes designed to allow small companies in the medical industry to better compete.

Norling said it “feels incredibly good,” to come full circle from being a company under scrutiny. He said that Baldrige examiners were aware of the company's history and had asked him if there was anything that might turn up later to tarnish Baldrige's image if it were to go out on a limb and give Premier the award.

“The Baldrige Award's judges determined that Premier … lived up to (the award's) very high standards,” Baldrige director Harry Hertz said in an e-mail. “Premier has been a leader in setting ethical practice guidelines.”

The first Baldrige was awarded in 1988. Premier won in the service category, not the health care category that was introduced in 1999 and this year accounted for 45 of the total 76 applicants. There were no winners this year in manufacturing or education. Other winners:

·North Mississippi Medical Center, a 650-bed hospital in Tupelo that serves 24 rural counties, in the health care division. Its charitable donations, charity care, medical cost savings and volunteer services total $70 million a year, and in 2006 it will treat 157,000 people through free health fairs, immunization and other programs at churches and shopping centers.

·Mesa Products of Tulsa, with 70 employees and $25 million in annual revenue, in the small-business division. Mesa prevents underground and underwater pipelines and tanks from corroding through an electrochemical process called cathodic protection, which is a science that dates back to 1824. By applying an electrical current to the exposed steel surface, corrosion can be prevented on buried and submerged steel structures.

EU Clears UCB Takeover Of Schwarz Pharma (AP-YBIZ)

EU Waves Through $4.23B Takeover of Germany's Schwarz Pharma by Belgian Drugmaker UCB

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- Belgian drugmaker UCB SA won EU approval Tuesday to take over Germany's Schwarz Pharma AG, clearing the last regulatory hurdle to the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0097354

The acquisition, which Schwarz's board is recommending to shareholders, would create a new company with revenue of more than 3.3 billion euros ($4.23 billion) and yearly research and development spending of 770 million euros ($986.91 million).

UCB said it received a green light from U.S. regulators on Nov. 10 and was now waiting for Schwarz shareholders to tender their shares by a Dec. 8 deadline.

The European Commission cleared the deal despite overlaps between the two because they both produce a small number of over-the-counter and prescription medicines in some European countries, from antihistamines, iron supplements, heart disease drugs and asthma treatments.

But their combined market shares were not high enough to see them disrupt the market, it said.

"Customers and competitors identified a large number of alternative suppliers," the Commission said. "Indeed, intense competition coming from several players with significant market shares and strong reputation will continue to characterize these markets."

UCB said in October that the deal would help position it as a global pharmaceutical player.

Schwarz Pharma specializes in cardiovascular drugs, but also makes medicine used to treat Parkinson's Disease, including the Neupro patch, and epilepsy.

UCB transformed itself from a chemical and pharmaceutical maker to a biotechnology and pharmaceuticals business with its acquisition of Britain's Celltech Group in 2004. The company makes drugs used to treat cancer, inflammation and allergies.

After the deal, the company will be called UCB and be based in Brussels.

Bear In The Air (WSJ)

By Holman W. Jenkins

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Last's week proposed merger of US Airways and Delta Air Lines is the leading edge of a consolidation wave that will finally fix the problems of the airline industry . . . and check out our selection of historic bridges for sale.

Life affords most other industries legal and structural ways to shield themselves from all-out price warfare -- through patents and branding, product differentiation, or various kinds of competitive "friction." Not so the airlines. The Internet has made pricing transparent. Lenders allow start-up or discount carriers to fly the latest, spiffiest models. The high-margin business traveler accounts for a smaller share of the market nowadays, and even he's become a lot less price-insensitive. And no industry is more discommoded by antitrust's primitive and ill-advised intolerance of cooperative behavior by competitors.

High fixed costs, low variable costs, and a customer who will switch for a nickel's difference in price: Add the balkanization of the global air traffic market, which leaves U.S. carriers uncomfortably exposed to the ups and downs of the domestic economy, and you have a formula for an industry that, on average, loses money even amid the gentler business cycles of the past 30 years.

Don't expect consolidation to change this, even if the current murmurfest really does result in a flurry of deals to reduce the Big Six to two or three. There's a lesson in the special genius of US Airways CEO Doug Parker's proposed acquisition of Delta -- a deal that might have been inspired by the old joke about two hunters trying to outrun a bear.

This is his third pass at Delta, and yet notice how the pairing seldom has turned up on Wall Street's list of the most likely combinations. Most analysts' idea of a rational airline merger is one combining two carriers with complementary networks -- minimum overlap, allowing each to extend its service into new markets. Mergers with lots of overlap aren't favored, and not only because of antitrust concerns. Such combinations serve mainly to eliminate capacity, which benefits competing carriers as much as it does the merged airlines, who alone must bear the costs and disruptions of the merger.

And yet the market has cheered on Mr. Parker's proposal nonetheless. Investors seem to understand that his plan recognizes that the goal is not to outrun the bear, but the other hunters.

First off, he estimates that fully half the benefits of the merger would materialize only if he can snag Delta while it's still in bankruptcy, thus using a judge's power to toss out aircraft leases and labor contracts without financial penalty or messy bargaining. Being able to restructure his fleet and workforce more quickly than his competitors can is a crucial advantage.

Secondly, the consolidation of Delta and US Air would occur over a network centered on some of the nation's most gridlocked airports. US Airways already controls the biggest market share at Washington National; combined with Delta, it would end up with the largest market share at LaGuardia, even after forced gate divestitures. The federal government has struggled with how to allocate operating slots at these two airports (plus Kennedy and O'Hare), and it remains nearly impossible for new entrants to gain access. Mr. Parker's new carrier, as the biggest in the East, would naturally be well-positioned to capture much of these scarcity rents.

True, the benefits might be modest and fleeting, and potentially lost if the merger doesn't proceed with a minimum of fuss. But the new carrier (which he would call Delta) might well enjoy two or three years of nicking passengers for modestly higher fares before the next downturn. And because of the way the industry is leveraged, a few nickels and dimes of extra margin on tickets results in a big impact in the bottom line and the share price.

In turn, Mr. Parker would be in the catbird seat for the industry's next bloodletting -- and don't doubt such a bloodletting will recur, as it has in every downturn since deregulation in 1978. Right now the industry is reporting a surge in profits amid an upswing that has seen traffic growing faster than airlines can lay on new planes and crews. But that's par for the course and no reason to assume the airline sector is about to become profitable in the long haul.

OK, we're reading his mind, but what makes his deal appealing points to why other carriers are unlikely to rush into mergers of their own. Their costs in pain and anguish would be the same or greater, but with little prospect of being able to charge significantly higher fares, even in an industry where the number of competitors is reduced.

Alas, one thing that might help -- a relaxation of antitrust rules to allow airlines to enter and exit code-sharing agreements at will -- almost certainly won't transpire. Such a break with intellectual precedent would be the most direct way to turn a chronically unstable airline industry into one that is reasonably prosperous and provides the optimum of service in terms of frequency and destinations even in the grimmer parts of the business cycle.

There was a time when Washington might have been willing to experiment with such a daring notion if only to get itself off the hook for the pension plans of failing carriers. Delta's then-President Fred Reid publicly ventured three years ago at an industry conference the hopeful possibility that the "Department of Justice and the Department of Transportation ought to have an additional arrow in their quiver, to enable scheduling, pricing and yield management to be done in a centralized entity [by alliances of airlines] which was immune from antitrust laws."

It will take at least another industry meltdown to put such a heterodox brainstorm back on the table. Ditto the equally adventurous idea of allowing foreign ownership of U.S. domestic carriers. Until then, investing in airline shares will be a game for speculators, not buy-and-holders.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Firm Blames Farmers, 'Act Of God' For Rice Contamination (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

The company that created the experimental variety of genetically engineered rice found this summer to have contaminated the U.S. rice supply contends that rice farmers and an "act of God" are to blame for the inadvertent release of the unapproved crop.

Those are among the assertions by Bayer CropScience of Research Triangle Park, N.C., in response to a class-action lawsuit filed by hundreds of farmers in Arkansas and Missouri.

The 30-page response offers the first clue to how the company plans to defend itself against the 15 class-action lawsuits filed by farmers, who allege that they stand to lose millions of dollars because of the contamination.

Lawyers for the farmers said they had expected the company to deny responsibility, but were offended by its attempt to blame farmers. The lawyers said their clients had no reason to suspect that the seeds they were planting in recent years were contaminated by Bayer's unapproved variety.

"The farmers are innocent victims," said Don Downing, a principal at Gray, Ritter & Graham PC, the St. Louis firm that filed the largest suit, in U.S. District Court in eastern Missouri.

Denying any culpability, the Bayer response variously blames the escape of its gene-altered variety of long-grain race, LL601, on "unavoidable circumstances which could not have been prevented by anyone"; "an act of God"; and farmers' "own negligence, carelessness, and/or comparative fault."

Asked how farmers were at fault, Bayer spokesman Greg Coffey said the company does not comment on pending litigation.

Bayer conducted field tests of LL601 from 1999 to 2001 in Louisiana, then dropped the project without seeking government approval to market it. This year, LL601 was found to be widespread in U.S. long-grain rice, prompting Europe to cut off imports and throwing the rice futures market into turmoil.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is investigating how the variety escaped from test plots into farmers' fields, where it was quietly amplified for years until its discovery. The seeds and plants of LL601 look virtually identical to those of the popular conventional variety with which they had become mixed, said Steve Linscombe, director of Louisiana State University's rice research station in Crowley.

The day the contamination was announced in August, Bayer asked the government to approve the variety. A decision is still pending. Meanwhile, lawsuits have been filed on behalf of about 300 rice farmers in the South.

The company's response to the largest of those suits asserts that Bayer's test plots were in full compliance with Agriculture Department rules. Critics of U.S. biotech regulations have said that, if true, that only proves the inadequacy of those rules and calls into question whether the department can fairly investigate the problem.

"It is unfortunate that Bayer, rather than accept responsibility for its actions, is instead trying to pin the blame on the American rice farmers, the very people most detrimentally affected by Bayer's conduct here," said Adam Levitt, a Chicago lawyer who has filed five class-action suits for rice farmers.

Another 1918? (WP)

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

ON MONDAY, the Department of Health and Human Services released a progress report on its preparations for a flu pandemic in the United States. Not stressed, but nevertheless clear, was how much the country would rely on antiviral drugs such as Tamiflu, a drug that can reduce the severity of flu symptoms, to treat Americans while new vaccines were developed. Public health authorities are frantically stockpiling Tamiflu, and they hope to have more than 50 million courses of antiviral medication on hand by the end of 2008 to administer in the event of an outbreak.

But a report released by the World Health Organization earlier this month said that strains of the H5N1 "bird flu" virus -- a likely candidate for mutation into a pandemic flu -- might be developing resistance to Tamiflu and other antivirals. The influenza virus is unpredictable and quick to mutate. No one knows how, or how fast, the bird flu virus will change, so no one knows if the reported cases of Tamiflu resistance will remain isolated or if the virus will become increasingly more resistant to standard antivirals -- as it has with other drugs. But the country faces the possibility that its reserve of Tamiflu might not do much to counter a pandemic flu.

The federal government is also collecting doses of vaccines that protect against existing strains of the bird flu virus, though on a much smaller scale than its purchase of Tamiflu. These shots, the HHS report said, might eliminate or ease symptoms caused by new forms of the virus. But the WHO report was pessimistic about the effectiveness of the vaccines against strains of the virus they were not designed to fight.

In other words, if a pandemic flu began spreading tomorrow, the government's most effective strategies for saving lives could be old-fashioned quarantine and public education, techniques akin to those used during the great flu pandemic of 1918. It is not surprising, then, that the federal government currently estimates that as many as 2 million people could die if a virulent and contagious strain of flu hit the United States.

Given the capriciousness of the virus, says Columbia epidemiologist Stephen S. Morse, the government has "no silver bullet" in its arsenal. But HHS should consider investing heavily in technologies such as the reverse genetic engineering of flu vaccines, a process that promises to speed up vaccine production dramatically. The federal government should also focus more on aiding the World Health Organization's efforts to monitor avian flu and to improve the health infrastructure in Southeast Asia. Added American assistance to the understaffed WHO in Indonesia, Thailand and Vietnam could save many more American lives than 50 million courses of antivirals.

Mining Firms Again Eyeing Navajo Land (LAT)

By Judy Pasternak, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

Demand for uranium is soaring. But the tribe vows a 'knockdown, drag-out legal battle.'

Crownpoint, N.M. — When mining companies started calling tribal offices last year, Navajo President Joe Shirley Jr. issued an edict to employees: Don't answer any questions. Report all contacts to the Navajo attorney general.

Decades after the Cold War uranium boom ended, leaving a trail of poisonous waste across the Navajo Nation, the mining industry is back, seeking to tap the region's vast uranium deposits once again.

Companies are staking claims, buying mineral rights and applying for permits on the edge of the tribal homeland. They make no secret of their desire to mine within the reservation as well.

That prospect has turned neighbor against neighbor and touched off legal, political and financial maneuvering far from Navajo lands.

Fifty years ago, a nuclear arms race propelled the search for uranium. Today, the driving force is the quest for new sources of energy. China and India are building nuclear reactors at a rapid pace to fuel their growing economies, and the Bush administration is pushing to expand nuclear energy in this country to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

With demand increasing, the price of uranium has climbed to more than $60 a pound. Six years ago, it was as low as $7.

DOJ_NMG_0097357

Mining companies are extracting uranium in Texas, Wyoming and Nebraska, and are taking steps to mine in Colorado.

But Navajo country, covering some 27,000 square miles in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah, is the biggest prize of all — "the Saudi Arabia of uranium," in the words of Mark Pelizza, a vice president of Uranium Resources Inc.

A subsidiary of the Texas-based company holds a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to mine in and around Crownpoint, a crossroads town of 3,000 Navajos that sits on the largest known undeveloped uranium deposit in the U.S.

URI officials are seeking permission to begin mining on a test basis in the nearby township of Church Rock, N.M., in 2008. If results there convince regulators that the project is environmentally sound, the company will be allowed to start operations in Crownpoint.

Mining in both places is expected to yield 42 million pounds of uranium over 20 years — worth more than $2.5 billion at today's prices.

Two Canadian firms — Strathmore Minerals Corp. and Energy Metals Corp. — are also laying the groundwork for mining.

Altogether, the three companies have acquired rights to tens of thousands of acres just outside the reservation's southeast boundary. URI alone has invested more than $25 million.

Mining executives say they plan to extract uranium from underground rock formations through an environmentally benign chemical process. There will be no blasting, no unsightly pits and no lasting contamination, they say.

Unconvinced, the tribal council last year passed a ban on mining or processing uranium in "Navajo Indian country," a term that embraces both the reservation and neighboring communities such as Crownpoint and Church Rock that participate in tribal government.

Federal courts have recognized "Indian country" as extending beyond the reservation's boundaries, but the ban seems destined to be challenged in court.

After the measure took effect in April 2005, mining concerns kept calling the Navajo capital, Window Rock, Ariz., hoping to secure support for their projects. So Shirley signed Executive Order 02-2005, which instructs tribal employees to avoid any "communications with uranium company representatives."

The directive infuriated mining executives. "You tell me, what kind of a democracy is that?" asked John DeJoia, a Strathmore vice president. "They've got tremendous resources out there. They're a very poor nation. That could change."

Robert McNair, director of capital projects for Dejour Enterprises Ltd., a Canadian energy company, asked state officials for help. He reached Derrith Watchman-Moore, New Mexico's deputy environment secretary.

A Navajo who had served as the tribe's environmental director, Watchman-Moore told McNair there would be no new uranium mining until past contamination had been purged. "My strategy was to discourage them from asking for a permit," she said.

It worked. Dejour decided to focus instead on a huge deposit in Saskatchewan.

The tribal government has also tried to block financing for the projects. When Shirley learned Itochu Corp. was considering investing $32 million in the URI venture, he asked the Japanese conglomerate not to do it.

"The Navajo people have made our wishes and our laws clear: We do not want further uranium mining in our communities," Shirley said in a letter to Itochu's chairman.

But URI, Strathmore and Energy Metals have pressed on. They have an important ally in Sen. Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.), who has been a forceful advocate for nuclear power as chairman of the Senate Energy Committee.

In the spring, Domenici pushed Department of Energy officials to meet with mining executives who were worried that the government might sell large quantities of uranium from a 135-million-pound federal reserve that is costly to maintain. The mining officials feared such a step would depress the price of the metal and make it harder to finance their projects.

An assistant energy secretary assured the executives that there would be no big sales before 2009, according to records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act. Later, the Energy Department drafted a long-term strategy for the reserve and invited the industry's views.

Mining companies say about 100 skilled laborers will be hired at each site. Those jobs, along with income from mineral leases, could help ease pervasive poverty among Navajos, they say.

Opponents say the environmental risks are too great. One of URI's planned subterranean minefields is within a mile of six wells that supply drinking water for about 15,000 people in and around Crownpoint. Chronic exposure to uranium in drinking water has been associated with kidney disease and increased risk of cancer.

URI's federal license requires it to provide replacement wells, but tribal officials worry that contaminated water could migrate toward the new wells. No company has ever mined so close to a public water supply using the technology employed by URI.

The uncertainties unsettle many Navajos, who are surrounded by the legacy of past mining — abandoned shafts, tainted wells, radioactive dust.

DOJ_NMG_0097358

"All these promises … I don't believe a word of it," said Larry King, a 49-year-old Navajo who raises cattle on his family's ranch in Church Rock. "I've seen too much mining. I'm not convinced."

The right solution?

Most of the projects would employ "solution mining," in which water fortified with oxygen — and sometimes bicarbonate — is injected into an underground formation of porous sandstone. The solution washes uranium and other minerals from the sandstone. The uranium-laden water is then pumped to the surface. There, the uranium is filtered out, dried and trucked away for further processing.

The oxygen solution is pumped back into the aquifer, and the process is repeated until the sandstone has yielded all the uranium that can be removed economically.

The amount of water poured back into the ground is slightly less than was removed, creating a low-pressure area. This causes groundwater to flow into the mining zone rather than away from it, and prevents uranium and other contaminants from spreading, according to the companies.

Just in case, they plan to ring mining zones with test wells so that any movement of pollutants will be detected promptly.

After an area has been fully mined, the producers would restore the aquifer by repeatedly pumping water to the surface, cleaning it with the same process used to purify bottled drinking water and injecting it back into the ground.

Solution mining has a three-decade track record in the U.S. Five facilities are operating today — one in Wyoming, one in Nebraska and three in Texas.

"I'm not aware of any major disasters," said Tibor Rozgonyi, head of the mining engineering department at Colorado School of Mines. "You can control the contamination, if you design correctly."

The questions revolve around whether aquifers can be permanently cleaned.

In Wyoming, the state Department of Environmental Quality has approved the closure of two solution-mining sites in the last two years. But it took at least six years to clean the aquifers to the state's satisfaction. "We think they can do it faster, in two or three years," said Richard Chancellor, the Wyoming official overseeing the restoration.

In a boom and bust industry, time matters, he said: "What if they went bankrupt and walked away?" Bonds posted by mining concerns might not cover all the costs of cleanup and monitoring, skeptics say.

In Texas, Uranium Resources Inc. is having difficulty cleaning a solution mine south of Corpus Christi. George Rice, a hydrogeologist hired by a review board in Kleberg County, found elevated concentrations of uranium, radium-226 and other pollutants more than five years after mining had ended.

In his report, Rice wrote that a URI official told him a request to relax the state's cleanup standards was "inevitable."

The problem, Rice wrote, is that once a closure is approved, the company can stop pumping, cleaning and monitoring groundwater. "There is no guarantee that the water will not migrate beyond the mine's boundaries," he wrote.

Pelizza of URI says it shouldn't matter if the water in a solution-mining zone isn't totally purified as long as it meets standards for its pre-mining use. "How clean," he asked, "is clean enough?"

Troubled history

The Puerco River, which runs along the southern boundary of the Navajo reservation, is usually dry in the summer. But early on July 16, 1979, the channel roared with 93 million gallons of radioactive water.

An earthen dam at a uranium mill in Church Rock had ruptured, releasing liquefied tailings, a waste product of traditional uranium production.

The result was the largest accidental release of radioactive material in American history. The surge was detected 50 miles downstream, in a stretch of the river that Navajos use to graze cattle and irrigate their corn.

The dam was considered state of the art, officials of United Nuclear Corp., which operated the mill and a nearby uranium mine, later told Congress.

The Environmental Protection Agency is trying to decontaminate groundwater at the site. But project manager Mark Purcell said the task may prove impossible. Some of the tainted water is moving toward Navajo land, he added.

With this experience as a backdrop, Navajo organizations and environmental groups are fighting URI's plan to make Church Rock a test site for solution mining.

A tribal water resources manager, John Leeper, noted in a written declaration to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission that private wells tap the Church Rock aquifer "for human drinking water."

King, the rancher, joined the board of the major opposition group, Eastern Navajo Dine Against Uranium Mining. (Dine, pronounced dih-NEH, is Navajo for "people.") The organization joined outside environmentalists in appealing URI's federal license, stalling the project for years.

It has sponsored protests with a rallying cry of leetso doo'da — Navajo for "no uranium." Its leaders have traveled to Washington, D.C., and the United Nations to argue against a resumption of mining.

DOJ_NMG_0097359

"We don't want nobody doing experiments around our area, no," King said.

To Juan Velasquez, Strathmore's vice president for environmental and regulatory affairs, such talk is "the bane of the uranium industry. We're all fighting against emotional arguments."

Velasquez knows mining's troubled history in Church Rock. He became president of United Nuclear four years after the 1979 tailings spill, with responsibility for cleaning up the mill.

In 1992, the NRC ordered the company to set aside more than $16 million to guarantee completion of the cleanup. Instead, on Velasquez's instructions, the money was turned over to United Nuclear's parent company.

The commission imposed an unusually large $100,000 fine for "willful violation of an NRC order." United Nuclear agreed to pay $99,000 without admitting wrongdoing. Velasquez called that "a business decision" and said "there was never a time in which any surety was at risk."

Before Velasquez's arrival, United Nuclear had closed its Church Rock uranium mine, leaving behind a pile of radioactive waste ore. The closure met federal standards then in place. In August, a heavy rain flushed radioactive material from the mine into an arroyo.

Velasquez said he had no concerns that today's stricter mining regulations might likewise prove inadequate in the future. The Navajos, he said, have more pressing health issues than uranium mining.

"We could worry ourselves to death that one additional cancer in a million will be caused," Velasquez said. "It sounds stereotypical, but these Indians jump in their car and drive 90 miles per hour down the road. But they won't take the risk on uranium."

Twenty-five miles northeast of Church Rock, the groundwater in Crownpoint is pure. Uranium permeates the sandstone in the aquifer, but it is tightly bound.

Water from the six municipal wells, famous for its sweet taste, contains trace concentrations of uranium far below the EPA maximum for drinking water, federal regulators say.

URI wants to transform an old uranium drilling site into a solution-mining zone and processing plant.

For now, the lone employee at the site is Benjamin House, who signed on with URI 10 years ago, when it was the only company pursuing a mining license. A former delegate to the Navajo council, House has purchased airtime on the Navajo radio station to press the company's case. He has also booked tours of URI's Texas facilities for tribal and local leaders.

He steels himself for confrontation as he makes his rounds. URI plans to mine a second site west of Crownpoint. When House stood there recently, in a sparse field of tumbleweeds and pinon trees, a red pickup halted abruptly on the nearest dirt road. The driver leaned out the window to snarl at House.

House knows what his detractors think: "I sold out." But, he said, some Navajos approach him on the sly, saying they could use the jobs mining would bring.

House's most vocal backers are nine extended Navajo families who signed mineral leases with URI in the early '90s. They look forward to receiving royalties if mining gets underway.

Among them is Bessie Largo, a widow who makes ends meet by weaving rugs. Speaking in Navajo translated by House, she said her acreage was not suited for farming. "We are supposed to make a living off that land, and that is exactly what we are trying to do," she said.

Preparing for battle

The tribe claims jurisdiction over any territory where mining would affect Navajo residents, regardless of who owns the land or the mineral rights.

"A sovereign has a right to protect its people against environmental threats," said David Taylor, an attorney in the Navajo Department of Justice.

Mining executives, however, are honing arguments that the tribal ban does not apply to their lease-holdings in an area known as the "checkerboard," at the reservation's southeast edge.

Here, the tribe's communal land gives way to a hodgepodge of parcels held by federal and state agencies, private businesses and other owners. This is where the planned Church Rock and Crownpoint solution-mining sites are.

Strathmore is leasing land owned by the U.S. Bureau of Land Management. URI plans to mine on land the Navajos bought from the Santa Fe Railroad in 1929. The railroad retained the mineral rights, and a successor sold them to URI.

The uranium firms don't hide their eagerness to move onto the reservation proper. Pelizza sees the checkerboard projects as the key to achieving that goal.

"There's a concern. Once we've addressed those concerns, maybe the Navajos will see that and make exceptions," he said.

Taylor, the tribal lawyer, says it won't happen.

"We have no intention of letting them mine without a knockdown, drag-out legal battle," he said.

Levels Of Radioactive Material At Indian Point 7 Times Higher Than Reported (AP)

AP, November 21, 2006

BUCHANAN, N.Y. (AP) _ Government tests indicate that amounts of radioactive material found in ground water under the Indian Point nuclear power plants were seven times higher than reported by the laboratory hired by the complex to test for leaks.

Testing conducted for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the state Department of Environmental Conservation revealed that strontium 90 levels from the August samples ranged from 5 to 30 picocuries per liter.

Federal regulations say that the levels of strontium 90, a radioactive chemical linked to bone cancer and leukemia, must be lower than 8 picocuries per liter for water to be considered safe enough to drink.

Nonetheless, the NRC and state health officials have said for more than a year that the public is not in danger because the radioactive isotope is not reaching any sources of drinking water.

When Teledyne Brown Engineering, of Knoxville, Tenn., conducted tests on behalf of Indian Point, the company found only between 2 and 6 picocuries of strontium 90 per liter.

Entergy Nuclear Northeast, which owns the plant, has suspended the contract with Teledyne until officials can understand the discrepancy in testing.

"We've taken a new round of samples and are sending them to another lab," said Donald Mayer, Indian Point's lead engineer on the radiation leak.

Entergy plans to remove the source of the leak by storing spent fuel into special dry-storage casks at the site that can later be drained and diluted from a spent-fuel pool. The company has also begun to demineralize the water to lower the concentration of strontium and dilute the source of the contamination that is leaking.

Dale Klein, the new chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission last month ordered an independent review of how it oversees the Indian Point nuclear power plants.

Klein, who was installed in July, ordered NRC staff to develop a plan "because of repeated inquiries about the adequacy of NRC oversight and licensee performance" at the two IP reactors in Buchanan, on the Hudson River 35 miles north of midtown Manhattan.

Local FBI To Receive New Agent (DURHER)

By Joe Hanel, Herald Denver Bureau

Durango Herald, November 22, 2006

Murder rate on Ute reservations 20 times state average

DENVER - The Federal Bureau of Investigation will send a new special agent to the Four Corners in large part to deal with a combined murder rate on the two Ute Indian reservations that is 20 times the state average.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said he secured the commitment from Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday. The region currently has one FBI agent, who works out of Durango. Southwest Colorado might get an additional federal prosecutor, as well, according to Salazar.

The murder rate on the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute reservations combined is 75 per 100,000 people, compared to 3.7 per 100,000 for the rest of Colorado, according to numbers the U.S. Attorney's Office in Denver gave to Salazar's office.

Salazar spoke to Gonzales on Friday during a tour of the Supermax prison outside Cañon City. Salazar said the two talked about the need for increased law enforcement on the Southern Ute and Ute Mountain Ute reservations.

"I was pleased to get his commitment to send an additional FBI agent to the area to address the growing lawlessness in the area as well as his pledge to examine the possibility of sending an additional assistant U.S. attorney to the area," Salazar said in a prepared statement.

Salazar cited an "unacceptable number of unsolved crimes" on the reservations because of a lack of law enforcement officers in the region.

The Durango FBI branch is intended to be a two-person office, and it has had two agents in the past.

The new FBI agent will have to go through the typical federal application and hiring process, said Special Agent Renee Vonder Haar, the FBI's spokeswoman in Denver. She doesn't know how long it will take to hire a new agent.

"I definitely know they have been talking about it, but I don't know when it will happen," Vonder Haar said.

The Department of Justice reports its violent-crime statistics in terms of crimes per 100,000 people. Because the population of the reservations is well below 100,000, a murder rate of 75 per 100,000 does not mean there have been 75 murders in the last year.

At least two recent homicide cases from Towaoc are working their way through the courts. Samson Lameman is accused of shooting Tasha Posey after a drunken game of Russian roulette in May. Peter Begay faces second-degree murder charges for the death of 2-year-old Davery Oshley last November.

FBI Profiler Inspires Actor (USAT)

By Bill Keveney, Usa Today

USA Today, November 22, 2006

CULVER CITY, Calif. — Jim Clemente keeps a picture in his wallet of a boy he helped save as a member of the FBI's Behavioral Analysis Unit.

It reminds him of why he does his job. It reminds the actors on CBS' Criminal Minds of the real people they portray.

MIND OF A ' CRIMINAL': Criminal Minds hits its stride

"I saw that he carries this picture with him wherever he goes, and that the saving of these children is what his life is all about," says Mandy Patinkin, who became friends with Clemente during research for his role as BAU profiler Jason Gideon.

Through Patinkin, Clemente established a bond with others connected to the show, providing informal advice about profiling and the BAU.

Now, in a rare occurrence for an agent still with the FBI, Clemente has written a Minds episode, tonight's "Lessons Learned" (9 ET/PT), in which the agents interrogate a Guantanamo Bay detainee in the hope of stopping an imminent terrorist attack in the USA.

Clemente, 47, says the collaboration works well, creating an accurate picture of the BAU for the public and alerting other law enforcement agencies to its services, particularly in cases in which time is of the essence.

"In one hour, they can reach 15 million people," he says.

While researching at FBI headquarters in Quantico, Va., Patinkin couldn't quite get his hands around his role until he met Clemente, a former prosecutor who has served with the elite BAU since 1998. "It completely set me free in terms of his humanity, his nature, his kindness and concern," Patinkin says. "I pray that when I talk to him, some of it is left behind in me."

The two also had something in common: cancer. Clemente was on leave from the FBI at the time, undergoing treatment for lymphoma. Patinkin provided support, having recovered from his own bout with cancer.

"Mandy has been a great friend," says Clemente, who spoke on set in late October. With his recovery going well, he was scheduled to return to active duty in the BAU.

One tactic Patinkin learned from Clemente, included in an interrogation scene, is that engaging the subject as a human being and listening carefully can yield needed information.

"If you treat the subject with dignity and respect, that's the best way to promote interaction, to make it more likely that he will talk to you," Clemente says.

If the subject responds, profilers can pick up non-verbal clues. In the case of Middle Easterners, for example, dialect or use of certain words can tell investigators where the subject is from.

Clemente says tonight's episode is fiction, written with the advice of his nephew, a film student. In one scene based on real experience, some team members who haven't flown to Guantanamo are thrown off by the "Gitmo twist," a sharp turning maneuver necessary for landing.

Clemente used the episode to honor a BAU friend and colleague, Andrew Bingaman, who died of lymphoma the day Clemente turned in his episode outline. He named a character after Bingaman. "Andy fought cancer and terrorism with unbounded bravery," Clemente says.

Dozens Arrested In Drug Sweep (PROJO)

By Gregory Smith, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, November 22, 2006

PROVIDENCE — In an investigation aimed at especially brazen drug dealing on street corners, the city police and federal drug agents have arrested 70 people on narcotics and weapons charges and are seeking to arrest another 27.

Law enforcement authorities began rounding up the suspects last week, punctuating an investigation nicknamed Operation Crackdown that was announced yesterday. Some corners where the drug peddlers stood three, four or five deep, depending on the weather or the time of day, have been cleared, said police Sgt. Fabio Zuena.

The operation incorporates a new approach in which seven suspects with minor criminal records were separated from the crop destined for arrest and will be offered what Police Chief Dean M. Esserman called “a second chance” to straighten out their lives and avoid another arrest.

Those seven — four juveniles and three adults — will be called into a room for a dose of “tough love” by their neighbors, community leaders and the police, Esserman said, and offered education, substance-abuse treatment and employment opportunities.

They will be told, he said: “You may not return to that corner. We don’t have to catch you. We’ve already caught you. We just have to have the [arrest] warrant signed the moment you return to that corner.” Then an array of social services will be pressed on them.

Operation Crackdown was described as unusual in its duration and scope. Beginning in April and lasting through last month, investigators researched the drug-dealing hot spots throughout Providence and focused on an area of Upper South Providence with the Lockwood Plaza public-housing development as the epicenter.

They identified 104 people as investigation targets, including the seven who are avoiding immediate arrest, and made a number of undercover purchases of cocaine and handguns. Esserman and Mayor David N. Cicilline said that list makes it “the largest narcotics and gun investigation” in Providence police history. Brian Crowell, assistant special agent in charge of the New England division of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, said the 72 arrested are “the most ever targeted in a single drug investigation in Rhode Island.”

Investigators bought or seized four kilos of crack and cocaine and four handguns — there were 150 individual drug buys — and seized $38,000 in currency.

Operation Crackdown is inspired by the Urban League of Rhode Island, whose national organization wants to replicate the success of the so-called Highpoint Initiative in Highpoint, N.C. The Highpoint program, which has been popularized in academic law enforcement research, took aim at “open-air drug markets” by removing street dealers in an effort to reduce drug-related crime and violence in neighborhoods.

The new wrinkle in the Highpoint Initiative is the organized and swift offer of help to offenders who merit help, drawing in religious and other community leaders and social-service agencies.

Dennis Langley, president and chief executive officer of the Urban League of Rhode Island, said Providence was one of three cities asked to participate in the Highpoint Initiative because his chapter and Esserman are held in high esteem by his national organization. His chapter is taking responsibility for working with the seven minor offenders.

“We are not about arresting people,” Langley said at the formal announcement in the auditorium of the Public Safety Complex. “We are about changing communities and changing lives for the benefit of our society.”

Langley and police supervisors said they hope to dispel fear and reduce the feeling of disorder in certain neighborhoods by reducing or eliminating street dealing.

“Over the years we have had so many individuals complaining that we cannot live in our neighborhoods because of the drug trafficking,” Langley said.

Only time will tell, said police Lt. Thomas Verdi, commander of the city police Narcotics and Organized Crime Bureau, whether a program launched in the much smaller city of Highpoint, which is in a semirural region, can be successfully transplanted to larger cities with different demographics. Tucson and Kansas City also are trying it.

Lockwood Plaza and its immediate vicinity was chosen as the focus of the investigation, according to the police, because it was one of the more overt and busy drug markets and because the target area has numerous calls for police service. The target area is bounded by Broad, Myrtle and Dudley streets, Prairie Avenue and Stewart Street.

Thirty-three of those targeted are from in and around Lockwood Plaza, according to Esserman, which is a privately managed property of the Providence Housing Authority. The authority acquired Lockwood Plaza in a federal government foreclosure and spent $6 million to $7 million in renovations three years ago.

The housing authority tries to screen out prospective tenants with criminal records and has a longstanding policy of evicting tenants who are caught in drug-dealing or other serious crimes or who invite in relatives and friends who get involved in crime.

Although there was a target area, the probe spread citywide and arrests were made in a number of neighborhoods. Those arrested range in age from 14 to 49 years old. Most have been convicted of felony crimes and a majority are violators of their probation or parole, according to Verdi.

Nine of the suspects have been singled out for federal prosecution — the roundup was triggered last Wednesday, after a federal grand jury handed up their secret indictments — in large part because they were allegedly dealing in amounts of drugs that will subject them to harsher punishment in the federal system. The rest are to be prosecuted by the state, including the 27 not in custody but who are named in arrest warrants.

DOJ_NMG_0097363

Among the nine to be prosecuted federally are Khalid Mason, 30, formerly of Pavilion Avenue, Providence, and Derrick Isom, 31, of Dunnell Avenue, Pawtucket, who are accused of running a crack house. They led a gang of street dealers in the Lockwood Plaza neighborhood, according to Verdi.

Mason, who had been named in a Providence police arrest warrant for at least two years, was caught by U.S. deputy marshals, living under an assumed name on the Mashantucket Pequot reservation in Ledyard, Conn. While a fugitive, according to Verdi, he had lived in California and Atlanta.

The nine are: Juan "Weezy" Forbes, 20, of Knight Street, Providence, who is charged with conspiracy to distribute and distribution of at least 50 grams of crack and with three counts of being a felon in possession of a firearm; Eric Grundy, 20, of Vandewater Street, Providence, charged with conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack and distributing crack; Daniel McClain, 28, of Stanwood Street, Providence, charged with conspiring with Grundy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack and distributing at least 50 grams of crack; Donnell Jenkins, 28, of Northup Street, Cranston, charged with two counts of distributing crack, one of which involves at least 5 grams.

Also, Ronald Hill, 35, of Broad Street, Providence, charged with two counts of distributing crack, one of which involves at least 5 grams; Fernell Brown, 20, of Knight Street, Providence, charged with two counts of distributing at least 5 grams of crack; and Isom and Mason, both of whom were charged with conspiracy to distribute at least 50 grams of crack, distributing at least 50 grams of crack, and using an apartment to traffic in crack.

Conviction of distributing or conspiring to distribute at least 50 grams of crack carries a maximum punishment of life in prison.

All except Grundy have been arraigned in U.S. District Court and pleaded not guilty and are being detained. Grundy is serving a state sentence and has not yet been arraigned.

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 22, 2006

THE STORY SO FAR

Temple grad student Akhil Bansal and his dad in India are making millions smuggling pills to Americans who buy them online. Today's installment begins as DEA agents race to Australia, hoping to head off a move that could ruin their big case. It is October 2004.

ABOARD QANTAS

FLIGHT 12

DEA agent Eric Russ sprawled across three seats on a southbound 747, earplugs in, eyeshades on, sound asleep.

His partner tried to relax, too, but several hours into the overnight flight to Sydney, Carlos Aquino was wide awake. Carlos had been busting drug dealers since 1969, when he was a trim military policeman in Vietnam. But he had never worked a case so important, so complex.

And now, with just three days' notice, he was scrambling to get to western Australia.

Carlos looked into the dark Pacific sky, then pulled out a 41-page report marked "DEA SENSITIVE."

The document summarized the six-month investigation: Agents traced three packages of generic pills at the Philadelphia airport to a Chester storefront. A receipt at the storefront led them to something called Rx-mart.com, which was hosted by a Web server in Texas. Keen detective work by FBI agent Jason Huff revealed that the person paying Rx-mart.com's bill was a cocky 25-year-old named Andrew Shackleton who lived in Australia, where he appeared to run a multimillion-dollar online pill ring.

DEA believed that Shackleton used pill suppliers around the globe, including bit players such as Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal.

DEA hoped to extradite Shackleton and charge him under a U.S. law - "operating a continuing criminal enterprise" - that carried a huge hammer, a 20-year minimum mandatory sentence. The law had been aimed for use against mobsters and drug kingpins. This would be among the first uses against Internet pill pushers.

At DEA's request, the Australian Federal Police had checked Shackleton's bank records and shadowed him in Perth. But now AFP wanted to bring Shackleton in for questioning, which could tip everyone else under investigation. It might ruin the U.S. case.

Which was why Carlos and his partner were in such a hurry to get to Perth.

MANHATTAN

Foram Mankodi, a pediatrician from Bombay, led her fiancé, Akhil Bansal, toward the Halloween parade in Greenwich Village.

A pocked goalie mask hid Akhil's broad face; he was Jason from the movie Friday the 13th. Foram, her dark hair under a peaked hat, dressed as a witch.

DOJ_NMG_0097364

The Halloween festivities, she hoped, would provide a break from their increasingly hectic lives. Akhil's workaholic ways were wearing him down.

Not only was he pursuing two master's degrees from Temple, but Akhil was also managing his father's India-based business - supplying pharmaceuticals to companies that sold them to Americans on the Internet.

In the year since he had proposed, Foram watched Akhil grow the U.S. side of the business from a two-person, 1,000-pill-a-day operation into a 10-person, 50,000-pill-a-day enterprise. Already, the intense 26-year-old had earned his first $1 million, money he used to buy a new five-bedroom, $420,000 condo in an affluent Delhi suburb.

But she didn't love him for his money. After they met at the Temple library, their first dates were visits to the Franklin Mills mall. Back then, they took walks on Kelly Drive and watched Friends and Seinfeld. Now, Akhil was promising to fly her to London for New Year's Eve.

Their parents didn't know about the engagement; the couple was going to wait until Akhil graduated and they could return to India.

Foram found Akhil, with the green tint in his brown eyes, to be handsome, brilliant, kind, genuine, confident, sure to succeed. Akhil acknowledged that he was "obsessed with achievement and perfection." His memory was photographic, his class papers top-rate. Someday, she knew, he would run a large hospital in India.

Even Akhil's jokes related to business. The doormat outside his Roxborough apartment said: "Please stay on the mat. Your visit is very important to us. Your knock will be answered in the order in which it was received."

Foram loved Akhil's directness. Before he proposed, he hacked into her e-mail account to make sure that she was true, that she really cared for him.

Akhil told her about the snooping afterward. "All is fair in love and war," he said.

She found this charming.

He had his faults, among them a quick temper. When an argument would reduce her to tears, he would wave a hand and say, "Ah, you women use tears as your weapon."

When she would tell him to stop bragging, he would say, "What is man without ego?"

Akhil cared little about politics. His passions were cars, money and music.

And although he was proud to help grow his father's business, Akhil yearned to make a name for himself. He often cited the Hindi expression upnay pairopay khada hona: "Stand on my own feet."

Foram knew that Akhil was so driven, he had trouble relaxing, even on vacation. During a trip to Niagara Falls, Akhil spent hours tethered to a laptop. When Foram urged him to join friends at the barbecue grill, he snapped, "This is important."

Later, he explained that he had just caught a German rival hacking into his computer to steal client data.

Akhil retaliated. He sent the bastard a virus.

CENTER CITY

Beneath a red Mexican tapestry, federal prosecutor Barbara Cohan spread a DEA chart across her red desk. The diagram was dotted with mug shots, lines drawn to suggest associations.

The Australian Shackleton and his spiked, peroxided hair loomed large in the center. Web operators in five continents formed an outer ring around him. Off in a corner, with suspected couriers, was Akhil Bansal.

Barb let out a laugh. Taken together, the mug shots reminded her of the characters from the bar scene in Star Wars.

Barb had worked drug cases for 24 years, but found these suspects particularly greedy. They dispensed prescription drugs like candy. Such audacity made her smile. Her job was much more fun, she often said, when the defendants were evil.

Barb's colleague and friend, prosecutor Wendy Kelly, was on her way to Australia to join two DEA agents. With Kelly gone, Barb focused on the Indians living in Philadelphia.

Akhil was not Mr. Big, she believed, but he would do. To indict the case in federal court here, she needed a local defendant. And prosecutors preferred a dealer to a user.

Surveillance had trailed Akhil to a suspected Queens, N.Y., stash house, then to another home, where agents had videotaped Indians loading hundreds of packages onto a UPS truck.

Akhil's role wasn't clear. Yet for a young guy in grad school, his bank accounts seemed flush. When Barb subpoenaed his records, she discovered $100,000 in certificates of deposit and a free student checking account with $138,797.23.

DOJ_NMG_0097365

Large wire transfers from abroad - $35,000, $60,000, $100,000 - were routine. He wrote big checks - $3,000, $25,000, $50,000 - to cash and to a Queens company.

The money transfers weren't illegal, per se. And agents hadn't witnessed Akhil commit any crimes. But there was enough suspicious activity to ask a magistrate to authorize a search of his e-mail. When they got approval, the feds sent a search warrant to hotmail.com, the company that hosted Akhil's account.

KING OF PRUSSIA, PA.

Douglas, a husky 19-year-old computer salesman, logged on to ourprescriptionsforless.com. He lived with his mother in a small brick house within sight of the Bloomingdale's arch at the mall.

He clicked on alprazolam, a generic sedative. Douglas liked the way it cut his anxiety in social situations.

By ordering online, Douglas avoided an embarrassing doctor visit or alerting his mother, who still carried his health insurance and might see the bill.

Douglas clicked on quantity and chose 110 tablets, more than a month's supply - more than he thought he would need - just in case. These Internet pharmacies were shady, clearly illegal, and Douglas wasn't sure how long they would remain in business.

He entered his address. He liked that the pills were shipped from a domestic depot. Why risk involving U.S. Customs?

He charged $132.57 to his credit card.

The process was so easy. And why not? Wasn't the point of pharmaceuticals to help people? Weren't the major drug companies always bombarding American consumers with ads? The pitches were everywhere - magazines, newspapers, TV, billboards, banners at ballgames. Anxious? Sleepless? Limp? Have we got a pill for you.

Douglas confirmed his order, and it zipped through cyberspace.

The order shot from the online pharmacy in Romania to a credit-card processor in the British Channel Islands, where it was approved, then e-mailed to Indian suppliers in Agra, who forwarded it to a rented home in Queens, where an Indian supervisor printed it out and handed it to another Indian woman, who climbed to the second floor, took 110 tabs of alprazolam from a cubbyhole, slid them into an envelope, labeled it, and put it into a bag for pickup by UPS, which, two days later, delivered it, up the walk by the big holly tree, to Douglas' doorstep in King of Prussia.

PERTH, AUSTRALIA

The day after the Americans arrived in Perth, they shook off jet lag and turned on the diplomatic charm.

The Australians knew little about Shackleton, except that he was a shadowy figure, a former waiter suddenly rich enough to buy himself a flat and renovate his parents' home. But, Carlos explained, Shackleton had made one foolish mistake: He'd used a Texas company, not an Australian one, to host his online pharmacy and e-mail, making it easier for FBI to get a warrant to search it.

Shackleton's e-mail provided a bonanza. It appeared to show that the brash CEO of Shack Corp. ran a global pill network that netted $5,000 a day, almost $2 million a year.

Shackleton had homes in Perth; Florence, Italy; and Frankfurt, Germany. He was toying with buying a million-dollar chateau near Paris.

Houses were nice, but Shackleton's ultimate goal was amassing $800 million. He figured he could achieve this in five years if he sold 3,000 packages of Valium a day.

"It's not easy to get rich," he wrote in an e-mail to an Internet consultant. "My goal is the upper echelon of economic independence."

What struck the Americans most about the guy, besides his spiked hair, was his arrogance. He began e-mail to employees with the words, "I decree...," and signed off, "Your Lord."

He called his three main suppliers by frat-boy nicknames - the German was "White," the Hungarian "Chubbs," and the Indian "Curry."

Curry's son lived in Philadelphia.

CENTER CITY

The day after the Australia contingent returned, Barb and Kelly met with their boss in his expansive Chestnut Street office overlooking Independence Hall. U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan wasn't a micromanager, but he liked to be briefed on big cases.

The trip had gone well, Kelly reported, better than expected. The Aussies had agreed not to question Shackleton, but would instead tap phone lines, pull bank records, the works.

But there was more, Kelly added - something she had learned that morning.

Barb took over.

She grabbed a large white board and spun it around, revealing DEA's cluttered chart of targets.

"We've been focusing here," she said, pointing to Shackleton in the center, spokes running out to other online pharmacies.

Barb paused, reveling in the moment's drama. She pointed to the upper lefthand corner of the chart, to a smaller universe of suppliers, the Bansals. "Our focus needs to be here."

She put a finger on Akhil's mug. "Head of U.S. operations."

Mr. Big wasn't a cocky 25-year-old Australian. He was a cocky 26-year-old Indian. And, Barb said, "he's right here in our backyard."

His e-mail proved it: His father, a doctor in India, was smuggling one million prescription pills a month to America - generic Viagra, Valium, Xanax, kilos of the painkiller hydrocodone, the psychotropic club drug ketamine, the stimulant ephedrine.

Customers ordered directly from a dozen or so Bansal clients, who operated independent online pharmacies, and the Bansals filled their orders. It seemed that the son was supervising everything, Barb said, right from his modest apartment in Roxborough.

This was no Robin Hood operation - no discounting pills for the gravely ill. The Bansals, she said, charged more for their meds because they didn't require prescriptions. They sold to anyone with a credit card and a modem.

"These guys are just like street-corner drug dealers, except they use the Internet," Barb said, getting worked up. "There are dealers, suppliers, distribution networks. This is the new wave of drug dealing - white-collar drug dealing."

Meehan had recently attended a Justice Department briefing at which DEA Administrator Karen Tandy announced that online pharmacies were a priority. Here was their chance, he said. This case would make a splash.

Kelly wanted to move now - arrests, indictments, prison. The risk to consumers was too serious, she argued. The Bansals were shipping addictive, dangerous prescription pills. Maybe that Colorado woman who overdosed was part of the case. Who might be next?

Barb argued for more time. In heroin and crack cases, she noted, authorities routinely waited to gather enough evidence to take down whole networks, not just a few dealers. Why was this case different? Because it involved white-collar dealers and middle-class consumers?

Barb and Kelly agreed on one thing: They couldn't make this case alone. They needed three things:

One, help from India. Though the nation was notoriously corrupt, and Akhil's father was rich enough to pay bribes, the risk seemed worth it. Assistance from Indian drug agents would be essential.

Two, an expert to track money-laundering on a global scale. Could bureaucrats at Justice in D.C. move fast enough to send someone?

Three, a way to read Akhil's e-mail as he sent and received it. That would require an e-mail wiretap. No one in the room had ever tried that.

They didn't know anyone who had.

U.S. Pulls Out Of Colombian Coca Region (MH)

By Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, November 22, 2006

BOGOTA - After several years of trying to wean farmers from the drug trade in the conflictive southern province of Caquetá, the U.S. government is winding down its funding of alternative development programs in the region.

The pullout comes amid a flurry of criticism of U.S.-backed efforts to eliminate illegal drug production in Colombia, and just before the U.S. Congress is expected to vote to continue aid for counter-drug programs in this nation of 41 million people.

DOJ_NMG_0097367

Colombia remains the largest supplier of cocaine to the U.S. market, and recent reports have suggested that production is increasing despite some $4 billion in U.S. aid for the military, crop eradication and economic development programs since 2000.

The Caquetá development programs are a small part -- $9 million in U.S. funds went to the province in five years -- of this annual aid package, but the region carries symbolic weight as one of Colombia's poorest and most notoriously guerrilla-ridden provinces.

For decades, the leftist guerrillas of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, better known as the FARC, have dominated the area, which has 410,000 people and is a little more than half the size of Florida. They have used it as a training ground for new recruits and a launching pad for attacks.

LABORATORY

Given its background, Caquetá became a laboratory for the counter-narcotics program known as Plan Colombia, designed to dry up coca, the raw material for cocaine, and replace it with viable alternatives. The overall plan included billions in U.S. aid for military training, intelligence equipment and hardware like helicopter gunships as well as money for economic projects and infrastructure.

At first, the plan seemed to be working in Caquetá. Under President Alvaro Uribe, the Colombian military launched an unprecedented offensive of 17,000 troops that pushed the guerrillas from their traditional strongholds in Caquetá and elsewhere, and disrupted the coca economy.

Colombian police data shows a drop in coca farming in the province from 59,000 acres in 1999 to 12,000 last year. U.S. and Colombian economic programs followed, including $5.6 million from the Agency for International Development (AID), $3.9 million of which went to a project for rubber trees that benefited 579 families.

But now both parts of the effort seem to be in retreat. According to politicians from the area and analysts of the military, the Colombian army is quietly withdrawing some troops from the province. The armed forces do not comment on troop movements.

Meanwhile, the United States has stopped funding economic development programs in the Caquetá region.

"There are serious doubts about the impact of the program," said Alfredo Rangel, a former consultant with the Colombian military who now runs a think tank on security issues. ``The impression is that these programs are very inefficient."

Caquetá politicians are dismayed by the U.S. government's decision. They say the programs helped undercut the coca economy during the military offensive, but still need time to take root.

"When the coca left, the economy went into crisis," said Luis Fernando Armario, a longtime congressman for Caquetá. ``Now is when we need the economic help."

The U.S. pullout from Caquetá comes just months after reports by the State Department and the United Nations said the total coca acreage in this country is growing again. In March, the State Department said coca acreage had increased by 26 percent; in June, a U.N. report showed an 8 percent rise.

U.S. officials say that their latest survey, done primarily through satellite photos, covered more land than previously and say coca acreage is down since the plan began.

REFOCUSED AID

One U.S. embassy official here also said the Caquetá pullout -- which doesn't affect other much smaller programs in the region that focus on human rights and internally displaced people -- is part of an AID effort to refocus U.S. assistance.

"We're not pulling out of Caquetá," said the official, who wished to remain anonymous because the official is not authorized to speak in the name of the U.S. government. ``That [alternative development] program came to its natural close."

Farmers in the area disagree. Pablo Emilio Piñeda, the head of a rubber producing cooperative, says the project is far from finished. He worries that many of his colleagues will now return to growing coca.

"With this decision, many of these families are in limbo," Piñeda wrote The Miami Herald in an e-mail. ``They could easily return to sowing illegal crops."

The U.S. decision appears to have been based on a set of factors more complex than officials have publicly acknowledged.

A State Department memo on the alternative development projects in Caquetá, obtained by The Miami Herald and previously reported in Colombian media, offers a view of some of the difficulties that U.S. officials face.

The document states U.S. government workers were advised not to travel to one project in Caquetá because of guerrilla activity, and one project dealing with livestock in Caquetá had to be moved to another province because of ``security concerns."

The document also outlines the economic challenges AID is facing in places like Caquetá and argues that the same money in other provinces could benefit more families. The U.S. embassy official said this document was one of many that was used to analyze the situation in Caquetá and come to the decision to leave.

"Instead of saying this didn't work, what the mission concluded, in conjunction with the [Colombian] government, is that we can do this better," the official said.

DOJ_NMG_0097368

But critics of U.S. policy in Colombia contend that the decision to shut down development programs in Caquetá reflects a larger problem in the overall strategy.

Adam Isaacson of the Washington-based Center for International Policy says that close to 80 percent of U.S. funding for Colombia continues to be for military aid, leaving little for alternative development.

Of the $700 million annual U.S. package, for instance, AID receives around $130 million per year for projects ranging from economic development to training for justice officials and investigators.

"When they think of Plan Colombia, they don't think of job opportunities and strengthening of governments," Isaacson said of rural coca farmers. ``They think spray planes and helicopters, and I think this decision to leave Caquetá reinforces that image."

Local farmers like Piñeda agree. "It seems like they're betting on war, and that's the saddest thing about all this," he said in the e-mail.

Seneca Tobacco Merchant Agrees To Comply With Federal Demands (BUFFNEWS)

By Dan Herbeck, News Staff Reporter

Buffalo (NY) News, November 22, 2006

A prominent Seneca Nation tobacco merchant who has tangled several times with the federal government has agreed to change his business practices and forfeit $1.25 million to the government.

Scott B. Maybee, one of the largest Seneca tobacco merchants in the region, signed a recent federal court agreement promising that his cigarette companies will closely adhere to federal laws during all future sales.

The agreement is believed to be the first of its kind between a Native American mail-order tobacco business and the federal government, federal officials said Thursday.

Maybee runs three Salamanca-based companies that employ about 200 people to do mail-order and Internet cigarette sales. His business was the subject of a lengthy investigation by the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives.

In court papers, U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn agreed that the government will not criminally prosecute Maybee for any activities uncovered during the investigation.

Maybee, in turn, will forfeit $1.25 million to the government, in six payments spread out over the next two years.

"[As] long as Maybee is fully compliant with all federal laws, Maybee may continue to operate his interstate cigarette business," Flynn said.

According to his attorney, Margaret A. Murphy, Maybee agreed to:

Adopt a written age-verification procedure that ensures cigarettes are only sold to adults at least 21 years old.

Guarantee that all shipments of cigarettes not bearing government tax stamps will fully comply with federal regulations.

Limit individual consumer sales to 10 cartons per order and 25 cartons per month.

Maybee said his agreement was reached after a series of discussions involving him, Murphy and Assistant U.S. Attorney Richard D. Kaufman.

Maybee's is believed to be one of the largest among approximately 200 tobacco-related businesses run by Seneca Nation members. He also runs several nontobacco businesses. In recent years, his tobacco operations have had several legal run-ins with federal agents. Maybee has never been charged criminally, but in 2004, he had to forfeit 588,000 cigarettes that had been seized during an ATF investigation.

The 34-year-old businessman encouraged other Seneca tobacco sellers to adopt similar business practices to avoid problems with the federal government, but he said he will not do anything that would harm the Senecas' rights to operate as a sovereign Indian nation.

Maybee said he will continue to fight in court against what he considers to be unfair tax enforcement actions by New York State. The cigarette companies involved are called SmartSmoker, OrderSmokesDirect and BuyCheapCigarettes.com. Maybee's agreement with the government was approved by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Arcara.

A Parting Shot From George Allen (NYT)

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

As a last little gift to America, Senator George Allen, who was narrowly defeated by James Webb this month, has introduced what may be his final piece of legislation: a bill that would allow the carrying of concealed weapons in national parks. The argument behind the bill is that national park regulations unfairly strip many Americans of a right they may enjoy outside the parks. The bill has passed to the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, where we hope it will die the miserable death it deserves.

America's confusion about the Second Amendment is now nearly total. An amendment that ensures a collective right to bear arms has been misread in one legislature after another — often in the face of strong public disapproval — as a law guaranteeing an individual's right to carry a weapon in public. And, in a perversion of monumental proportions, the battle to extend that right has largely succeeded in co-opting the language of the Civil Rights movement, so that depriving an American of the right to carry a gun in public sounds, to some, as offensive as stripping him of the right to vote. Senator Allen's bill is, of course, being cheered by the gun lobby, which sees it not as an assault on public safety but as a way of nationalizing the armed paranoia that the National Rifle Association and its cohorts stand for.

If Americans want to feel safer in their national parks, the proper solution is to increase park funding, which has decayed steadily since the Bush administration took office. To zealots who believe that the Second Amendment trumps all others, the parks are merely another badland, like schools and church parking lots, that could be cleaned up if the carrying of private weapons were allowed. The concealed-weapon advocates are doing an excellent job of sounding terrified by "lonely wilderness trails." But make no mistake. Senator Allen's bill would make no one safer. It can only endanger the public.

IMMIGRATION:

Governors Want More Federal Cash For Imprisoning Illegals (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

PHOENIX - Governors of nine states, including Arizona and California, are urging President Bush to include full reimbursement for states' costs of imprisoning illegal immigrants convicted of crimes when he submits his proposed federal budget next year.

Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano's office said she and California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger were spearheading the effort to increase funding for the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program administered by the U.S. Justice Department.

Until the federal government secures the border, the SCAAP funding is needed and deserved by states that have "to fill this gap by policing the regions and incarcerating criminal aliens at their own considerable expense," said the letter, which was dated Monday and released Tuesday.

Other state governors who signed the letter were Bill Richardson of N.M.; Thomas Vilsack, Iowa; Christine Gregoire, Wash.; Phil Bredesen, Tenn.; Jon Corzine, N.J.; Ted Kulongoski, Ore.; Brad Henry, Okla.; and Kathleen Sebelius, Kan. Gov. Anibal Acevedo Vila of Puerto Rico also signed the letter.

The letter is the latest in a series of steps taken publicly and behind the scenes by governors to press for increased SCAAP funding.

In July, Gregoire sent an invoice for nearly $50 million to the Justice Department for unreimbursed costs of housing criminal illegal immigrants in state prisons.

Napolitano has sent similar invoices since late 2004.

Man's Deportation To Somalia Sets Off A Wave Of Concern Over Safety (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

On the evening of Nov. 2, a young corporate lawyer in New Jersey received a frantic call from a charity client, a 46-year-old Harlem grocery clerk with a history of petty crime. He was in custody on an airplane in Newark on his way to Mogadishu, the capital of his native Somalia, a country so dangerous that to the lawyer's knowledge, no one had been deported there in years.

The courts were closed, and a federal judge who heard an emergency motion the next day ruled that the clerk, Mohamad Rasheed Jama, was already outside United States jurisdiction.

So, after a stop in Nairobi, where he was handed over to Kenyans, Mr. Jama stepped off an airplane in Mogadishu — and into the hands of Islamist militants, who soon accused him of being an American spy and began demanding money.

"They were extremely angry," said his lawyer, Emily B. Goldberg, relating the last frightened call she got from Mr. Jama, who had spent four years in immigration detention in New Jersey awaiting deportation to the land he left at 18. "He asked me if there was anything I could do. I told him in the American system, there was nothing more I could do."

Mr. Jama, whose deportation was based on a 1989 conviction for owning an unlicensed gun, is among the first Somalis to be repatriated against his will since the United States Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 last year that the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia did not bar such deportations. About 4,000 Somalis nationwide are eligible for immediate deportation under the ruling, which turned on the syntax of a Congressional statute.

The case of Mr. Jama, who has a 9-year-old American daughter in Harlem, highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate.

DOJ_NMG_0097370

Conditions in Somalia have worsened in recent months, moving to the brink of an all-out regional war. In June, Mogadishu was seized by Islamic militias suspected of harboring leaders of Al Qaeda. The militias, after routing warlords backed by the United States, began imposing a Taliban-like regime of strict religious courts.

A week before his abrupt departure, Mr. Jama's volunteer lawyers filed a habeas petition on his behalf, arguing that his continued detention in the Middlesex County Jail in New Jersey was unlawful because "it is simply beyond dispute that effecting his removal to Somalia would be impossible."

Michael W. Gilhooly, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, confirmed Mr. Jama's deportation, declining to say whether more were under way. But at a federal appeals hearing in Seattle last month, a Justice Department lawyer said that three people had been deported to Somalia since the Supreme Court ruling, after volunteering.

Because an injunction halting most such deportations was lifted in April, the government lawyer, Greg D. Mack, added, the others would be deported at the discretion of the Department of Homeland Security.

The 28 years Mr. Jama spent in New York hardly prepared him for survival under Islamic fanatics. His job history, detailed in an affidavit, includes three summers as a "jack of all trades" at Jewish youth camps in Orange County, long hours as a counter man in corner stores on upper Lexington Avenue, as well as garment work in Midtown Manhattan and a stint as a junkyard dealer on 125th Street.

His lengthy rap sheet reflects a drinking problem, he said in the affidavit, and his having adapted too well to Harlem's "street culture." Besides a misdemeanor assault and the gun possession, for which he served three years in prison, his offenses include possession of marijuana, selling beer without a license and riding a bus without paying the fare.

But in his old Harlem neighborhood around West 115th Street, he is mainly remembered as a hard worker and good father brought down by alcohol.

"He was very cool, a good dude," said Lester Robinson, 26, whose sister, Waldrina Robinson, is the mother of Mr. Jama's daughter, Ashante.

Ms. Robinson, a home attendant, said she ended a five-year relationship with Mr. Jama in 2000, but she spoke warmly of the years after Ashante's birth in 1997, when Mr. Jama changed the baby's diapers, often cared for the girl at the grocery store where he worked, and "gave me every dime" he earned.

"He was a good father — when he was there," she said.

From the government's perspective, Mr. Jama should have been gone years earlier. In 1978, when Somalia still had a central government, Mr. Jama entered the United States on a one-year visa to work with his father as a security guard at Somalia's Diplomatic Mission to the United Nations.

Left behind at 19, when his father joined his mother in London, Mr. Jama learned English, earned a high school equivalency diploma and became a permanent legal resident under the immigration amnesty enacted by Congress in 1986. But he bought an illegal handgun for protection after a cousin was killed in a robbery, he said, and was arrested for having it after an alcohol-fueled dispute with other relatives drew the police.

Mr. Jama was ordered deported in 1993. But with no foreseeable chance of deporting him to Somalia, where civil war was raging, the authorities released him under supervision. As was typical at the time, no action was taken when he stopped reporting, even when later infractions led to brief jail time.

After 9/11, attitudes changed. Mr. Jama was picked up in October 2002, as were many other Somalis. But unlike those with comparable records who were provisionally released again when deportations stopped, Mr. Jama had no lawyer until this year. Then the American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey took the case and enlisted help from the law firm Gibbons, Del Deo, Dolan, Griffinger & Vecchione.

"I want nothing more from life than to be near Ashante and to be involved in her life on a daily basis once again," Mr. Jama wrote in his affidavit, seeking supervised release to a cousin in Queens who had found him a job in a grocery store. "Although my greatest fear is remaining in immigration detention for the rest of my life and never regaining my freedom, I am also frightened about what could happen if the United States tried to remove me to Somalia."

As a member of the Warsengeli clan, Mr. Jama faces special danger in areas dominated by other clans, including Mogadishu, a Somalia expert wrote in an affidavit. Other affidavits cited the failed deportation of Keyse G. Jama (no relation), the Somali man who had lost the Supreme Court case, only to be rejected at gunpoint at a Somalia airport and sent back to Minneapolis in the spring of 2005. A federal judge outraged at that botched operation ordered the government to "slow down its rush to act" and release him.

Keyse Jama is now in Canada, where he fled in January and applied for political asylum, which is granted to the vast majority of Somali applicants, said David Yerzy, his Toronto lawyer. "The Canadian government recognizes that their lives are in danger," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0097371

In the United States, lawyers for Somalis are asking whether Mr. Jama's deportation signals the start of a mass deportation or a warning to those facing indefinite detention that "if you use habeas, you'll be on the next flight," said Jeffrey Keyes, the Minneapolis lawyer who argued the Supreme Court case.

In Mogadishu, as far as is known, Mr. Jama is just trying to survive.

"The government demonstrated a complete disregard for my client's safety," Ms. Goldberg said. "I strongly believe that Mr. Jama is simply the first of many that will be placed in a similarly dangerous situation."

'Blade ' Actor Wesley Snipes Calls Himself A 'scapegoat' In Tax Fraud Case (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) - Wesley Snipes has told a newspaper columnist he is being unfairly targeted by federal prosecutors who indicted him on tax fraud charges.

"It appears I'm to be the scapegoat, because there's more public interest in 'celebrities gone bad' than 'rich people being taken advantage of,'" Snipes wrote last weekend in an e-mail to Orlando Sentinel columnist Scott Maxwell.

An Oct. 17 indictment charges Snipes with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. The star of the "Blade" trilogy and other films was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm, American Rights Litigators, would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

If convicted, Snipes, 44, faces up to 16 years in prison.

"I will abide by the law, seek the protections the law affords me and, as always, seek the advice of competent council in effort to resolve this issue," Snipes wrote to the columnist. "I'm not running, I'm not a fugitive, despite the misrepresentations in the press."

Snipes is said to be in Namibia filming a movie.

"There is no deal that has been worked out," U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Steve Cole said Monday. "The only thing we have discussed is coming back to face the charges."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Social Security Up For Discussion (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

With the elections over and Democrats poised to take control on Capitol Hill, the Bush administration is making a fresh push to persuade them to help rein in the rising costs of Social Security and government health-care programs by offering to open talks with "no preconditions."

Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., the president's point man on Social Security and other entitlement programs, said in an interview yesterday that he has had "a number of . . . very, very general, very preliminary conversations" with lawmakers from both parties about the issue since Election Day, Nov. 7.

So far, "it's too early in the aftermath of the election to know whether we're going to get traction," Paulson said, adding that he is "going to make a huge effort to persuade people to engage in a bipartisan discussion where we don't precondition our discussion."

"No preconditions," Paulson said, means both sides get a chance to put their ideas on the table. In regard to Social Security, administration officials said that means President Bush will continue to advocate that younger workers be allowed to divert a portion of their Social Security taxes into private retirement accounts, a proposal Congress roundly rejected last year.

It also means that the White House is willing to listen to other ideas, administration officials said, including personal savings accounts that do not involve diverting Social Security taxes, as well higher payroll taxes to help cover a projected explosion in Social Security costs after members of the baby boom generation begin to retire in 2008.

"We're in a listening mode," said Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, who has also been spending a lot of time since the election talking to key Democrats about entitlements. "The president wants to listen. He wants to hear what the leaders on Capitol Hill think is the best way to go. He's not wed to any particular approach."

Political analysts said the outreach campaign is a sign that Bush may be willing to compromise to make progress on Social Security, an issue he has consistently identified as one of the top priorities for his second term. Weakened by low approval ratings, a chaotic and unpopular war in Iraq, and his party's loss of control of both houses of Congress for the first time in 12 years, Bush may see Social Security as an issue on which he could score points before leaving office in 2009, analysts said.

Bush's former chief economic adviser, Lawrence B. Lindsey, added to that speculation on Monday, after writing in the Wall Street Journal that Bush "may be willing to raise taxes as part of a 'deal' on entitlement reform." Specifically, Lindsey wrote, the administration might agree to lift the cap that limits Social Security payroll taxes to the first $90,000 of income, thereby raising total taxes, but not tax rates, for high-income workers.

"Bush has been on a losing streak. The question is: Is he going to attempt to save his legacy by giving the Democrats everything they want on Social Security and passing a big Social Security bill with his name on it?" said Kevin A. Hassett, director of economic policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute. "It could be that's what we're looking at next year."

While Paulson and Portman are talking about consensus, some Democrats worry that Bush is still determined to pursue the idea of private accounts. Many of them oppose such accounts on the grounds that they would weaken Social Security overall. That fear was fanned last week when Bush appointed Andrew G. Biggs, a proponent of Social Security privatization, to the agency that runs the program.

"This nomination of Biggs is very troublesome," said Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.), who is in line to chair a House subcommittee on Social Security. "The president is sending signals that what he's really after is privatization. And that's just a non-starter."

Other Democrats want Bush to explicitly put taxes on the table, including elimination of some of his signature tax cuts, instead of focusing exclusively on restraining the escalating costs of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. The big three entitlement programs eat up 8 percent of the country's total economic output and are projected to double in cost over the next 50 years, creating a budget hole that must be shrunk by cutting benefits or filled by raising taxes.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who is to chair the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee, had lunch last week with Paulson and said he came away impressed. The secretary, he said, is "a straight shooter" who agreed to attend a retreat that could take place as early as February where Ways and Means committee members will look for common ground with the administration on fiscal issues. But entitlement reform is unlikely to be part of those discussions, Rangel said.

"I don't know whether we're secure enough with each other to start on these very sensitive issues," he said.

Also yesterday, the White House released its final economic forecast before submitting its budget for fiscal 2008. In a conference call with reporters, Edward Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, said Bush's top economic advisers, like many private forecasters, expect the economy to grow a bit more slowly next year, at an annual rate of 2.9 percent. That would be a bit below the average growth rate of the past three years, when the economy grew at an annual rate of about 3.2 percent.

Compromised (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, November 20, 2006

During the recent off-year elections, the president repeatedly pointed to the booming economy and noted that his tax cuts were responsible. With growth strong and unemployment low despite the ending of the stock-market bubble, terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, he had every reason to be proud. Moreover, both economic theory and the actual timing of the economic revival support his claims regarding the tax cuts.

That is why it is so odd that rumors swarm around Washington that the president may be willing to raise taxes as part of a "deal" on entitlement reform. In particular, the rumors suggest the president might be willing to get rid of the provision that caps the income level used to compute Social Security taxes and benefits. These rumors aren't without substance; last year the president would not rule out raising the cap when asked.

Doing so would raise the marginal tax rate on the entrepreneurs that Mr. Bush credits for having led the economic recovery by more than 10 percentage points. The new effective rate would be five percentage points above the level when he took office. Moreover, in 2011, the rate would go up a further 4.3 percentage points to an effective 53% marginal rate on entrepreneurial income. The president would thus be not just raising taxes on entrepreneurs to well above the levels that prevailed in the Clinton administration, but to a rate higher than that which prevailed in the Carter administration. Most of the improved incentives for entrepreneurship and work brought about under Reagan would be repealed.

Should the president do this, he doubtless would be thinking that saving Social Security would be worth the price. He would be wrong. In practice this idea would both destroy the basis on which Social Security was started and fail to produce the expected revenue that supposedly would save the system. Social Security was set up as a contributory pension plan, not a welfare scheme. Benefits are linked, by statutory formula, to contributions. Congress and the president could choose to maintain this relationship. Traditional supporters of Social Security like AARP have long insisted on this link and argued against turning the program into another welfare plan by ending the linkage between contributions and benefits.

There are two problems with that approach. First, an increase in the cap on taxes and benefits would produce very little net revenue for the system. Even if one assumed higher taxes did not hurt the economy, the increased benefits would consume much of any increased revenue. Second, the benefits that high income people would get would be politically unsustainable. A retiree who earned a million per year would receive a monthly Social Security benefit of $13,500. This is politically unimaginable. So, expect both the universality of Social Security and the link between taxes and benefits to go, and this most enduring element of the New Deal to become a welfare program.

But it is the damage to the economy and to the fiscal system that is more important. Economists differ on how much such a dramatic increase in tax rates on entrepreneurs would damage the economy. Certainly given the statements of the president earlier this year he believes it would be significant. Consider some figures.

Published IRS data from 2004 show that taxpayers with incomes over $100,000 earned $1.9 trillion in wages, salaries, bonuses and self-employment income. Of that, roughly $800 billion was above the Social Security maximum tax threshold. Levying the 12.4% Social Security tax on that income would produce $99 billion in revenue. Of that, employers and the self-employed would be able to deduct half of that tax from their corporate or personal tax returns. Thus, $17.4 billion of the $99 billion would not be a net gain to the Treasury, but a transfer from the general fund to the Social Security trust fund. So the net gain to the government would have been about $82 billion in 2004.

That assumes that taxpayers would not have changed their behavior when their marginal tax rate rose to 48.6% from 38.4%. No one believes that, although economists do disagree on how much. These are a very sophisticated group of taxpayers with both the knowledge and the means to adjust to taxation by changing the form of business, converting income to capital gains, or other methods. A cautious estimate that enjoys wide acceptance in the tax community says that for every 1% reduction in the share of their income they take home, high income individuals cut their taxable earnings by four-tenths of a percent. My own research from the Reagan tax cuts indicates the response by this group is higher, roughly seven-tenths of 1%.

Although these numbers may seem small, when they are applied to a massive tax rate increase like this, they can have important ramifications. Remember, taxpayers will be seeing the share of income they keep dropping from roughly 61 cents on the dollar to just 51 cents -- and that is before state taxes are figured in. This implies a decline in the tax base of between 7% and 13%.

Under the lower assumption, total federal revenues would only increase by $27 billion, with the behavioral response of taxpayers offsetting 70% of the static revenue increase. True, Social Security tax revenues would still rise by $82 billion, but this would be offset by a net decline in personal income taxes of $55 billion. Under the higher assumption about a behavioral response, total federal revenues would decline. While Social Security taxes would rise by $69 billion, personal income taxes would drop by $95 billion.

Whatever one's assumption, lifting the Social Security tax cap would have to be viewed as an economically and fiscally risky proposition. I seriously doubt that the president would be interested in agreeing to a deal that purports to "save Social Security" when the reality is that it seriously undermines the economic and fiscal basis that underpins the system.

There is another argument that the president will have heard that might persuade him to do what the rumors say he is considering: fairness. It is true that high income earners do not pay Social Security taxes on all of their earnings. As already noted, it is also true that they do not receive benefits on those earnings. So, if you think that Social Security should be a welfare program with benefits unlinked to contributions, then in a sense this may be unfair.

But, consider the total tax system. An urban myth has arisen that the so-called "rich" do not pay their "fair share" of taxes despite the fact that the top 10% of taxpayers pay 68% of federal income taxes in the country. A comparison between a relatively high-income entrepreneur, of which I am one, and a "typical" worker might be illustrative.

Last year an entrepreneur similar to me would have paid federal taxes equal to 33.9% of total income. That is, income before any exemptions, exclusions, adjustments or deductions. By this measure all of the fringe benefits that an entrepreneur provides himself as a self-employed individual are included in income. His federal income taxes and the employer and employee shares of his Social Security taxes are all counted as "taxes."

For comparison, consider a married worker earning a salary of $75,000, who like our entrepreneur, has three children. To compute his total income on the same basis, I gave him the same level of benefits as an average worker and the same level of capital income as others making his income. I also followed convention to impute to him both his own Social Security taxes and all of those paid by his employer. On that basis, his average tax rate was 14.5%.

Based on a 40-hour week, while he finishes paying his Federal taxes on Monday afternoon at 2:48, our entrepreneur will work all day Monday until about the same time on Tuesday until he finishes, another full day. If the plan to eliminate the cap on Social Security earnings is adopted, he will work all day Monday, all day Tuesday, and then Wednesday morning until 10:26 to finish paying his federal taxes. Then he can start paying his state taxes.

That assumes he keeps working as hard as he is and doesn't rearrange his income to take more fringe benefits or shelter it in other ways. This suggests another way to think about just how risky this plan is. Using those 2004 figures cited above, all it would take would be for one of these workers in ten to decide it wasn't worth it to work until 10:30 Wednesday morning just to pay Uncle Sam and this plan the president is reportedly considering would actually cost government tax revenue. Don't make it too tough on him, or Atlas may actually decide to shrug.

Mr. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group, was President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002.

Will Bush Bargain To Save Social Security? (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush tried and failed to fix Social Security's long-term finances with his own party in control of Congress. His determination to keep trying, even as Democrats take over, is fueling speculation that he is ready to meet their price for coming to the bargaining table: dropping his goal of letting workers create private retirement accounts.

While Democrats don't take over the House and Senate until January, already some in both parties are reading tea leaves for signs of administration flexibility, including in recent remarks by Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten.

Were the president to drop private accounts and call their bluff, Democrats would be challenged to make good on their professed willingness to help ensure Social Security's solvency.

Both sides acknowledge that a combination of reduced future benefits and higher revenues will be necessary eventually. As more Americans reach retirement age, Social Security will soon bring in fewer revenues from workers' payroll taxes than it sends out in benefit checks to retirees, workers' survivors and the disabled.

For Mr. Bush, private accounts are a way of reducing Social Security's future obligations, and central to his concept of an "ownership society" in which Americans rely less on government.

Democrats, along with the seniors group AARP, oppose personal accounts because they would initially require heavy government borrowing, and could leave future retirees at risk of market downturns.

Except for the Iraq war, perhaps no other issue so tests whether Democrats' capture of Capitol Hill in this month's midterm elections will cause Mr. Bush to alter what has been a largely partisan and uncompromising governing style. At the same time, any compromises cut with the Democratic majority are sure to cost Mr. Bush the support of many Republicans, especially in the House.

Publicly, the White House isn't budging. "Private accounts are part of our proposal and we're interested in having others put things on the table, not taking things off," says administration spokesman Dana Perino.

For those who nonetheless see a Bush concession ahead, perhaps the biggest reason is this: If Mr. Bush doesn't drop private accounts, it is virtually certain that nothing will happen on Social Security, the issue he has called the top domestic priority of his second term. Democrats say Mr. Bush also must finally spell out exactly what future benefit reductions or revenue increases he could support.

Another factor is the arrival of Mr. Paulson, who joined the Bush cabinet last summer. The former Goldman Sachs chief executive has said a priority will be tackling government spending for health care and Social Security -- "the biggest economic issue facing our country."

Democrats and Republicans agree that Mr. Paulson wouldn't have taken the Treasury post -- especially after Mr. Bush's previous two secretaries were routinely undercut by the White House -- without assurance that he would have significant influence.

Mr. Bush, in his press conference the day after Republicans lost their House and Senate majorities, said he had "instructed Secretary Paulson to reach out to folks on the Hill to see if we can't at least get a dialogue started" about Social Security and the other costly entitlement programs, Medicare and Medicaid. Last week, Mr. Paulson met at the Treasury with Rep. Charles Rangel, the New York Democrat who will be chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, which has jurisdiction for Social Security as well as tax and trade policies.

Mr. Rangel says the two had "a very good and very long" meeting but only discussed generalities. "I don't want to be the first one to say what's off the table, what's on the table," he adds.

Democratic Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, who will chair the Senate Finance Committee that handles Social Security, will amplify Democrats' opposition to private accounts when he has dinner with Mr. Paulson Dec. 5, an aide said.

This week, in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Mr. Paulson dodged a question about the Democrats' demand that the administration drop the private-accounts idea. "Only by taking a bipartisan approach, not conditioning the discussion" might an agreement be reached, he said.

Some listeners wondered whether Mr. Paulson was signaling administration willingness to quit prescribing the accounts. Administration officials privately said that wasn't the case. Still, a Treasury official said Mr. Paulson wants to approach the issue with an open mind and will suggest to lawmakers, "Why don't we start talking and see where we go, as opposed to prescribing things right away?"

Chief of Staff Bolten got a similar query about private accounts when he spoke last week before more than 100 people at a dinner of the board of the Brookings Institution, a policy think-tank. According to one attendee, Mr. Bolten "came as close as he could in a quasi-public setting to saying that carve-out accounts could be dropped if that were the price of reform." A second audience member supported that interpretation.

After his 2004 re-election, Mr. Bush spent much of 2005 campaigning nationwide for Congress to pass a law allowing younger workers to divert a portion of their Social Security payroll taxes to personal accounts. He argued that workers' investment earnings could offset the regular Social Security benefits they would agree to forego at retirement. Eventually Mr. Bush acknowledged that the accounts alone wouldn't make Social Security solvent, and that additional benefit reductions and perhaps tax changes would have to be made.

Republicans never attempted to write a bill. Without some Democrats' support, they wanted no part of acting alone to cut future benefits and raise taxes on upper-income workers, for fear they would lose their congressional majorities. They lost them anyway this month, as voters rebelled against corruption and partisanship, over-spending and the war in Iraq.

Messrs. Rangel and Baucus each tried to get Mr. Bush to drop private accounts in the past. Mr. Rangel tried at a White House encounter in April 2005. He said afterwards that Mr. Bush sternly replied, "I'm the president, and private accounts will stay on the table until I leave." Mr. Rangel said the president also predicted -- incorrectly, as it happened -- that Democrats would pay politically if they obstructed him.

As Premiums Rise, Social Security's Staffing Level To Be Tested (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Staffing problems at the Social Security Administration could make it difficult for field offices to handle increased telephone calls and visits prompted by an upcoming increase in Medicare premiums, according to the Government Accountability Office.

Social Security began mailing notices of the higher, income-based premiums on Monday and expects all 1.6 million affected enrollees to have them in hand by the end of next week. Enrollees may request a recalculation of their premium if they think incorrect tax data have been used to determine their income and set their premium, or if they have recently experienced an income loss from a spouse's death, a divorce or some other "life-changing event."

In a letter sent last week to the Senate Finance Committee, the GAO warned that Social Security is coping with staff shortages and operating under a hiring freeze just as the agency's workload is expected to jump because of the premium increases. The GAO, the congressional auditing agency, noted that the premium change, though approved by Congress in 2003, may come as a surprise to some beneficiaries.

Mark Lassiter, a Social Security spokesman, said the agency plans to shift workloads among field offices if some offices "are getting disproportionately hit" by telephone calls and visits from Medicare beneficiaries.

He expressed confidence that the agency's 1,300 field offices will be able to handle any surge in work. "We do the work we are assigned to get done," he said.

Congress changed how Medicare Part B premiums are calculated starting next year and reduced the government's contribution toward premiums for higher-income beneficiaries -- defined as individuals with incomes of more than $80,000 and married couples who file joint tax returns showing incomes of more than $160,000. In the past, premiums increased on a uniform basis, regardless of income.

Medicare Part B covers doctors' services, certain outpatient services and some home health care. Most people do not pay a Part A premium, which covers hospitalization, because they or a spouse have 40 or more quarters of Medicare-covered employment.

DOJ_NMG_0097376

For 2007, a person with income of $80,000 or less and a married couple with income of $160,000 or less will pay $1,122 in annual Part B premiums.

Persons with incomes of $80,001 to $100,000 and couples with incomes of $160,001 to $200,000 will pay $1,269.60 in Part B premiums next year.

At the top of the scale, individuals with incomes of more than $200,000 and couples with incomes of more than $400,000 will pay $1,936.80 for Part B coverage.

Premiums are set by the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, and the Social Security Administration is responsible for determining and assessing the Part B income-based premiums.

The GAO said implementing income-based premiums will cost Social Security an additional $200 million in administrative expenses between fiscal 2006 and 2010.

The extra work comes at a tough time for the agency. Social Security has adopted a hiring freeze because Congress has not been able to complete work on the agency's fiscal 2007 appropriations bill. Agency officials also have warned that it could be forced next year to send employees home without pay, perhaps for as long as 10 days, if Congress does not reverse proposed budget cuts.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Senate majority leader, said Republican leaders had informed Reid's office that the Senate will postpone work on appropriations bills until next year.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), the current majority leader, did not return a telephone call or e-mail inquiry.

If spending bills are put off until next year, Congress will have to pass another continuing resolution, or interim spending measure, to keep the government operating into 2007. The current CR expires Dec. 8.

Some cash-strapped agencies will probably have to petition Congress for adjustments in their spending levels before a long-term CR is adopted. Typically, interim funding measures finance agencies at their current level or at a lower level, depending on budget proposals pending in Congress.

"This guarantees there will be a tussle over funding levels," Manley said.Postal Talks to Continue

The U.S. Postal Service and its four largest unions have agreed to extend contract talks in an effort to reach negotiated settlements, postal spokesman Gerald J. McKiernan announced.

The contracts expired at midnight Monday, but their terms and conditions continue until new pacts take hold. More than 616,000 postal employees are covered by the contracts.

Dems Unlikely To Block Gates Nomination (AP-Y)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 22, 2006

When Robert Gates testifies before a Senate panel in two weeks, Democrats will voice their opposition to administration war policies and gauge Gates' willingness to change them. But they probably won't stand in his way to becoming the next defense secretary.

Democrats have begun lining up behind Gates, indicating they are inclined to vote for him if he meets two general criteria: He agrees a new approach in Iraq is needed and demonstrates he will hold sufficient political clout at the White House.

"We really do have to get a strong signal that he has been given a free hand to make whatever changes he thinks appropriate, and that within the administration he will have unimpeded access to the president," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., in an interview Tuesday. "Those things are critical to success."

The senators say they are not immediately opposing Gates largely because his confirmation would lead to the departure of Donald H. Rumsfeld, the Pentagon chief who led the U.S. invasion in Iraq and staunchly defended the war even as public approval plummeted.

The initial support of Bush's nominee comes even though Gates is the same man once accused of distorting intelligence for political reasons — a primary charge Democrats level against the Bush administration in the war in Iraq.

In 1991, 31 Democrats voted against confirming Gates as CIA director, citing charges he had pressured intelligence analysts to develop conclusions that fit President Reagan's policies and turned a blind eye to the Iran-Contra scandal, in which arms were sold to the Iranians and the cash used to supply the Nicaraguan Contra rebels.

Twelve of the senators who rejected Gates 15 years ago remain today, including Carl Levin, D-Mich., Joseph Biden, D-Del., and Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va.

Also not working in Gates' favor is a career built more on ending the Cold War than on Middle East expertise, and his lack of experience managing a budget and staff as large as the Pentagon's, the government's biggest.

DOJ_NMG_0097377

But when Bush announced Gates' nomination on Nov. 8, Democrats began extending their support. Sens. Harry Reid, D-Nev., who will be majority leader next year, and Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, who will head the panel that oversees the Pentagon's budget, said they hoped Gates was swiftly confirmed, while Biden said he was inclined to vote for him.

Reed and other Democrats say they will focus more of their attention on Gates' views of Iraq than his dealings in the intelligence.

"I will be watching the upcoming confirmation process very carefully to discern whether Mr. Gates has the capacity to both listen to and lead our military in a new direction," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn.

Inouye, who with Sen. Ted Stevens met with Gates on Monday, said he had known Gates for at least 30 years and that he would vote for him as he did in 1991. He said he and Stevens, R-Alaska, top members of the defense appropriations subcommittee, used the meeting to assure Gates he would not play politics with military funding.

"I expect him to be confirmed," Inouye said.

Other Democrats — including Levin, who next year will chair the Armed Services Committee, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy — are holding their cards close on Gates but say they are eager to see if he is willing to advocate a new Iraq policy. Clinton, D-N.Y., and Kennedy, D-Mass., are expected to meet with Gates in the next few weeks.

"The one thing he has going for him ... is that we want the change to take place very quickly," said Reid. "So it's to our interest to have this change at the head of the Defense Department as soon as possible."

According to an AP-Ipsos poll released Tuesday, only 31 percent of Americans approve of Bush's handling of Iraq.

Democrats say they are impressed by Gates' willingness to work with their party. Gates is a member of the Aspen Strategy Group, a bipartisan group of former senior U.S. officials and policy experts who meet regularly to discuss international affairs. Also, before being nominated by Bush, Gates was a member of a high-profile bipartisan panel assessing options in Iraq.

Reed, a senior member of the Armed Services panel, on Tuesday called Gates a "realistic voice on foreign affairs and somebody who deliberately tries to draw upon a cross section of views." He said he also was impressed Gates was willing to step out of private life to take on the challenge of Iraq.

"Those are all good qualities. There's a huge task facing him," Reed said.

Norman Ornstein, a political scientist at the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, said he was not surprised. To oppose Gates or focus too much on his past at the CIA would be to pick the wrong battle with Bush if Democrats want Iraq policy to change, he said.

"I think they'll want to look forward," Ornstein said.

Draft Viewed As Impractical, Unnecessary (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Turning conscripts into battle-ready troops would take a year or more in the unlikely event the government revived the draft, military experts say.

Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., said this week that he will reintroduce a bill he sponsored in 2003 that would reinstate the military draft. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and other military leaders, however, oppose the plan and call a draft neither necessary nor practical. House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi also said Monday that she opposes the plan.

Rangel doesn't expect Congress or President Bush to support reviving the draft, says Emile Milne, the congressman's spokesman. Instead, Rangel wants to spark a “discussion among the people who represent the American people here in Congress.”

If the draft resumed, draftees wouldn't join the military for at least six months. The nation's dormant draft law gives the Selective Service System 193 days to deliver the first inductees following the revival of conscription.

Fully training those troops would take months more. The Army starts with a nine-week basic training course that's followed by individual training that lasts another month for the infantry, two months for tank crews or three months for military police.

The nation has a much smaller military than in 1970, when the transition to an all-volunteer force began. Then, the United States had a population of 205 million and more than 3 million active-duty troops. Now, out of a population of about 300 million, there are fewer than 1.4 million active-duty troops.

A smaller military would have a harder time absorbing tens of thousands of new draftees, says Bernard Rostker, a former Pentagon personnel chief and Selective Service director.

“We don't have the training bases,” says Rostker, now with the independent RAND Corp. think tank. “If you draft people, where are you going to put them?”

The military has closed or realigned dozens of military bases, including several training facilities, since 1988. It has also significantly reduced its number of overseas bases. A 1999 report concluded that the military would have to rebuild some buildings at dormant or realigned bases, but could train and field a force equivalent to the 1987 military with the bases it has. The military had about 2.2 million active-duty troops in 1987.

Rangel says a draft would ensure that families of all backgrounds and income levels share in the sacrifices that a war demands. Rostker disagrees. He says that because “there are a lot more poor people than rich people” in the country, the poor would still be disproportionately represented.

“I don't see how that would be considered equitable,” Rostker says.

Volunteers are more reliable in combat, retired brigadier general Nick Halley says. He commanded a unit of mostly draftees as a young officer during the Vietnam War and a larger group of volunteers during Operation Desert Storm in 1991.

The troops in Vietnam were valiant, Halley says, but those in Desert Storm had better skills and motivation. “If the purpose of the military is combat readiness, the draft is not the way to do that.”

Behind Talk Of A New Draft: Equity (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, November 22, 2006

The burden of war is never equitable.

Thousands of American troops have been killed and wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan, and many thousands more will bring home at least some of that burden. But most Americans experience no direct or even indirect cost of a war soon to last longer than World War II.

Would reinstituting the military draft even things out, spreading the responsibility while influencing politicians to think twice before sending men and women into harm's way?

Rep. Charles Rangel (D) of New York thinks so. Challenging Iran and North Korea as well as increasing the US force level in Iraq to try to stem the heightened violence there can't be done without a draft, says Mr. Rangel, a Korean War combat vet. He has dusted off his proposal to bring back conscription, which was suspended in 1973.

Rangel's bill is unlikely to go far in Congress, where opposition reflects public opinion. But his proposal does raise important questions about how the armed forces are put together today and how the US military operates.

"I do think we need a draft," says Charles Moskos, military sociologist and professor emeritus at Northwestern University. "Our country is experiencing what I call 'patriotism lite.' Nobody's willing to sacrifice anything. We don't even have gas rationing. Congress votes to go to war, but won't send its own children. We don't have enough troops. We've used reservists and the National Guard in an unprecedented manner."

Then there's the element of economic and social privilege as relates to military service today, says Dr. Moskos. In his 1958 Princeton University class of 750 men, more than 400 served in the military, he says, including many who went on to distinguished careers in business, education, and government. In Princeton's most recent graduating class of about 1,100 men and women, nine entered the military.

"These are not by any means bottom-of-the-barrel soldiers today," says Moskos, who was drafted into the Army after graduation. "But they are working-class and lower-middle-class young men and women."

In congressional testimony last week Army Gen. John Abizaid, top commander of US forces in the Middle East, acknowledged that former Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki was right when he said at the beginning of the war that several hundred thousand troops would be needed to occupy Iraq. But General Abizaid also said that increasing troop levels in Iraq now, as Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona and others have called for, would put "a tremendous strain" on the military. Most military experts find no legitimate reason to bring back conscription.

"A draft would induct far more people than are needed by the military if it were universal, posing the question of what to do with all the surplus draftees - a million or so," says military analyst John Pike, director of globalsecurity.org. "It would be politically very disruptive if it were a lottery with only 1 in 10 getting called."

Even should there be a draft, it would take many months before new draftees could begin to fill the need in Iraq, says retired Army Col. Dan Smith, senior fellow at the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Quaker lobby in Washington.

First, there would be prolonged congressional debate, likely followed by legal challenges over exemptions and the general fairness of the system, says Colonel Smith, a West Point graduate and Vietnam War veteran. Then it would take more time to develop training programs and produce equipment.

"These are the practical constraints," he adds. "Sociologically, I don't think the country will stand for reinstituting the draft over a threat that is not mortal."

There are philosophical and ethical issues involved as well.

DOJ_NMG_0097379

A draft "contradicts the principles of a free society by coercing people to fight for freedom," says Ivan Eland, national security analyst at the Independent Institute in Oakland, Calif. "Soldiers who want to be in the military do a better job than those who don't, and the military services know it."

As with Vietnam, public concern about the possibility of conscription is useful to those who oppose the Iraq war.

"It seems to me the issue is about making it more difficult for policymakers to use the military instrument without full support of the American public," says retired Air Force Col. Sam Gardiner.

Retired US Naval Reserve Capt. John Allen Williams agrees.

"Rangel's bringing it up for political reasons," says Dr. Williams, a professor of political science at Loyola University Chicago. "But you know what? He's right. If we have some mechanism that links the military to civilian society in a way that spreads the burden around when you use the military, it's less likely to be used. On the other hand, once it is used it's more likely to be used in a total way - people are going to want to get it over with."

Military sociologist Moskos's answer is a three-tier system of required public service for all young men and women: uniformed military service, homeland security jobs (guarding borders, ports, nuclear plants, and other sites), or civilian tasks such as teaching in poor neighborhoods and helping the elderly.

No school loans or other education benefits should be awarded unless the recipient serves in one of those three areas for a year or two, says Moskos.

Still, at this point in a drawn-out war with no clear light at the end of the political and military tunnel, a return to the draft seems unlikely.

"It is too late to win popular support for conscription," says Loren Thompson, a national security expert at the Lexington Institute in Arlington, Va. "The public has turned against the war. Proposing a draft now will simply hasten the collapse of domestic support for the war effort."

No Sugarcoating 'Hunger' (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

It's Thanksgiving, a week since the U.S. Department of Agriculture released its annual hunger -- er, food security -- report, and it's likely that a few folks in the department are ready for a holiday break.

For the first time, the USDA's annual report on Americans' access to food omitted the word "hunger" in describing the condition of 11 million people who at times can't afford to feed themselves. These people, among a group of 35 million who had trouble keeping food on the table at least part of last year, shall heretofore, according to the government, be described as experiencing "very low food security."

That raised hackles on the Hill, where Rep. Joe Baca (D-Calif.) initiated a letter to the USDA signed by 64 lawmakers, all but one of them Democrats, asking to "better appreciate your response" to the following questions:

"1. Before making the decision to replace the term "hunger" with "very low food [security]," did USDA consider the possibility that this decision might influence key nutrition policy debates, media perception, and/or philanthropic efforts?

"2. If so, who did the Department speak with? Were any legislators, policy experts, or anti-hunger advocates involved in this decision?

"3. And if these parties were consulted, what were their recommendations?"

The letter was sent Monday, and the agency has not responded.

Mark Nord, a USDA sociologist and the lead author of the report, repeated this week that "hunger" is not a scientifically quantifiable term. He had made that contention earlier in a Washington Post article, saying that the word was removed after a panel of scientists recommended doing so.

Nord said that the Post story was too "tongue in cheek, given the gravity of the issue," and that it suggested the agency was unsympathetic.

Far from it, he said: "USDA has more money in food assistance than in farming and forestry programs combined."

John Brennan, spokesman for Bread for the World, an anti-hunger advocacy group, said: "It's an issue that a lot of politicians have paid lip service to, but now since it's come front and center . . . it's an issue they're starting to embrace."

Rep. Jim McGovern (D-Mass.), co-chairman of the Congressional Hunger Caucus and a signer of the letter to the USDA, said that especially in countries such as the United States, which grows more food than it needs, "hunger is a political condition." Calling hunger by any other name "makes it more difficult to get that political will and to get the action you need to deal with the issue," he said.

Nord has denied that removing the word from the report was a political act.

HHS Nominee Has Prescribed Birth Control (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Despite his work for a Christian pregnancy counseling group that opposes contraception, the physician who yesterday began overseeing federal family-planning programs has prescribed birth control for his patients, a Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman said.

Eric Keroack, a nationally known advocate of abstinence until marriage, served for more than a decade as medical director for A Woman's Concern, a Massachusetts nonprofit group that discourages abortion and does not distribute information promoting birth control. But HHS spokeswoman Christina Pearson said yesterday that most of Keroack's professional time had been devoted to his private practice of 20 years, not the group.

"When he was in private practice as a doctor, he did prescribe birth control," Pearson said. "And he did family planning with patients at their request as part of his private physician role." She said Keroack has prescribed contraceptives for both married and unmarried women.

Democrats and family-planning advocates have panned the Bush administration's selection of Keroack to oversee HHS's $283 million reproductive-health program and a $30 million program that encourages abstinence among teenagers because of his work with A Woman's Concern.

They said that Keroack is a poor choice to lead HHS's Office of Population Affairs, which funds birth control, pregnancy tests, counseling and screenings for sexually transmitted disease and HIV. Fourteen Democratic senators sent a letter yesterday urging HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt to withdraw Keroack's appointment. Seven House Democrats issued a similar call Monday. The job does not require Senate confirmation.

"Unfortunately, this appointment is another example of the administration allowing ideology to trump science, and it could jeopardize vital services on which large numbers of women and families depend," the letter said. Signers included incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who will be chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee.

Jackie Payne, director of government relations for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said Keroack's record opposing birth control speaks for itself.

"The fact that he's the medical director of an organization that takes that position is, at best, hypocritical if he's doing something different in private practice," she said. "That's not the kind of advocate for birth control that we need. We need someone to head up the family-planning program who is wholeheartedly for family planning."

Pearson also acknowledged yesterday that Keroack is not currently certified as an obstetrician-gynecologist. That is not a requirement for the job, but HHS officials had cited Keroack's expertise in defending his selection.

Keroack was certified by the American Board of Obstetrics and Gynecology in 1995, but that credential expired after 10 years.

"He inadvertently missed the recertification deadline and for 2006 is listed as board-eligible, meaning he is eligible to take the recertification exam," Pearson said. "He plans to seek recertification in the future."

Advocates Expect Democrats To Avoid Culture Wars (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Advocates for abortion rights, gun control and gay rights say they are thrilled by the Democratic takeover of Congress. Even so, they admit their issues aren't likely to be addressed early — or at all — during the legislative session that begins in January.

“I'm aware of political reality when you're coming up to a presidential election,” says Caroline Fredrickson, Washington legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union. “I'm afraid (Democrats will) be a little too cautious.”

Illinois Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who headed the Democratic campaign committee and is part of the leadership team setting the agenda for the upcoming term, says his party was “very clear” on its priorities: The Iraq war, ethics reform, health care, jobs and other economic concerns will come first.

That's not likely to deter liberal bloggers and groups such as MoveOn.org, says University of California-Berkeley political scientist Bruce Cain. Those groups will “keep the heat on,” Cain says. He predicts they'll have little success. “The Democratic leadership will completely stifle” debate on issues that could hurt chances to retain the majority or take the White House in 2008, he says.

Vanderbilt University political scientist Bruce Oppenheimer agrees. "I do not expect either the Democratic House or Senate leadership to bring up things that are going to force members to take tough votes."

Many Democrats still recall 1993, when Bill Clinton, the first Democratic president in 12 years, tried to make good on a campaign vow to allow gays to serve openly in the military. Republicans seized upon the issue, forcing Clinton's compromise, the "don't ask, don't tell" policy. The next year, Republicans gained control of Congress for the first time in 40 years.

Among the liberal causes likely on hold:

·Abortion rights. Although she picked up 22 allies in the House and three in the Senate, Nancy Keenan of NARAL Pro-Choice America says federal efforts to reduce unintended pregnancies by promoting sex education and making contraceptives more available must wait. "We have some bigger issues to be dealt with early on," she says.

·Gun control: Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, says he has seen a list of the top 100 Democratic priorities; reinstating the now-expired ban on military-style assault weapons is "in the 90s." At least, he says, conservatives can't weaken gun-control laws.

·Gay rights. David Smith of the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group, expects Democrats to push legislation to bar workplace discrimination against gays and amend the federal hate crimes law to include sexual orientation. Still, he says, those changes won't come until "much later" in the session.

"If champagne corks are popping from our perspective, it's because we're not going to be attacked," Smith says. Otherwise, "it's a much more measured can of Budweiser that's being popped."

Dodd's Balancing Act To Get Tougher (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21—As Senator Christopher J. Dodd prepares to take over the leadership of the Senate Banking Committee while also considering a run for the presidency, lobbyists and lawmakers are all asking the same question.

"Does he become a populist champion on issues that broadly affect the middle class" asked Travis B. Plunkett, the legislative director of the Consumer Federation of America, "or does he shrink from controversial issues that offend huge donors?"

It is a question facing not only Mr. Dodd, but the Democratic Party more generally as it assumes control of Congress.

In his case, Mr. Dodd has shown through a 25-year record in the Senate that he is adept at going both ways. He has, at various times, broken with big corporate interests in support of a principle. At other times, he has broken ranks with his more liberal party peers to advance causes associated with corporate patrons.

Mr. Dodd takes the gavel at a pivotal moment.

As Enron and WorldCom fade from the news, some of his constituents are seeking to water down the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, passed in 2002 to strengthen the role of corporate gatekeepers in response to a wave of scandals.

The accounting firms have been asking for limits on their legal liability. Large companies are battling against renewed attempts to give shareholders a greater say in corporate affairs and to ward off efforts to curtail high executive pay packages. Hedge funds are resisting calls for greater regulation and transparency.

How Mr. Dodd balances the competing interests of corporations and financial institutions with those of investors will define his chairmanship.

In a recent interview, Mr. Dodd said that he had hoped to be seen as unpredictably independent and willing to listen to both corporate interests and consumers.

Sounding as much like a presidential candidate as a new committee chairman, he said he planned to broaden the agenda of the committee. He proposes to look at issues of national security, including the way the administration reviews foreign investment in vital American companies, and prosperity, by examining everything from affordable housing to the loss of manufacturing jobs in the United States.

He also laid down some early markers for the new legislative session. He said he was satisfied with Sarbanes-Oxley, which he played a significant role in drafting. He said he had not yet reached the same conclusions as the Bush administration and some Democrats that the law, combined with excessive litigation, had driven companies to issue stock in overseas markets instead of on Wall Street.

"I'm open to listening," he said. "But if I get a sense that these new proposals are going to weaken transparency and stability and the competence in the system, then I'm going to be resistant."

A liberal Democrat on many social and foreign policy issues, Mr. Dodd, who is 62 and is the senior senator from Connecticut, has had a reputation for using his skills as a legislative deal maker to benefit many of America's most powerful corporate interests, who also happen to be from his home state. They include the insurers, accounting firms, hedge funds and military contractors that are responsible for making Connecticut the state with the highest per capita income in the nation.

The companies have returned the support, pouring millions of dollars into campaigns that have repeatedly returned Mr. Dodd to Washington, the last two times beating opponents by margins of greater than two to one. Over the last 20 years, he has received millions of dollars from Wall Street, the insurance industry and the largest accounting firms. But he has also taken on large corporate interests.

Mr. Dodd worked closely with consumer groups to battle the large banks and credit card companies in their ultimately successful attempt to overhaul the bankruptcy system. While Mr. Dodd and his allies failed to block the legislation, they managed to delay its passage by nearly a decade and to water down some of provisions that were especially tough on debtors.

"There was no payoff for opposing all of the bankruptcy amendments and in fact all of the money was on the other side and there was plenty of political cover to vote for them," recalled Professor Elizabeth Warren of Harvard Law School, a bankruptcy expert who fought the measure. "But Dodd led the push on the other side. He had an abiding interest in the gritty details of the financial instruments that slowly drive money out of the pockets of middle-class families."

In a more recent fight, Mr. Dodd and the consumer groups have promoted a measure to curtail high credit card fees. At a hearing this year, he said that credit cards increasingly were little more than "pocket-sized predatory loans" and he has proposed legislation that would curtail the ability of the companies to market credit cards to students who are not able to afford debt.

On the other hand, Mr. Dodd was on the opposite side from against consumer groups in the 1990s when he sponsored legislation that made it more difficult for investors' lawyers to sue corporations. In that fight, he also broke ranks with many Democrats, including President Bill Clinton, who vetoed the legislation but then did nothing to stop Mr. Dodd from marshaling enough votes to override the veto.

More recently, Mr. Dodd and consumer groups were at odds over a plan supported by the insurance industry to extend a federal terrorism insurance program.

More often than not, Senator Dodd is known for being effective.

"He's been a consumer champion on some issues and opposed to us on some issues," Mr. Plunkett said. "He is extremely effective, so you always want him on your side. When we see he is going to be in the opposition, we definitely wince."

More than a week after the election, Mr. Dodd still seemed surprised that the Democrats had recaptured the Senate and was just beginning to figure out in what direction he hoped to take the committee.

Mr. Dodd, who has formed a presidential exploratory committee and will decide early next year whether to enter the race formally, said a candidacy would help get him out of Washington to hear the views of a wider variety of people. "One of the advantages, if I do this, is that I know who I am," he said. "And I'm not going through some metamorphosis here. This is not a warm-up for something. For me to go around and become someone I'm not would be ridiculous on its face. I wouldn't be comfortable with it anyway."

He said he prided himself on not always taking positions that sided with either business or the consumer.

"We spent a lot of time on the credit card issue from a consumer perspective," he said. "Obviously I've got to pay attention to the provider side. I saw an article describing me and that said I wasn't allergic to business. That's true.

"I've got business interests I've got to pay attention to," he added. "But I also want to make sure that, in the process of doing so, that we recognize there is a consumer at the end of that product."

He said he wants to always be known for "maintaining independence in terms of approach."

"I don't ever want to be a predictable member of that committee," he said, "to be branded somehow, one way or the other, but to be fair and open and listen to arguments."

His support of his home state industries is hardly reflexive. Some of the biggest insurers in his state, for instance, have been lobbying hard for legislation that would permit them to be regulated by Washington instead of the states. But Mr. Dodd has not signed on. He said he was not convinced that Washington could do a better job than state commissioners had been doing.

"Dodd has been a question mark on the proposal," said Frank Keating, the former governor of Oklahoma who is the president of the American Council of Life Insurers. He said the issue of a federal charter for insurers is the single biggest one for the industry. "He has always been very open minded and a fair broker on the issues," Mr. Keating added. "But he's also a tough and questioning legislator."

Mr. Dodd's ascension to the committee chair comes at a moment of transition for the banking panel.

Senator Paul S. Sarbanes, the cerebral senior Democrat of the committee who was the most important lawmaker behind the landmark legislation that is named after him, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, is retiring. So is Mr. Sarbanes's top adviser, Steven B. Harris, who has been a senior Democratic aide to the committee for 20 years, and is widely credited with stewarding the legislation through Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0097383

Mr. Dodd will oversee a committee loaded with both Democratic and Republican lawmakers who have also raised millions of dollars and supported the causes of the big banks, Wall Street and the major insurance companies. Some members have begun to publicly question important parts of the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

And the new chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, Barney Frank of Massachusetts, has said that he thinks regulators can make adjustments to the law so that it is less burdensome on small business.

Mr. Dodd's own imprint was on that law. Months before Mr. Sarbanes filed the legislation, Mr. Dodd and a Democratic colleague from the committee, Senator Jon Corzine of New Jersey (now New Jersey's governor), outlined their ideas for legislation over lunch, as Mr. Dodd describes it, "on a napkin in a Senate cafeteria."

"I came away thinking we'll plant a flag," Mr. Dodd recalled. Their proposal, to restrict accountants from offering both auditing and consulting work at the same companies, became a cornerstone of the Sarbanes-Oxley law.

Mr. Dodd said Sarbanes-Oxley had gone far to promote better corporate governance and transparency.

"I've always felt that the most important thing you have to worry about is investor confidence," he said. "I have no obligation whatsoever to guarantee that you're going to make sure that you are going to make money on your investment. But I feel a very strong obligation," he added, that "you didn't lose it because the system broke down. That to me is going to be very important when I listen to these arguments."

Spoils Of Prime Office Space Go To Democrats (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — Forget those pesky leadership fights. The folks who run Congress are now getting down to what really matters on Capitol Hill: dividing up the office space.

In something of a break with recent tradition, the incoming Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, is planning to expropriate the second-floor suite of offices now occupied by the current speaker, J. Dennis Hastert — a handful of rooms providing a spectacular view of the Mall.

That space has been in Republican hands for 50 years or so, even when Democrats were in charge. In fact, the main offices are so strongly associated with Republicans that they were officially designated the Robert H. Michel Rooms by the House in 1995 in honor of the popular former Republican leader.

While there might be some private grumbling by Republicans about the Democratic land grab, even Mr. Michel sees nothing wrong with Ms. Pelosi wanting to move into his namesake space.

"The speaker is the speaker," Mr. Michel said in an interview. "They reign supreme over on the House side, and they can pretty much do anything they want to."

While Democrats are moving up, Republicans are downsizing, abandoning their preferred spots and planning to squeeze into the current, tighter digs of the Democrats.

Even as Republicans were voting last week on their new leaders, a couple of top staff members from the office of the current majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, just happened to stop by Ms. Pelosi's office to visit with some Democratic friends — and take a peek at their likely new quarters. Mr. Boehner will be minority leader when the new Congress convenes in January.

And on Monday, the new Democratic majority leader, Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, toured Mr. Boehner's present offices on the first floor of the Capitol to see where his furniture might go. Note to President Bush: No word on whether any drapes were measured.

Vice President Dick Cheney might also come out a loser in this literal floor fight. Democrats have an eye on an office on the House side that Republicans granted to him as a kind of second home in the Capitol, to complement his office on the other wing of the building, where, by virtue of the Constitution, he presides over the Senate (he has no formal role in the House). Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, is interested in reclaiming Mr. Cheney's House space for the Ways and Means Committee.

Given the finite amount of space in the landmark building and the natural competitiveness of politicians, office space has always been currency in the Capitol. Lawmakers leverage their majority and seniority for the top views, the most convenience and suitably impressive surroundings to dazzle their constituents, supporters and even themselves. To many members of Congress and their equally status-conscious staffs, you are where you sit.

To Democrats, one of the chief fringe benefits of the coming takeover is that they will no longer be at the logistical mercy of Republicans. In fact, one of Ms. Pelosi's best applause lines during last week's leadership elections was when she raised the subject of a room for future Democratic meetings. "We can have any room we want now," she told her approving colleagues.

Even as it became apparent that Democrats could regain the majority, Republicans were starting to wonder if Ms. Pelosi might be interested in the speaker's rooms. On Monday she toured the offices that Mr. Hastert has called home, and aides said she was inclined to grab them.

Democratic aides say it is mainly a matter of needing more space, especially since the construction of a visitors' center on the east front of the Capitol cut into current Democratic space, including the offices that had been the center of House power when Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. ruled. Democratic leadership aides are scattered around the building, including a makeshift office in a renovated part of what had been the members' dining room.

"We have offices tucked away on four different floors," said Jennifer Crider, a spokeswoman for Ms. Pelosi, who said the new offices would allow the staff to be consolidated.

But there are other perquisites. The office now occupied by Mr. Hastert faces the Mall and comes with a balcony that has been the scene of many a reception, staff party and occasional marriage proposal while providing great viewing of the Fourth of July fireworks.

Mr. Michel said the offices came under a long-term Republican lease back in the mid-1950s when Sam Rayburn of Texas decided that his Republican counterpart, Joseph Martin of Massachusetts, could stay there after he was ousted as speaker when Democrats regained control.

"When I first got elected in 1956, I went in to see Joe, and it was in one of those little anterooms," said Mr. Michel, who would later occupy the offices for 14 years.

Despite the appeal of the suite, Democrats in those days preferred their rooms along the East Front, closer to the House floor and the better to keep an eye on things before the days of C-Span and instant messaging. After Mr. Martin and before Mr. Michel, the rooms also housed the operations of the Republican leaders Charles Halleck, Gerald R. Ford and John Rhodes.

Republicans were surprised when Democrats did not eventually try to reclaim the offices, particularly when Thomas S. Foley became speaker in 1989. But he decided to stay in the offices he had had redecorated while he served as Democratic majority leader.

Then, when Republicans swept to control in 1994, the offices became the speaker's. Ms. Pelosi appears to believe they should remain that way. And several Republicans said they did not begrudge her the right.

"I am an old-fashioned guy and believe the spoils go to the victor if she wants it," said Representative Jack Kingston, Republican of Georgia.

The election did not set off the same office go-round in the Senate; the leaders there tend to retain their offices no matter which party is in charge.

In the House, the departure of lawmakers also set off a lottery for new quarters for their home-state Congressional offices in the adjacent office buildings. Even veteran lawmakers sought to upgrade their suites.

In fact, Ms. Pelosi received a new office there as well, taking the space to be vacated by Mr. Hastert's Illinois Congressional office when the outgoing speaker decided he needed more room since he would no longer have any in the Capitol.

Financial Crimes Chief Leaving Treasury (AP-Y)

AP, November 22, 2006

The chief of a federal agency that plays a key role in trying to catch terrorist financiers, drug lords and other criminals is stepping down at the end of this year.

Robert Werner, director of the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, will take a job with Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc., the department announced Tuesday.

Werner, who took the helm of the network, known as FinCen, in March, also had served as director of the department's Office of Foreign Assets Control, which administers and enforces economic sanctions and is another important player in the administration's efforts to financially paralyze those who bankroll terrorist activities.

FinCen's deputy director, William Baity, will serve as acting director once Werner leaves.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said Werner's leadership at FinCen "has paved new inroads in partnering with the financial community to safeguard against financial crime while promoting the free flow of capital."

A flap ensued earlier this year over a once-secret program the department uses to try to thwart suspected terrorist financiers. The administration insisted that news organizations' disclosure of the program, which gives the government access to a vast data base of international financial records, would hobble its efforts to catch terrorist financiers in the future. The program also stirred some concerns over privacy matters.

Senate Seeks Medicaid Review (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0097385

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Senate Finance Committee is seeking a review of the District's Medicaid program, citing a "troubling" recent city audit of patient transport and reports of questionable billing.

In addition, the D.C. Office of the Inspector General is conducting two audits of the city's Medicaid transportation program -- one examining the background of providers and the other focusing on the legitimacy of claims being submitted by transport companies.

The federal and local scrutiny of the District's Medicaid transportation program follows a report last month in The Washington Times that noted long-standing lapses and concerns about the program.

Sens. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican and chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Max Baucus of Montana, the panel's ranking Democrat, sent a letter Friday to D.C. Inspector General Charles Willoughby seeking a confidential briefing on efforts to probe city Medicaid costs.

The letter cites a recent report by Mr. Willoughby's office that found the city's Medicaid transportation program had "a serious breach of basic internal controls."

Mr. Grassley and Mr. Baucus said transportation costs "are often overlooked and represent a major opportunity for abuse."

The letter also expressed concern about reports of transportation providers billing services to patients who were dead when the claims were submitted.

The Times first reported that neither the D.C. Department of Health, which oversees Medicaid, nor the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Commission, which licenses motor carriers, had conducted background checks of company officials in recent years.

A review of court records and other official documents of transportation companies on the D.C. Medicaid provider directory found company officials with criminal histories and others with numerous driving violations.

Last year, the District spent $22.3 million for nonemergency transportation of Medicaid patients -- slightly more than what the city paid for patients to see individual doctors, according to city records.

D.C. Council member David A. Catania, an at-large independent who has held hearings on the transportation problems, yesterday said that he's satisfied reforms are under way.

"I'm delighted we've taken the steps we've taken so that when this sit-down happens between our inspector general's office and the congressional representatives, they're going to be very impressed with some of the steps we've taken," said Mr. Catania, who has headed the council's health committee.

Medicaid, which provides health insurance for the poor, is funded by the federal government and the states, which also manage their programs.

An official with the D.C. Office of Inspector General yesterday said the office will meet with the Senate Finance Committee by the end of the month.

The Finance Committee letter requests updates on "all ongoing audits, evaluations and investigations that examine the Medicaid program in the District of Columbia."

The letter from Mr. Grassley and Mr. Baucus was similar to one the Finance Committee leaders also sent to the inspector general for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

The federal government's watchdog on public health spending is conducting a nationwide review of Medicaid transportation costs.

According to its recently released 2007 audit plan, nonemergency transportation costs rose nationally by 48 percent from 1999 to 2003, reaching $1.5 billion.

What's more, the Washington-based Community Transportation Association of America says the District trailed only Alaska in how much it has paid for transporting Medicaid patients.

Alaska encompasses more than 581,000 square miles; the District, 63 square miles. Commercial airfares account for more than 90 percent of Alaska's Medicaid transportation costs, while the District relies on a fleet of private van carriers, according to records.

The District pays companies up to $140 per trip. By comparison, a cab ride across the city would cost about $40, plus tip.

The Senate committee letter says previous federal audits have found numerous shortcomings with nonemergency transportation, including "unnecessary trips and excessive claims as well as billing Medicaid for trips never provided."

D.C. officials say they are now conducting background checks of providers.

Mr. Catania said that Robert Maruca, deputy director of the Medical Assistance Administration, has done "extraordinary work" in outlining new measures, including steps to ensure all trips are medically necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0097386

"Everyone was disappointed that the controls did not exist and that money was lost and stolen," Mr. Catania said. "But going forward, I think we'll see a dramatic reduction in the fraud and abuse in the program."

IBM, Cray Win Pentagon Funds To Develop Next Supercomputers (WSJ)

By Don Clark

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

A Pentagon research agency announced plans to spend nearly $500 million to develop next-generation supercomputers, funding ambitious design efforts at Cray Inc. and International Business Machines Corp.

The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency said it will award Cray $250 million and IBM $244 million under a new phase of a long-running development program, which hopes to create not only major advances in hardware but also new ways to program massive scientific machines.

Supercomputers have long been purchased by the government to handle complex computing chores, from cracking codes to calculating the trajectories of missile flights. The size of Darpa's research grants is unprecedented, IBM and Cray officials said, reflecting a determination to ensure the U.S. remains in the forefront of the field.

The contract award is particularly significant for Cray, a supercomputer specialist that reported total revenue in 2005 of about $201 million. Cray's Darpa proposal is based on a concept that it calls "adaptive" supercomputing, which involves creating a system with thousands of microprocessor chips of several different kinds that can be simply programmed with a single technique. "It's incredibly difficult to do," said Jan Silverman, a Cray senior vice president.

IBM plans to develop a system around the next generation of its Power chip line, along with a series of its own technologies to make programmers more productive. "This is not a project to serve a single customer or solve a single mission. It's an investment to significantly increase to total use of high-performance computing," said Dave Turek, who holds the title of vice president of "deep computing" at IBM.

An IBM system at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory is currently the world's fastest, operating at a maximum speed of about 360 trillion calculations a second -- or "teraflops," in industry parlance. The Darpa program is aimed at developing machines that operate at two to four "petaflops," or quadrillion operations a second, with prototype systems expected by 2010.

The one company left out by Darpa is Sun Microsystems Inc., which took part in earlier phases of the program with Cray and IBM. A Sun spokeswoman said the company had nonetheless benefited by the effort so far, developing technologies it will use in commercial systems.

Husband Of Trade Representative Dies (AP-Y)

AP, November 22, 2006

Curtis Carroll, husband of U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab, has died, Schwab's office announced Tuesday.

Carroll, a professional magician, died Monday of kidney and liver failure, Schwab spokesman Sean Spicer said.

Schwab, former dean of the University of Maryland School of Public Policy, became President Bush's chief trade negotiator in June, succeeding Rob Portman, who was tapped to become White House budget director.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative John Veroneau will represent Schwab on Wednesday at the signing ceremony for a free trade agreement with Colombia, Spicer said.

Spellings Finishes 2nd On 'Jeopardy' (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Education Secretary Margaret Spellings says she studied hard to prepare for Tuesday night's airing of "Celebrity Jeopardy!"

"I didn't want to be the education secretary who didn't know how to spell potato," Spellings joked, describing how she read books and sought advice from a former show contender and her daughters.

In the end, Spellings said she thinks the effort was worth it. She came in second behind the actor Michael McKean, best known for his role as 'Lenny' on the television show "Laverne and Shirley" and for the movie "This Is Spinal Tap."

Placing third was actor Hill Harper, from the television show "CSI: NY."

"I think I held my own," Spellings said in an interview Tuesday, hours before the show aired. She noted McKean had an edge, having been on the show before.

Spellings was the first Cabinet secretary ever to appear on the popular quiz show. She said she'd like to return for another try.

DOJ_NMG_0097387

She said she didn't realize how much skill went into hitting the buzzer at just the right moment after host Alex Trebek read a clue. She said she often hit it too early and as a result didn't get picked to tackle a category.

Spellings' strong subjects included international language and business.

She was asked to appear after the show's producer read a magazine article in which Spellings said she was a "Jeopardy!" fan.

Each celebrity earns at least $25,000 for the charity of his or her choice, and the winner gets $50,000 for a charity.

Spellings' winnings from the show, taped in New York last month, went to ProLiteracy Worldwide _ an international literacy organization.

Trebek said "Jeopardy!" picked the charity for Spellings to comply with government ethics rules.

The Admiral Charts An Unknown Course (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

It's a timeless scene: The old salt talking to youngsters, laying out his views about the lessons of war, about its cost and its sacrifices.

In this case, the salt is retired Adm. William J. Crowe Jr., who at 81, with hearing aids and stooped shoulders, is passing along his sea of wisdom to a classful of intense and intrigued midshipmen at the U.S. Naval Academy.

But rather than telling the class that he has all the answers, Crowe says, "I don't know the answer about how to get out of Iraq."

He does have some notions on how to avoid getting into another Iraq-like complication. Amid a growing chorus of antiwar pronouncements from the left and the right, presidential acknowledgment that the war is not going well, a pending report from the Iraq Study Group and a major Pentagon review, Crowe believes it's the perfect moment to craft guidelines that might be used the next time around.

Getting into just about everything -- from sports cars to marriages -- is easier than getting out of them. And Crowe (rhymes with wow), who has been teaching in the academy's political science department since 1999, hopes to engender a sense of caution and reason in the next generation of commanders and help keep the United States from entering unjust -- and unjustified -- interventions.

He knows something about military leadership. A 1946 graduate of the academy, he rose to the top shelf of service in the Navy. In the early 1980s, he was commander in chief of Allied Forces Southern Europe, then of the U.S. Pacific Command. From 1985 to 1989, he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff -- under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush. He retired in 1989. He says he is politically independent. He supported John Kerry in 2004.

His eyes are a wintry blue. His mind keen and quick. Distinguished in a green tweed jacket and gold-rims worn low on the nose, he is teaching "Security Decision Making," a popular upper-level seminar. It's a small class today -- 10 men and women are gathered around a table in a drab, windowless room in the Nimitz building on the waterfront campus in Annapolis.

His concern, he tells the students in their dark uniforms, "is what we are going to do in the future, when you people are going to be involved."

In most international rivalries, he says in a soft voice, "the supporting arguments of both sides normally have merits and flaws."

The factions are "driven by history and intense emotions and reason has little to do with resolving such issues."

But, Crowe believes that reason should have a lot to do with such issues. When a nation steps into another country's affairs, he says, there is a price to pay. "Bending another culture to your will can't be done on the cheap. Our resources are not unlimited and we should not be led to believe otherwise."

Every administration "underestimates the cost in time, money and casualties," Crowe says. "Voters should be die-hard cynics when evaluating such predictions."

In order for international interventions "to be successful in a reasonable amount of time, the whole republic should be involved," he says. "We may be dealing with small countries, but to them the stakes are big time and they are willing to make astounding sacrifices."

It's an idealistic approach. But he also knows he is preaching to idealists.

Michael Deboer, 24, of Cleveland, will be graduating in the spring. He hopes to be working on a submarine -- as Crowe once did -- in a couple of years. Deboer says Crowe has taught him that "interventions don't always go the way planners planned."

Deboer says, "I'm a detail-driven guy. He makes you look at the bigger issues."

DOJ_NMG_0097388

Crowe "rewards careful thinking," says junior Fiona McFarland, 21, of New York. McFarland's mother, Kathleen Troia "KT" McFarland, was a Pentagon spokeswoman under Reagan and recently ran unsuccessfully as a Republican candidate for the Senate. Fiona McFarland wants to be a pilot. "He loves it when we take opposing sides," she says of Crowe. "He gets a little grin and a glint in his eye."

Next Phase Of White House Communications System To Begin (GCN)

By Nick Wakeman

Government Computer News, November 22, 2006

The completion of the transition of the White House's external communications system to an Internet protocol-based infrastructure will be done by General Dynamics Corp.'s IT business.

Under a $7 million contract from the White House Communications Agency, General Dynamics of Falls Church, Va., will use a Synchronous Optical Network backbone for connections between the White House and the outside world.

General Dynamics has been working with the White House Communications Agency for more than four years on various communications projects doing analysis, design and infrastructure upgrade work, said company spokesman Mark Meudt.

"This is just the next phase of that work," he said.

The work at the White House, including the most recent win, has been under contracts awarded by the Army Information Systems Engineering Command, which is tasked with supporting the White House Communications Agency, Meudt said.

"The communications capabilities for the White House must sustain critical day-to-day and crisis operations communications without fail," said Zannie Smith, senior vice president of Army solutions for General Dynamics IT, in a statement.

The White House Communications Agency provides the systems for the president, vice president, presidential emissaries, White House staffers and Secret Service. The systems include audiovisual, voice and data capabilities. The White House Communications Agency also supports the president when he travels.

House Staff Member Cleared In Inquiry On Leak Of Iraq Intelligence Estimate (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — A Democratic staff member of the House intelligence committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, committee officials said Tuesday.

Kate Phillips and The Times's politics staff are analyzing the midterm elections and looking ahead to 2008.

More Politics NewsThe staff member, Larry Hanauer, was suspended last month from access to classified materials at the direction of the committee's chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan.

Mr. Hoekstra said at the time that he thought Mr. Hanauer might have been a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Mr. Hanauer had obtained a copy of the classified study at the request of a Democratic panel member, Representative John F. Tierney of Massachusetts, shortly before it was described in the article.

Democrats on the committee protested that the accusation was groundless and unfair and that Mr. Hanauer had merely properly responded to a routine request from a member.

They said Mr. Hoekstra's action was payback for a decision by the committee's ranking Democrat, Representative Jane Harman of California, to release a report by an outside counsel into actions on the committee by former Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican now serving a prison term for taking bribes.

A spokesman for the panel, Jamal D. Ware, confirmed that "the suspended staff member has had his accesses restored at the committee," a development first reported on Tuesday by The Washington Post.

A Congressional official who insisted on anonymity said the internal inquiry, conducted by committee lawyers, involved having Mr. Hanauer sign an affidavit and answer questions.

In a statement, Ms. Harman said, "All of us are pleased that our valued staff member is back at work and that this meritless inquiry is over."

Mr. Hanauer's lawyer, Jonathan Turley, said Mr. Hanauer had been vilified on the Web and by anonymous callers, some of whom threatened him, called him a traitor and said he should face a firing squad.

"We are grateful that this long nightmare for Larry and his family is now over," Mr. Turley said. "It is regrettable that it took this long, given the total absence of any evidence linking Larry to the New York Times articles."

The Times had previously reported that its article was based on interviews with more than 10 government officials and outside specialists.

Clothes No Longer Make Just The Man (AP-Y)

By Jocelyn Noveck

AP, November 22, 2006

"The emperor has no clothes," House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi once famously said about President Bush.

Well, actually he has some fairly decent ones, but it's been Pelosi's clothes — stylish, well-chosen and nicely cut, of the Armani variety — that have garnered attention since she became the most powerful woman in American politics earlier this month.

Why do we focus on Pelosi's clothes and not those of our president, or any male in Washington? Is it inherently sexist, detracting attention from her obvious accomplishments? Or is it merely a reflection of the obvious truth that, while clothes matter for both men and women, female attire is more noticeable, more expressive and more interesting?

It's an easier call when the fashion verdict is negative. Then, it can seem cruel: Recall the harsh response to Bush's one-time Supreme Court nominee Harriet E. Miers, whose attire, accessories and makeup were excoriated in the media. If she'd been a man and her standard navy blue suits were a bit dowdy, one can imagine, no ink would have been wasted.

One person who finds attention to Pelosi's clothes "over the top" is Eleanor Smeal, one of the country's most recognizable feminists.

"Yes, she dresses impeccably and wears clothes beautifully," says Smeal, president of the Feminist Majority Foundation. "But this is a very accomplished woman. Why wasn't there more attention to her achievement of breaking through the marble ceiling (and becoming the first female Speaker in history)? They're trying to keep us on the style pages, the old-fashioned way."

But there is one positive aspect to the attention, Smeal says: "At least it's introducing the speaker to the country. Imagine if they DIDN'T like her clothes!"

Pelosi, a 66-year-old grandmother, isn't the first powerful woman in politics to be put under the sartorial microscope. The choices of Hillary Clinton, perhaps the most visible woman in U.S. politics, have been deconstructed through time, from her changing hairstyles to her inaugural hat in 1993 to the constant dark pantsuits on the Senate campaign trail, often paired with a pink blouse. (Again, imagine her well-dressed husband being criticized for always choosing a dark suit.)

Of course it isn't just in politics: on the night CBS's Katie Couric debuted as the first female solo anchor of a network evening newscast, her short white jacket (post-Labor Day, some critics noted disapprovingly) was analyzed as much as her performance.

One scholar of journalistic ethics argues that a politician's attire is fair game in news coverage — but only under certain circumstances.

"As a society, we look much more carefully at women's appearance than men," says Kelly McBride, a faculty member at the Poynter Institute in Florida. "At the same time, the clothing options for women are so much greater. As journalists, I don't see how we can ignore this."

The task for the media, McBride says, is to do it in proper context, and in a way that doesn't reinforce stereotypes. "It's safer to say, here's the reality: in our society we judge women by different standards — and then dig in to the nuances of that," she says. What's wrong, though, is to inject casual references to Pelosi's clothes into every news story, "which would reinforce the notion that women SHOULD be judged on appearance."

One extensive analysis of Pelosi's clothing came from Pulitzer-prize winning fashion critic Robin Givhan of The Washington Post, who often writes about the attire of major Washington figures — including a much-noticed piece on Vice President Dick Cheney's casual outerwear at a Holocaust memorial service in Poland last year.

Of the blue-gray Armani suit that Pelosi wore at her post-victory news conference, Givhan wrote that she appeared "polished and tasteful in front of the cameras. It is tempting to even go so far as to say that she looked chic, which in the world beyond Washington would be considered a compliment." Of outgoing speaker Dennis Hastert, whose rumpled suits have also been noted in the press, she wrote that there was "nothing chic or particularly polished" about him.

The article appeared in the paper's Style section, not in the political coverage — the kind of context and placement McBride was referring to. By contrast, an example of troubling references, to Smeal for one, are comments by MSNBC host Chris Matthews, who referred in his election-night coverage not to the clothing of the Democratic speaker-in-waiting, but her female voice.

Pelosi, he said, was "going to have to do the big fight with the president over issues" like the minimum wage. "How does she do it without screaming?" he asked. "How does she do it without being grating?" He also compared the sound effect of Sen. Clinton's re-election victory speech to "fingernails on a blackboard."

To David Brady, professor of political science at Stanford University, attention to Pelosi's clothes is a bit silly, but harmless in the long run.

DOJ_NMG_0097390

"The fact is she's an attractive woman and she wears nice clothes — and she's got money," said Brady, deputy director of the Hoover Institution. "There are men who dress well too," he said, singling out Presidents Clinton and Bush (who has his suits made by a French-born tailor in Washington.) "You've got a country where entertainment channels are more heavily watched than news shows, where people care about Kevin Federline and Britney Spears. This is a magnification of that silliness. In the long run it won't harm her effectiveness."

Greta Petty, a 35-year-old artist in Portland, Ore., agrees that attention to Pelosi's clothes is fairly harmless — if only because she believes that only women are interested in such coverage, anyway. "It's not an issue of sexism," she says.

Besides, she adds: "men's attire is just not that interesting."

Paulson May Find Sensible Doesn't Sell (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Hank Paulson, the new Treasury secretary, gave a splendid speech this week about the need to re-engineer the financial regulatory structure to make it more efficient and enhance the competitiveness of U.S. markets in the face of stiff new competition from London and Hong Kong.

Paulson is spot on about moving from a hyper-legal, "rules-based" approach to regulation -- with its detailed prescriptions and legal threat -- to a more "prudential" system based on broad general principles and backed by guidance from a regulator with plenary powers.

He's right about the need to throttle back on the rules requiring public companies to test their "internal controls" under the Sarbanes-Oxley reform law and focus only on processes having material impact on the accuracy of financial statements.

With all the consolidation in financial services, and new products that straddle the old regulatory boundaries, Paulson is right in suggesting a single regulator that might combine the work of the Federal Reserve's regulatory function, the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

And he's certainly right about the toxic effect of shareholder lawsuits on the way companies are managed.

These aren't new issues for Paulson. In many aspects, his much-anticipated speech this week was simply a reprise of one he gave to the National Press Club in June 2002, in the wake of the Enron and WorldCom scandals. Now, as then, his approach is reasoned, nuanced and pragmatic.

It is also refreshingly naive.

I say refreshing because Paulson comes at these issues as someone who is willing to take the facts and logic wherever they lead, even if it means offending friendly interest groups or running some sacred cows off the road. In speaking to business leaders at New York's Economic Club, or a couple of reporters in his sun-drenched corner office, he comes across as straightforward, candid, without guile.

What Paulson hasn't had time to master is the black art of Washington policy-speak -- and that is where the naive comes in.

When Paulson says implementation of Sarbanes-Oxley has gone too far, he is saying nothing that Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) and Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio) haven't themselves acknowledged, and that the SEC is now fixing. But to the ideologues at the Chamber of Commerce, such sentiments will be read as a tacit embrace of their view that government screws up everything it touches.

Similarly, when Paulson says our tort system amounts to a tax on shareholders, employees and consumers and weakens the competitiveness of U.S. business, he means just that. Unfortunately, those are the same lines used for years by the National Association of Manufacturers, whose real interest isn't in reforming the tort system but in castrating it.

When he points to the absurdity of having multiple state and federal agencies regulating the same company and competing to prosecute corporate misdeeds, Paulson means only to question the efficiency of our regulatory structure. But his old friends on Wall Street are surely interpreting that to mean that ambitious state attorneys general like Eliot Spitzer should never have been allowed to blow the whistle on tainted research and after-hours trading that had been going on for years, right there under the noses of federal regulators.

In time, I'm sure, Paulson will learn that in Washington, "risk-based" regulation is code for "self-regulation" and "materiality" is a moving target that allows executives to hide any embarrassing information from shareholders. And when someone calls for greater trust between the regulators and the regulated, it's really the regulators who are being asked to do the trusting. So if he means something different -- which I'm willing to believe he does -- then he needs a new way of expressing it.

In framing these regulatory issues in terms of international competitiveness, Paulson may also have fallen into the trap of confusing the public interest with the interests of Wall Street -- not surprising for a former head of Goldman Sachs. Certainly it is possible that financial services are moving offshore because of the greater hassles of U.S. regulation. But it is equally plausible that what we're seeing is the inevitable end to near-monopoly that has allowed U.S. financial firms to charge outrageous fees and earn outsized salaries and bonuses. A more seasoned Washington hand would have taken care to point out that if government has no business protecting the jobs of auto workers who price themselves out of world markets, it certainly has no business protecting millionaire investment bankers and hedge-fund managers.

Paulson also held Britain up as something of a model for the way financial services should be regulated. But he failed to note that, as part of that package, British corporations must get shareholder approval for executive pay packages and require directors to win support from at least half of all shareholders. By doing so Paulson could have sent a signal that he was really serious about improving corporate governance and protecting shareholder interests, not just carrying water for the Business Roundtable.

Paulson has brought a breath of fresh air to the stale partisan atmosphere of Washington. But if he wants to succeed as the honest broker, he'll need to crack the code on the Washington policy conversation and reassure Democrats and other skeptics that he's got something new to sell.

Capital Rules (WP)

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

TREASURY SECRETARY Henry M. Paulson Jr. spoke Monday on a subject he knows intimately: the health of U.S. capital markets. The United States has traditionally served as a capital market for the world. U.S. and foreign companies alike sought listings on U.S. stock exchanges so that they could tap into the world's largest and most efficiently managed pool of savings. But this has recently ceased to be true: Fewer companies are seeking U.S. listings; some foreign ones are delisting, preferring to trade on a stock exchange elsewhere; and many U.S. companies are turning their backs on stock exchanges altogether as private-equity funds acquire them. Some interest groups have presented these trends as evidence that the post-Enron reform of corporate governance, through the Sarbanes-Oxley law, overreached. Mr. Paulson rightly refused to swallow that simplification.

Companies are raising less money in the U.S. equity market partly because the alternatives have grown more attractive. Foreign markets are catching up in terms of the efficiency of their trading systems, so foreign companies have less of a need to come to the United States. Low interest rates have rendered borrowing cheap, which explains why private-equity firms can take out eye-popping loans to buy up companies' stock. Neither development is necessarily bad. Efficient equity markets in Asia and Europe will improve growth prospects in those regions, creating opportunities for U.S. exporters. And U.S. companies should be free to make their own judgments about shifting from equity to debt, although the fees earned by private-equity firms seem disproportionate.

The retreat from equity markets is only worrying if it reflects a decline in their efficiency rather than a rise in the appeal of other options. Mr. Paulson suggested that costs imposed by the U.S. tort system may deter companies from listing: As a share of gross domestic product, U.S. tort costs are twice those in Germany and Japan and three times those of Britain. Another deterrent comes from confusingly diffuse regulation. Equity markets are subject to oversight by the stock exchanges themselves, by self-regulatory bodies such as the National Association of Securities Dealers, by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, and by overlapping federal and state prosecutors. A third deterrent has been created by the Sarbanes-Oxley reform -- not by the law itself, but by its implementation.

Mr. Paulson said new legislation to amend Sarbanes-Oxley is unnecessary. Undoing corporate governance reform in the name of market efficiency would be perverse: Investors will only provide capital cheaply if they are offered reliable investment opportunities, and the scandals involving Enron and other companies demonstrated that company reports had ceased to be reliable. But auditors have insisted on an excessively burdensome implementation of now-infamous Section 404 of the law, which requires companies to check the management systems used to generate numbers on sales, inventory, costs and so on. What's needed is regulatory guidance to dissuade auditors from interpreting this requirement overzealously, particularly for smaller firms. Mr. Paulson has struck the right balance.

'Freedom' Is America's Truth, Sen. Webb -- 'Fairness' Is Subjective

In response to Jim Webb's Nov. 15 editorial-page essay "American Workers Have a Chance To Be Heard":

It is unfortunate, albeit not unexpected, that senator-elect Jim Webb makes the common mistake of using income inequality as a gauge of social injustice in this country. In a free market, income inequality is the inevitable result of individual productivity inequality, and of course productivity inequality exists due to variations in natural ability, industriousness, education, risk-aversion and dumb luck. The reason income equality has grown rapidly (although hardly "infinitely," as Mr. Webb hyperbolically asserts) is that productivity inequality has grown. And the reason productivity inequality has grown is that with the advance of technology and globalization, the impact of a good idea or exceptional performance can be leveraged dozens of times more than it could be even one generation ago. J. K. Rowling, the author of the Harry Potter series, has made more than $200 million for each book she has written. Is that too much? Absolutely not, when one considers the benefits that each book brings to tens of millions of children (and adults) around the globe. But the impact of J.K. Rowling's creativity and hard work, and the income she has earned from it, would have been perhaps orders of magnitude smaller 30 years ago.

Mr. Webb misses the point that one of the pillars of a free-market economy is that people should be allowed to earn in proportion to their productivity. To use government to do otherwise would be to impede productivity everywhere. In fact, my guess is that in most of the regrettable cases in which income vastly outstrips productivity, government intervention is probably to blame. The news that the three richest counties in the United States are clustered around Washington, D.C., certainly came as no surprise to me this morning.

In any case, a much better gauge of social injustice is consumption inequality. Of what relevance is it that there is large income inequality? Or wealth inequality for that matter? It only matters to the extent that it translates into unequal consumption of the country's resources, consumption being the true gauge of one's standard of living. I have not seen studies in this area, but my guess is that we are many times less unequal in our rates of consumption than in our levels of income or wealth.

Eric Meyer

Newton, Mass.

Blah, blah, blah. When are we going to actually hear something of substance from the Democrats? You would think they would've begun outlining how to deal with the "inequalities." People will start to think that they might not know what to do next.

Michael S. Woodard

Charlotte, N.C.

Mr. Webb forgets to mention in his diatribe against top wage earners that the top 5% band of earners pay 57% of the country's total income taxes. I guess that kind of data flew out of his mind when he switched sides.

Margaret McGirr

Greenwich, Conn.

Underneath the smooth rhetoric is a frightening message: "Fairness" is emphasized, but "freedom" not at all. Beware of any politician who places fairness over freedom. What is at jeopardy, in his hands, are your life, liberty and property.

Jim Brankin

Southlake, Texas

Mr. Webb asserts that the top 1% of wage earners "takes in" (not earns, mind you) "an astounding 16% of national income." IRS statistics for 2003 show the same top 1% pays a truly "astounding" 34.3% of all income taxes. If Mr. Webb could replace DNC talking points with some thinking and historical perspective, he might contribute rational problem solving rather then tired class envy and nostalgia for Great Society nostrums that led to Jimmy Carteresque stagflation.

Jay S. Haberman

New York

Nowhere does Mr. Webb actually outline what he'll do to benefit the American worker. All he provides is a list of Democrat buzzwords and phrases -- job outsourcing, CEO compensation, Rove, wage gap, Wal-Mart, etc. I have no problem with Democrats addressing issues they perceive to be hurting the American worker, but, please -- offer solutions.

Timothy O. Corkery

South Boston

Mr. Webb is long on class envy and short on facts. Nowhere does he state what he would do to change the status quo. Senator, it is not the politics of the Karl Rove era that are distracting and dividing people -- it's you.

Joe Schroeder

Big Canoe, Ga.

Mr. Webb's rant is right in tune with the heart and soul of his new party. He sounds like Willy Stark.

Douglass M. Holmes

Louisville, Ky.

I'm so glad Mr. Webb opened my eyes to the fact that we mindless rubes, who are concerned only with the issues of "God, guns, gays, abortion and the flag," have merely been victims of seduction by the all powerful "Oz" -- Karl Rove.

Mark Rauschenberger

Washington

The country has changed in the 40 years since Mr. Webb "graduated from college in the 1960s," but apparently he has not. Today, the percentage of home owners has increased from under 20% to about 70%; the stock-owning investor class has increased from less than 10% to about 60%. The "top tier" that "has grown richer" has itself increased (as a definition of upper middle class and above) exponentially. All of this is under a program of steady decrease in taxation and regulation.

Lenny Toboroff

New York

If so many jobs are disappearing, as Mr. Webb would have us believe, why is unemployment at a historical low?

Patrick Duffy

Haddon Township, N.J.

Mr. Webb says "manufacturing jobs are disappearing." True. Contrary to his suggestion, though, this fact is unrelated to recent trends in globalization, corporate governance or tax policy. Manufacturing jobs as a percentage of the U.S. work force peaked in 1945 and have declined steadily ever since, even though manufacturing output continues to rise. Today this output is at an all-time high.

Donald J. Boudreaux

Chairman

Department of Economics

George Mason University

Fairfax, Va.

Mr. Webb's discussion of class structure implies that we are locked into a class and cannot escape, something that is simply not true in America. We can all move through various economic situations quite fluidly without any restrictions due to birth. Mr. Webb himself is a fine example: From his days working part time in college to becoming a best selling author to a senator, he has moved dramatically between various "classes" of earnings. Opportunity in America is distinctly classless.

Richard Noble

Eagle, Ind.

Jim Webb expresses a profoundly shocking un-American idea: From each according to his ability, to each according to his need. Our founding principle of individual rights recognizes the sovereignty of the individual in his thoughts and actions and the government as the protector of the individual's life, liberty, property and pursuit of his own individual happiness. The values he creates by his own efforts are his to dispose of as he chooses, not the property of the family, the tribe, or the state. There is no national income.

Great Plains Drought Is a National Disaster

Your Nov. 15 editorial "Fargonomics" misrepresents the facts on agriculture disaster assistance. My bipartisan legislation would bring badly needed federal aid to the thousands of farm and ranch families whose livelihoods were destroyed by natural disasters including drought, flood, frost and disease.

This country has always responded to disasters, whether hurricanes, wildfires or drought. To represent the deepening drought of the Great Plains as anything but a national disaster is an affront to every farm family in the Midwest. This is the third worst drought in U.S. history, searing millions of acres of crops and livestock forage, and driving producers and the small town businesses that rely on them to the brink of foreclosure. If we do not respond, the drought will be followed by economic disaster across the plains.

You misrepresent the role of crop insurance. Yes, crop insurance is an important risk management tool for farmers and ranchers. But when those losses stack up year to year, as has happened as the drought conditions have worsened year after year, crop insurance loses its effectiveness -- the amount of crop loss covered goes down, while premiums go up. Crop insurance was never designed to cover repeated losses. Crop insurance isn't covering basic farm expenses, and the natural disasters depleting our farms and ranches are breaking the backbone of the Midwest economy.

Suffering in Africa Makes Us See (RED)

Your Nov. 10 editorial "Shopping for the Poor" (Taste page, Weekend Journal) made an astute observation: "Good charity" theory includes (in its DNA) the concept of sacrifice. You suggest that (Product) RED, our venture, is playing a part in questioning the hair shirt thinking. That was great. But alas, you then committed several interpretive misdeeds.

First, you say "too bad" that many (Product) RED items are not made in Africa. Give us a chance! We've been in business in the U.S. only five weeks. But within these weeks, we now have what we never had during our two years developing this project: objective proof that (RED) branded products produce a measured commercial advantage. Because we did not have that proof during development, could you really have expected us to persuade giant multinationals to source 100% of the (RED) products in Africa? That said, it is great that Gap has been producing there for years and that Motorola was able to purchase packaging materials in Lesotho.

Now that Gap has proved our theory, you will see many more products manufactured on the continent, not because we proselytized but because companies have seen the commercial advantage in doing so.

Second, you assert that because the Geneva-based Global Fund supports "a range of heath-related projects," our manifesto's assertion that (RED) money will not purchase AIDS medicines is incorrect. I am thrilled to confirm that the fund has accepted that money made by (RED) and will be used only for purchase and delivery of medicines to those suffering from HIV in Africa, with particular emphasis on women and children.

Third, you suggest that our energy might be better spent on promoting trade with poor nations. Because we have a lot of energy, we have made this exact idea part of our work at DATA, a public education/lobbying organization Bono and I co-founded in 2000. In fact, DATA is an acronym for "Debt Aids Trade for Africa" in return for "Democracy, Accountability and Transparency for Africa." Along with many others, we have supported new trade initiatives, including the Millennium Challenge Corp., change to customs regulations and AGOA, the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows tremendous new investment and trade between the U.S. and Africa. Our sister entity, one.org, works on trade issues in a grassroots manner.

We created (RED) to bring the marketing brilliance and the budgets of the private sector to bear on the greatest human health-care crisis in history. To make this happen, we needed a device, a brand that would enable the bravest and smartest companies to invest and to make money on that investment. (RED) is that brand.

Gap's campaign has proved our idea not only by its genius advertising and products, but by that fact that all Gap employees have been trained to explain this crisis to customers. In malls across America, young Americans are explaining AIDS to their customers and selling them T-shirts made in Lesotho and denim made in America from African cotton. As success builds on itself, more products will be sourced in Africa.

In addition, Motorola has launched its (Product) RED phones with Sprint and US Cellular -- wait until sales people in Sprint stores are telling stories about the positive effects of America's medicines and the opportunities for investment in Africa. Wow.

The Democrats' Economy Wars (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

When voters went to the polls this month, they registered not only a revulsion with the Republican regime but also a profound -- almost un-American -- anxiety about the nation's future. They ousted incumbents who wanted to stay the economic course, choosing instead Democratic challengers who questioned free-trade orthodoxy. In the exit polling, a plurality said they believed that life for the next generation of Americans would be worse than it is today.

All wings of the Democratic Party seem to understand the extent of America's economic problem. The architects of Bill Clinton's economic and trade policies, as well as their more liberal critics, all agree now, in the words of Clinton Treasury secretary Lawrence Summers, that "the vast global middle is not sharing the benefits of the current period of economic growth -- and that its share of the pie may even be shrinking." The era of globalized free trade that Summers and his iconic predecessor at Treasury, Robert Rubin, sped on its way, Summers admits, has benefited many Asians and, here at home, has been "a golden age for those who already own valuable assets. . . . Everyone else has not fared nearly as well."

Concerned that the American dream is fading for the middle class, and fearful that said middle class may turn against the global free-trade order he helped erect, Rubin has created the Hamilton Project, which, in the spirit of its namesake, our first Treasury secretary, proposes a series of enlightened Tory solutions to address these conundrums. The project has called for greater public investment in education, health care, research and development, and infrastructure; balancing the budget; and wage insurance for workers compelled to take lower-paying jobs in our Wal-Mart-ized economy.

But are these solutions remotely adequate to the problem, which is ultimately that of wage convergence in the globalized economy? Even its proponents seem not to think so. "Let us be frank," Summers wrote in a Financial Times column. "What the anxious global middle is told often feels like pretty thin gruel. . . . [More] education [can't] be a complete answer at a time when skilled computer programmers in India are paid less than $2,000 a month."

When Rubin was pressed by the Nation's William Greider in June as to whether he thought the project's proposals would arrest or offset the global convergence of wages, he said, "I don't know the answer to that. I would guess that the answer to that question is no."

For the Democrats who now run Congress, not to mention those planning to run for president, the fact that the party's economic gurus have devised a policy that they themselves believe isn't up to the challenge at hand can't be greatly heartening. Happily, this is not the only project whose work the Democrats will be able to access. This June, in response to the Hamilton Project's creation, a group of some 50 liberal economists loosely affiliated with the Economic Policy Institute (EPI) began work of their own. Their project, yet to be named (its founders have resisted the temptation to call it the Aaron Burr Project), will be unveiled in January.

The fundamental difference between the two projects -- that is, between the two primary schools of Democratic economics -- is that Rubin's largely believes the rules of the market to be immutable and sound (though it's precisely the rules of the market that are depressing American incomes), while EPI's, in the words of economist Mark Levinson, "rejects the notion that what has happened to this economy is inevitable. Policy can turn this around." (Full disclosure: Levinson is an old friend.)

For starters, EPI's project will call for a pay-or-play health insurance system (employers can cover their own employees in private plans or pay taxes into an expanded version of Medicare that will cover everyone else) and for a retirement system in which employers can offer their employees pensions or, with their employees, pay into a system administered by Social Security. It will suggest a series of policies to decouple globalization from downward pressure on wages -- adding some enforceable labor standards, for instance, to the rules of the World Trade Organization.

Less cosmically, economist Jeff Faux pointedly asks, "Why should middle-class taxpayers fund Harvard to dream up new products that will be made overseas? We need to condition greater R&D funding to production here at home."

Over the next two years, both projects will barrage the Democrats with their ideas. At times their perspectives may converge. (Rubin seems to be edging closer to acknowledging a need to reestablish workers' rights to join unions, long a priority of the EPI crowd.) But the creation of EPI's project balances the scales in the Democratic universe. The Hamilton Project is the policy voice of the party's largest business donors. In the project to be unveiled in January, the party's voters get a policy voice, too.

Bush's Daughter Robbed In Argentina (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

U.S. and Argentine media reported that one of President Bush's 24-year-old twin daughters had her purse stolen while being guarded by the Secret Service during a visit here.

ABC News, citing unidentified law enforcement reports, reported on its Web site Tuesday that Barbara Bush's purse and cell phone were taken while she was dining in a Buenos Aires restaurant.

La Nacion newspaper, citing anonymous government sources, said in its online edition early Wednesday that one of Bush's daughters had her purse taken Sunday afternoon in the popular tourist district of San Telmo.

A pair of thieves removed the purse from under a table while Secret Service agents stood guard at a distance, La Nacion reported. La Nacion said its sources did not reveal which of the Bush daughters had her purse stolen.

Argentine police told The Associated Press they had no complaint of any such incident on file, and the U.S. Embassy in Buenos Aires said it would have no comment. In Washington, the White House, Secret Service and State Department also declined comment.

CNN cited a law-enforcement source who was briefed on the incident as saying that "at no point were the protectees out of visual contact and at no point was there any risk of harm."

Argentina's largest-circulation daily, Clarin, ran an online report citing the government news agency Telam as saying that Barbara Bush had her purse taken along with a cell phone that was inside it. Telam cited an official source who did not wish to be identified by name and who provided no other details.

Barbara's twin, Jenna, visited neighboring Paraguay last month to take part in a UNICEF program for young professionals.

One Syllable Of Civility (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

If he wanted to, President Bush could change the tone in Washington with a single syllable: He could just say "ic." That is, he could stop referring to the opposition as the "Democrat Party" and call the other side, as it prefers, the Democratic Party.

The derisive use of "Democrat" in this way was a Bush staple during the recent campaign. "There are people in the Democrat Party who think they can spend your money far better than you can," he would say in his stump speech, or, "Raising taxes is a Democrat idea of growing the economy," or, "However they put it, the Democrat approach in Iraq comes down to this: The terrorists win and America loses."

But even as he promised to work to change the tone in Washington after the elections, the president couldn't manage to change his language. In his day-after-the-elections news conference, Bush employed this needling locution five times. "This morning, I spoke with Republican and Democrat leadership in the House and Senate," he began, adding, "it is clear the Democrat Party had a good night last night." That was followed by references to "Democrat leaders," "Democrat leadership" and

"Democrat votes," as in, "We got some tax cuts passed with Democrat votes." Geez, you'd think he'd at least give them the -ic when they vote for his tax cuts.

The president isn't alone in his adjectival aversion to "Democratic" when it comes to the party. The provenance of the sneering label "Democrat Party" stretches back to the Harding administration. William Safire traced an early usage to Harold Stassen, who was managing Wendell Willkie's 1940 campaign against Franklin D. Roosevelt. A party run by political bosses, Stassen told Safire for a 1984 column, "should not be called a 'Democratic Party.' It should be called the 'Democrat party.' "

Democrat Party was used, pardon the phrase, liberally by Wisconsin Sen. Joseph McCarthy. According to the Columbia Guide to Standard American English, " Democrat as an adjective is still sometimes used by some twentieth-century Republicans as a campaign tool but was used with particular virulence" by McCarthy, "who sought by repeatedly calling it the Democrat party to deny it any possible benefit of the suggestion that it might also be democratic." The word also achieved a prominent run with Bob Dole's especially ugly reference to "Democrat wars" during the 1976 vice presidential debate.

But Democrat-as-epithet has seen its fullest flowering -- on talk radio, among congressional leaders and, more than with any of his predecessors, from the president himself -- during the recent Republican heyday. As Hendrik Hertzberg pointed out in the New Yorker in August, the conservative Web site NewsMax.com takes pains to scrub Associated Press copy "to de-'ic' references" to the party.

There is, I concede, a trivial, sticks-and-stones quality to this linguistic bickering. "Two thousand, eight hundred, forty-seven votes in Montana may break your control," the Democrats might taunt the GOP, "but names will never hurt us." As any parent who's ever had to mediate between squabbling siblings could tell them, "He's only doing it because he knows it bothers you. If you don't respond to him, he'll stop." After all, Democrats, what's so terrible about being called Democrat, small "d" or large?

But as a matter of simple politeness -- something the Bush family is famously good at -- it's rude to call people by a term that makes them bristle, even a seemingly innocuous one. There's also something grating and coarse-sounding about this abbreviated appellation, like saying "Jew" instead of "Jewish." It is, conservative wordsmith William F. Buckley wrote in National Review in 2002, "offensive to the ear."

And with reason: It's intended to be. Republican -- Publican? -- politicians drop the -ic both to annoy the opposition and to diminish the big-D Democrats' claim to the small-d democratic virtues. " 'Democrat Party' is a slur, or intended to be -- a handy way to express contempt," Hertzberg wrote. "At a slightly higher level of sophistication, it's an attempt to deny the enemy the positive connotations of its chosen appellation."

In the few weeks since the election, the president has followed up his syrupy rhetoric of cooperation with a series of face slaps: pushing the doomed nomination of John Bolton to be ambassador to the United Nations, resubmitting the equally doomed nominations of a quartet of offensive judicial selections and naming a physician to head the federal family planning program who works for clinics that refuse to offer birth control.

So it's probably naive to give any credence to the presidential happy talk and blue ties. But if, just maybe, the president wants to do more than pay lip service to the notion of a new tone in Washington, he could start by just paying lip service.

OTHER NEWS:

White House Cuts GDP Outlook Amid Slump In Housing Market (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The White House said it expects somewhat slower economic growth this year and next than it forecast six months ago, partly because of a slump in the housing market. It also said it expects a slight increase, both from its earlier forecast and from this year, in inflation in 2007 and 2008.

In an updated economic forecast, the administration said it expects inflation-adjusted gross domestic product, the value of all the goods and services produced in the economy, to increase 3.1% this year, down from its June forecast of 3.6%. Economic growth is expected to slow to 2.9% in 2007, down from its previous estimate of 3.3%.

As for inflation, a decline in record-setting energy prices prompted the White House to lower its 2006 estimate for consumer-price-index growth to 2.3% from its June forecast of 3%. But the administration is predicting a slight increase to 2.6% in 2007 and 2008.

The new economic-growth forecast, on which the president's new budget will be based, is largely in line with private-sector estimates. Private forecasters are predicting GDP growth of 3.4% this year and 2.6% in 2007. On the inflation front, the private sector is less sanguine about 2006, estimating 3.5% CPI growth and 2.5% in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0097397

Administration officials said the economy is still strong and that they saw no signs for concern about economic growth or inflation. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, in a statement, said the revised forecast suggests the economy is "moderating to more sustainable growth levels, firmer labor markets and steady inflation rates."

The Bush administration's lowering of their 2006 and 2007 economic forecast2 is an official confirmation of the housing sector's impact on the economy, John Harwood reports.

Edward Lazear, chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, said much of the downward revision in growth was due to a faster-than-expected decline in the housing market, which, he said, "has been hit harder than most of us had expected. Most forecasters were expecting a slower decline."

Administration officials pointed to revised forecasts of unemployment as a sign that the economy is going strong, saying they expect the economy to create about 129,000 jobs a month going forward. They now expect the unemployment rate in 2006 to average 4.6%, down from the previous 4.7%. They forecast unemployment will remain at 4.6% in 2007 and rise to 4.8% in 2008.

US Labour Market To Remain Tight In 2007 (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

The US labour market will remain tight next year, the White House predicted Tuesday, raising hopes that ordinary Americans will start to feel more of the benefits of the country's economic expansion.

Issuing its twice-yearly economic forecasts, White House economic advisors said unemployment would average about 4.6 per cent in 2007, only a slight bit higher than the present 4.4 per cent.

Jobs growth would average about 129,000 a month – fewer than anticipated in June, but enough to keep unemployment low due to the falling number of people joining the labour market.

Ed Lazear, the chairman of the council of economic advisors, said, "I would anticipate that we will have positive and strongly positive real wage growth in the next year."

The White House forecasts came as Kevin Warsh, a governor of the Federal Reserve, warned that inflation remains "uncomfortably elevated" in spite of the recent deceleration in core inflation.

Mr Warsh said financial market prices suggested that inflation would decline slowly, but added, "There remain, I believe, clear upside risks to that outlook."

After growing slowly for much of the economic cycle, real average hourly wages for non-supervisory workers are up 2.8 per cent year-to-date, taking into account the benefit of the sudden drop in energy prices.

Mr Lazear said Tuesday that providing energy prices now stabilise, real wages will grow strongly into 2007. Critics, though, say the most recent gains are a one-off result of lower oil prices, and will not be sustained.

The White House cut its forecast for economic growth this year, next year and in 2008. Mr Lazear blamed the reduction on a sharper-than-expected correction in the housing market.

However, he said there were few signs that the slowdown in housing was spilling over into the rest of the economy, citing robust figures for consumption and retail spending.

The sharpness of the retrenchment in housing so far could point to a better than expected recovery ahead, he said.

Mr Lazear declined to speculate as to whether the housing market would bottom out this quarter or next, but said he thought growth in the fourth quarter would be stronger than in the third.

The White House raised its estimate for inflation next year, to 2.6 per cent from 2.4 per cent as measured by the consumer price index.

Mr Lazear played down the significance of this increase, highlighting recent favourable readings of headline, core and producer price inflation.

Nonetheless, if the forecast combination of higher than earlier anticipated inflation, plus a stronger than earlier expected jobs market were to materialise, it is hard to see the Federal Reserve in vigorous interest rate-cutting mode next year.

Slower Economy Growth Forecast (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The Bush administration yesterday predicted slower but steady economic growth over the next year, revising estimates downward because of a sluggish housing market.

DOJ_NMG_0097398

Administration officials also said inflation should remain at a manageable pace, while unemployment has now dropped to 4.4 percent and will remain at 4.6 percent as an annual rate for 2006 and 2007. The forecast was one of the periodic updates released by the administration, and will be the basis for President Bush's 2008 budget he will send to Congress early next year.

In reviewing the numbers, Rob Portman, director of the Office of Management and Budget, said they showed a "strong, growing economy, steady growth, good numbers on inflation in the sense that they're lower again."

The gross domestic product is now expected to grow by 3.1 percent in 2006, down from the 3.6 percent growth predicted in June.

"That's primarily a reflection of the housing market, which as most of you know, has been a bit slower than expected," said Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

But he said the slump seems to be contained in the housing market and hasn't affected other parts of the economy. He said one example is construction, in which nonresidential activity has increased, so construction jobs have shifted there from home building.

In 2007, the White House is now expecting the economy to grow by 2.9 percent -- also lower than its previous forecast for 3.3 percent growth. And, in 2008, the White House is projecting a 3.1 percent growth rate, slightly less than its old forecast for a 3.2 percent growth rate.

"The economic forecast clearly reflects the fact that the U.S. economy is moderating to more sustainable growth levels, firmer labor markets and steady inflation rates," said Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson.

Yesterday's forecast does not cover federal revenue, which has surged in recent years, helping reduce the deficit. Revenue grew 11.8 percent in fiscal 2006 and 14.5 percent in 2005, but analysts have said those increases will be difficult to match in the future.

The upcoming budget process will already be challenging for the White House because Democrats will control both houses of Congress for the first time with Mr. Bush as president.

Lower energy prices have also helped on the inflation front. The forecast put the Consumer Price Index for 2006 at 2.3 percent, down from an earlier prediction of 3 percent and well below 2005's actual rate of 3.7 percent. The 2007 forecast is for a 2.6 percent increase.

The forecast was a joint effort by the Treasury Department, the Council of Economic Advisers and OMB.

White House Lowers Forecast For Growth (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 (AP) — The White House on Tuesday lowered its forecast for economic growth this year and next, reflecting the drag from the housing slump.

The Bush administration is also predicting that the unemployment rate will turn out to be slightly lower than previously thought.

Under the administration's new forecast, gross domestic product will grow by 3.1 percent, as measured from the fourth quarter of last year to the fourth quarter of this year. That is down from a projection of 3.6 percent in early June.

Still, the new forecast would represent decent growth, especially given the strain on overall economic activity from the housing slump.

The housing market has been hit harder than the administration had expected, Edward P. Lazear, chairman of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers, told reporters.

Gross domestic product measures the value of all goods and services produced within the United States and is the best measure of the country's economic standing.

The White House is now expecting the economy to grow by 2.9 percent in 2007 — also lower than its previous forecast of 3.3 percent growth.

The nation's unemployment rate, which averaged 5.1 percent last year, is expected to dip to 4.6 percent this year — a slight improvement from the administration's previous forecast for an unemployment rate of 4.7 percent this year.

Nasdaq, S& P Both Manage 2006 Records (USAT)

USA Today, November 22, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks crept higher Tuesday as rising oil prices partly smothered euphoria over shares of Internet wunderkind Google cracking the $500 barrier (story, 1B).

DOJ_NMG_0097399

The Nasdaq composite and Standard & Poor's 500 indexes, which include Google among their components, both set 2006 highs: The Nasdaq was up 2.12 points to 2454.84 and the S&P was up 2.31 points to 1402.81. The Google-free Dow Jones industrial average rose 5.05 points to 12,321.59 that left it 21 points shy of its record close on Friday.

Google was the Wall Street story of the day as it rose $14.60 to $509.65 and breached $500 for the first time. But there was plenty else to influence traders, including oil, which rose $1.37 to $60.17 on news of temporary trouble with an Alaskan pipeline and a couple of U.S. refinery outages.

Another factor was the approach of the Thanksgiving holiday Thursday and a shortened trading day on Friday.

"We've been seeing a slow down-trickle in volume over the past few days because of the holiday," says Scott Fullman, director of investment strategy for Hapoalim Securities USA. "The market is just holding here, trying to work off a little bit of its overbought conditions that resulted from the rise that we've had over the past month or so."

Richard Cripps, chief market strategist for Stifel Nicolaus, says choppy market conditions are common at this point in the year. "I won't go so far as to say investors should cancel holiday plans with the family to watch the final tick on Wednesday," he says, "but I'd say this week still presents fresh opportunities. Friday will obviously be much less."

Highlights:

Medtronic gained $4.60 to $53.55 after the biggest maker of heart defibrillators reported earnings above projections late Monday.

·Apple Computer rose $2.13 to $88.60 and set another all-time high amid bullishness about the potential for iPod sales in the holiday season.

·Boeing added $1.98 to $91.10 and also set an all-time high. Korean Air placed an order for 25 Boeing aircraft.

·Spirit AeroSystems closed at $29, up $3.19, or 12%, from the $26 at which it sold 55.1 million shares in an initial public offering. Spirit is a former Boeing unit that makes commercial jet fuselages and wing parts and is now controlled by Canadian buyout firm Onex.

·Brown Shoe gained $6.22, or 16%, to $45.77. The operator of the Famous Footwear chain posted a bigger-than-expected 36% jump in third-quarter profit and raised its full-year forecast.

Weighing In On Wages (NYT)

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

Nearly every month for the past two and a half years, inflation has eaten up whatever wage gains most American workers have managed to eke out. In August, however, the cost of living started to moderate, thanks largely to falling energy prices. As a result, wages outpaced prices substantially in September. And in October, according to a government report last week, average hourly earnings were 2.8 percent higher than a year earlier, after adjusting for inflation — the biggest annual increase since 1998.

A real increase is something to cheer for a broad swath of working Americans — non-managers who make up 80 percent of the labor force and whose wages up until now have not reflected their impressive productivity over the past several years. But behind the headline numbers, the wage picture — and what it says about the economy — is still cloudy.

The gains of September and October were due to declining inflation, not faster wage growth. And with most economists predicting a slower economy through the middle of next year, it's unlikely that American workers will get a sustained pay boost any time soon.

In other words, Americans' purchasing power now depends almost entirely on the up and down of energy prices. That's not encouraging for anyone worried about America's dependency on the countries that produce most of the world's oil. It's also not likely to make for a confident consumer in an economy that has long depended on enthusiastic borrowing and shopping to fuel growth. And sure enough, retail sales have been disappointing even as gas prices have declined. An economic analysis released this week by Merrill Lynch shows that fatter paychecks in September fed into just three spending categories: music, clothing and eating out, rather than big-ticket categories like cars or appliances. In October, consumers backed off even more, with most all of the "extra" pay going into groceries and pharmacy items.

The coming holiday shopping season will be the true test of consumer resiliency. But the modesty of recent purchases — in the face of the best real wage growth in eight years — does not bode well.

There are early signs that Americans, untypically, may choose to pay down debt in the weeks and months ahead, rather than spend their money. The savings rate, though still negative, has improved of late, while bank lending to households has flattened.

Debt reduction would help families clean up their balance sheets, but it risks slowing the economy even further as spending winds down. That may be an inescapable bind. Working Americans, who have yet to participate fully in the Bush-era economic expansion, may not be ready or able to rev up the economy out of its current slow pace.

Re-election Assured For 2 Republicans (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, Nov. 21 (AP) — More than a week after Representative Heather A. Wilson, Republican of New Mexico, claimed a razor-thin election victory, her Democratic challenger conceded Tuesday, saying that a recount would cost too much and that there was no guarantee it would reverse the result.

In the Second Congressional District of Ohio, Representative Jean Schmidt, a Republican, clinched re-election Tuesday. Additional ballot counts gave her an insurmountable edge of about 3,200 votes over her Democratic challenger, Victoria Wulsin.

In New Mexico, Ms. Wilson, a five-term congresswoman, won by 875 votes, with 105,921 votes to 105,046 votes for the Democrat, Patricia Madrid, the state attorney general.

Giuliani Files To Explore Run For President (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

Former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York has filed papers with the Federal Election Commission to create a presidential exploratory committee, joining a fellow Republican, Senator John McCain of Arizona.

Mr. Giuliani's filing, hand-delivered to the commission on Monday, says he is still "testing the waters," meaning that for now, he can raise and spend money on polls and travel but not declare himself a candidate or build a substantial war chest.

Mr. Giuliani, 62, who was mayor from 1994 to 2001, created a political committee in New York State on Nov. 10 called the Rudy Giuliani Presidential Exploratory Committee. But he stopped short of filing federal papers, leading to speculation that he had doubts about even weighing a run.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Mr. Giuliani, declined to comment.

John H. Gross, a litigation partner and the chief of the insurance coverage practice at Proskauer Rose, a New York law firm, is the treasurer of Mr. Giuliani's federal campaign organization. It has the same name as the New York organization, where Mr. Gross is one of three directors.

On Nov. 15, Mr. Giuliani met in Manhattan with supporters who could form the core of a national fund-raising effort, including Thomas O. Hicks, the owner of the Texas Rangers; Mel M. Immergut, the chairman of the New York law firm Milbank, Tweed, Hadley & McCloy; and William E. Simon Jr., an investor who ran for governor of California in 2002.

Mr. Giuliani crisscrossed the country this year, visiting 25 states to campaign with or raise money for Republican candidates, according to his political action committee, Solutions America. But political analysts say his liberal views on social issues like abortion and gay rights could be a liability in a Republican primary.

"Everyone I've talked to keeps dismissing him for one reason or another: that he's from New York, that he's moderate, that he's wrong on one social issue or another," said Frank I. Luntz, a Republican pollster who worked for Mr. Giuliani in his 1993 and 1997 mayoral campaigns. "They don't know Rudy Giuliani, and they don't understand the electorate. The public is demanding intelligent leadership and is far more focused on personal attributes of the candidates than on specific policy issues."

Mr. Luntz said he believed that the midterm elections, which cost Republicans control of Congress, would lead party members to consider an unorthodox candidate like Mr. Giuliani.

"There's a great fear among the G.O.P. — and it's a legitimate fear — that they could end up losing everything," he said. "In times of genuine crisis, leadership matters a heck of a lot more than anything else."

McCain Defiant As Iraq Fires Early 2008 US Vote Talk (AFP-Y)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, November 22, 2006

As Americans wonder when the troops will come home from Iraq, Republican White House hopeful John McCain is laying his first big bet of the 2008 campaign: demanding more soldiers for the war.

The US entanglement in Iraq is already driving the run-up to the next presidential polls, and barring a miracle peace, or abrupt US retreat, looks certain to become an even more potent issue.

Potential candidates are putting up trial balloons, as a committee of veteran Washington policymakers and a White House panel probe possible changes in US strategy as violence rages in the occupied country.

At first sight, McCain's position appears to jar with political logic, after the rout of his Republican Party in congressional elections two weeks ago, which exit polls showed were heavily influenced by dismay over Iraq.

It also contrasts sharply with the call of victorious Democrats for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0097401

"He doesn't necessarily believe that the signal that was sent in the mid-term elections was an endorsement of withdrawal, per se, as much as it was an endorsement of doing something differently," said Jamie McKown, professor of government at Maine's College of the Atlantic.

"That is a fine line to walk."

McCain, 70, set Washington abuzz with a speech to a Republican political action committee Thursday, just over a week after the elections and on the day he took the first formal steps toward launching a campaign.

"Without additional forces, we cannot win this war," the former Vietnam War prisoner said.

A day earlier, McCain used a congressional hearing to dress down General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think the status quo and the rate of progress we're making is acceptable. I think most Americans do not," McCain said.

Abizaid said a 20,000-troop increase in the 144,000-member US force would have a temporary effect on violence, but warned the pool of available combat troops was not large enough to sustain such an increase.

On Sunday, McCain was asked on ABC if it was "immoral" to ask US troops to stay in Iraq, when in his view, they were undermanned.

"Yes, it is," McCain answered. "We've got to ask ... some questions. One, are we winning? And I think the answer is no ... Can we still win? Yes, I believe we can."

As Democrats demand a phased withdrawal of US troops, McCain says more men must be poured in to flush out insurgent strongholds, crush militias and sectarian violence and to train Iraqi forces.

He has already differentiated himself from fellow 2008 hopefuls.

Former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani, a possible Republican candidate, said he was waiting for the congressionally mandated Iraq Study Group to report on possible options, though was quoted last week as saying the United States needed to be "steadfast in Iraq."

Democrat front-runner Senator Hillary Clinton last week warned "hope" was not a strategy in Iraq. Senator Barack Obama, a rising Democratic star also considering a run, Monday called for a phased withdrawal of US troops.

McCain may be tailoring his message to hawkish, pro-military conservative voters who will decide the Republican nominee in primary elections.

"I don't think it dooms him in his primary process. He has a hard right primary he has to go through. My guess is that's part of the calculation," Democrat Senator Joseph Biden, mulling his own White House run, told NBC Monday.

This is merely the latest in a string of maverick stands by McCain, which include challenges to his own party over corporate financing and to the White House over torture.

The downside to his bet appears to be that if he wins the nomination, he may have trouble selling his message to voters nationwide in the 2008 elections.

"If things are getting worse and there is more of a consensus to say bring the troops home, he has to find a way to do that," said McKown.

McCain appeared on NBC last week showing the first signs of a possible exit route.

"So we're at a decision point. We either set up a plan for withdrawal, or withdraw, or whatever it is that is going to prevail," McCain said.

Asked if he would advocate withdrawal without more troops, he replied: "I think that that's pretty much my position."

Romney Forges On, Heedless Of GOP Losses (AP-Y)

By Glen Johnson

AP, November 22, 2006

By almost any measure, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — a would-be presidential candidate — should be hanging his head right now.

He was chairman of an association supposed to elect Republican governors, but they lost 20 of 36 races on Election Day, which saw widespread GOP losses.

Then, in an issue critical to the GOP's conservative base, the Massachusetts legislature balked at his request to let state voters decide on an anti-gay marriage amendment, forcing him to petition the state's highest court.

In addition, two of his potential rivals, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani, jumped out and announced they were forming presidential exploratory committees.

Yet true to the business training that earned him hundreds of millions of dollars, Romney has a plan and he's sticking to it.

DOJ_NMG_0097402

The 59-year-old former venture capitalist, who gained fame resurrecting the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics, is proceeding on a methodical course of fundraising, staff-building and outreach.

If successful, Romney would be the first Mormon elected to the White House.

He plans to file papers establishing some sort of presidential committee by mid-December, one top aide said, so he will be ready to start raising money for it on New Year's Day.

Romney himself said as recently as last Friday that should he decide to run for president — and nearly all his travel and daily events are focused on such a run — he would announce his decision in early 2007. His term as governor ends Jan. 4.

"I have not seen an individual approach this situation with a greater degree of structure or by compiling such a vast database for making it, both on the personal and political sides," said Tom Rath, a veteran New Hampshire political operative who has advised former Republican candidates such as Bob Dole, George H.W. Bush, Lamar Alexander and George W. Bush.

The son of George Romney, the former governor of Michigan and a 1968 presidential candidate, Romney has worked assiduously to position himself as the top alternative to McCain.

A University of New Hampshire poll last month had the Arizona Republican in first with 32 percent, Giuliani second with 19 percent and Romney third with 15 percent.

Romney sought and won the chairmanship of the Republican Governors Association, allowing him to spend this election year traveling the country and dispensing cash to his party's gubernatorial candidates.

He raised a record $20 million and was especially generous with governors association money in early presidential states like Iowa, Florida and his native Michigan. While Republicans surrendered the nation's gubernatorial majority to the Democrats on Election Day, Romney had a ready explanation.

"The job of Republican Governors Association chairman is to raise money," he said. "We're not going to take the credit for any wins we get, nor are we going to take the blame for losses we suffer."

As for his party's broader losses, he — as did McCain last week — blamed his party for straying from its roots.

"We must return to the common sense Reagan Republican ideals of fighting for hardworking Americans," Romney said in a postelection statement.

Where Romney may take some heat, especially from the social conservatives who are instrumental in early primary voting, is over his positions on gay marriage and abortion.

Romney ran as a moderate during his 2002 gubernatorial campaign. Despite saying he personally opposed abortion, he not only pledged to leave the state's abortion laws intact, but noted his mother, Lenore, ran for U.S. Senate in 1970 as a supporter of abortion rights.

He now stresses his opposition to abortion in speeches across the country.

In 2002, Romney's supporters also handed out fliers with well wishes from him and his running mate during Boston's annual Gay Pride Parade. He was endorsed by the Log Cabin Republicans, a group of gay party activists. In 2003, he signed a proclamation hailing a gay youth parade.

Nonetheless, Romney has insisted his opposition to gay marriage has been unflinching. He has lambasted the Supreme Judicial Court for its November 2003 decision making Massachusetts the first state to legalize gay marriage.

He also chastised the Democratically controlled Massachusetts Legislature for voting earlier this month to recess without acting on a proposed constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between one man and one woman.

Some 170,000 people signed petitions to get the question on the ballot in 2008.

"The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the constitution," he said Sunday during a rally on the Statehouse steps. "Let us not see the state, which first established constitutional democracy, become the first to abandon it."

The Rev. Jerry Falwell, an evangelical who founded the Moral Majority, said he expects Christian conservatives will focus more on Romney's personal morality and his current views than his past statements or his faith.

"We're not trying to find a Sunday school teacher in chief; we're trying to find a commander in chief," said Falwell, who traveled to Massachusetts last month to meet with Romney. Also attending the meeting were Franklin Graham, Gary Bauer, Lou Sheldon, Richard Land and other conservative social and religious leaders.

"Where he goes to church will not be a factor; how he lives his life will be," said Falwell.

Romney's political action committee, the Commonwealth PAC, raised $8.75 million and gave away $1.3 million in the most recent election cycle — virtually the same dispensed by McCain's much older "Straight Talk America" committee.

The governor's top political advisers, meanwhile, tend to be Bush-heavy. They include Ron Kaufman, the former White House political director under President George H.W. Bush; Alex Castellanos, a media consultant for President George W. Bush; Jan van Lohuizen, a pollster for the president and Republican National Committee, and Alex Gage, a "microtargeting" expert who helped Bush pinpoint pockets of support in the 2004 presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0097403

"The governor expects in the next couple of months he will have an announcement about his future," said Eric Fehrnstrom, Romney's gubernatorial spokesman. "Until that time, he will continue to travel and meet with people as he decides about what is ahead of him."

Brownback To Put Feet To His Faith (KCS)

By Matt Stearns

The Kansas City Star, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON | Sam Brownback's post-Thanksgiving schedule: an HIV test and reporting to prison.

No, that's not the set-up for a tasteless joke involving the conservative U.S. senator from Kansas. It's further evidence that, as Brownback nears a possible formal announcement he will explore a run for president, he is determined to stake out a unique position in a crowded Republican primary field.

Typically pigeonholed by political analysts as the candidate of the religious right, Brownback hopes to be more.

By highlighting issues like the plight of prisoners and poverty in developing nations, Brownback is trying to broaden his appeal beyond religious conservatives, a powerful force in Republican primaries and his base of support.

It's an effort to show that compassionate conservatism is not an empty motto — that his faith is calling him to deal with such issues.

"There's this great coming together taking place, left and right, on Africa, on global health issues," Brownback said.

"This could be a moment where a broader vision can catch on among people of faith, and among political activists, the further left the better. They care deeply about these issues. Here's a chance to have a broad public basis of support. It's a beautiful moment if we don't mess it up."

On Dec. 1, Brownback and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a possible Democratic presidential candidate, will be at Saddleback Church in Southern California, pastored by best-selling author the Rev. Rick Warren, for the Global Summit on AIDS and the Church. The summit will bring together major faith-based relief organizations, government officials, and church officials from several denominations to discuss responses to the AIDS epidemic, especially in the developing world.

Brownback and Obama will get HIV tests to "de-stigmatize the test and the information" and discuss working across party lines on such issues.

On Dec. 8, Brownback is set to spend the night at the Louisiana State Penitentiary, popularly known as Angola. Since its dark history as one of America's toughest prisons, Angola has emerged as an example of enlightened prison management.

He hopes his visit will highlight the success of faith-based programs. Six evangelical churches work inside the prison walls, and more than 120 prisoners have earned degrees in Christian ministry.

Noting that the U.S. recidivism rate is about 67 percent, Brownback said that "we're not being successful in addressing their problems and needs" and that faith-based initiatives could play a role in helping.

For Brownback, the unifying theme of his post-Thanksgiving trips is simple, if unusual, in the context of a presidential campaign: "Every soul is unique and precious, a child of the living God and should be treated as such, whether they're in prison or suffering from AIDS."

It's not a new notion for Brownback: He has worked with Obama and others, including Hollywood liberal George Clooney, to bring Western attention to — and try to prod action on — the genocide in Darfur, including winning passage of a $50 million emergency aid package for Darfur refugees.

On Tuesday, he and Sen. Richard Durbin, an Illinois Democrat, urged governors to divest state pension funds of investments with companies doing business with Sudan.

Brownback also has introduced legislation urging drug companies to produce drugs that would cure diseases disproportionately affecting the developing world. He helped pass legislation to crack down on human trafficking.

He remains best known for his close association with religious conservatives, and his related stances against abortion rights, embryonic stem cell research, and same-sex marriage.

Linking that social conservatism with calls to action on issues like AIDS and poverty will be part of "fleshing out what a pro-life agenda is," he said.

"That may be the thing he does to set himself apart," said Joe Aistrup, a political scientist at Kansas State University.

Brownback said he would announce within a month whether he would form a presidential exploratory committee.

If, as expected, he does, he will need something to overcome the challenges of money and fame he will cede to frontrunners like U.S. Sen. John McCain of Arizona and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney. Highlighting his unorthodox policy approach may be his best shot.

"Sometimes these approaches fit the mood of the country, and that's why they're successful," Aistrup said, citing Jimmy Carter's post-Watergate, grassroots campaign of 1976.

One Religious Group Drops Plans For Wal-Mart Boycott (WSJ)

By Kris Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

DALLAS -- A religious group that had rallied members to boycott Wal-Mart Stores Inc. this weekend backed off the pledge on Tuesday.

The American Family Association, a Tupelo, Miss., group claiming nearly 3.5 million members, had urged its followers to stay away from Wal-Mart on the Friday and Saturday following Thanksgiving to protest the retailer's recent ties with homosexual groups, including its decision this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses. Another religious group, Operation Save America, intends to "proclaim the Gospel of Jesus Christ at more than 300 Wal-Mart stores" on Friday.

Yet, after Wal-Mart issued a statement on Tuesday outlining its policies on corporate donations and its stance against discrimination, the American Family Association declared itself "pleased" and withdrew its call for a boycott.

In a statement on its Web site, the association credited its decision to withdraw its boycott to Wal-Mart's announcement Tuesday that it will not "make corporate contributions to support or oppose controversial issues unless they directly relate to their ability to serve their customers."

Wal-Mart spokeswoman Mona Williams said the retailer recently made a "clarification" to its policy on corporate giving but the change was not related to the potential boycott. "We are trying to be more thoughtful and focused in our giving," spokeswoman Mona Williams said. "We will not support controversial issues but will continue to partner with a broad range of diverse organizations on individual projects. For example, we will not support issues we do not take a position on, such as same-sex marriage. But I can see us partnering with the same organization on individual initiatives such as one that supports workplace equality or fights against hate crime."

The American Family Association and other groups are up in arms over Wal-Mart's decision earlier this year to join a national chamber of commerce for gay and lesbian businesses, as well as for its donations to other gay and lesbian groups. Wal-Mart on Tuesday issued a statement on the matter on one of its Web sites, www.walmartfacts.com1. The retailer also distributed it to its 1.3 million U.S. employees.

"We take pride in the fact that we treat every customer, every supplier and every member of our individual communities fairly and equally," the statement reads. "We are working hard to make our corporate contributions reflect the values of our customers, communities and associates."

Wal-Mart, Bentonville, Ark., already faces an organized media campaign from one of its biggest critics -- the United Food and Commercial Workers union's WakeUpWalMart.com2 -- to dissuade shoppers from visiting its stores this weekend. And the retailer already anticipates a challenging start to the holiday season: It predicts it will post no gain in same-store sales -- or sales at stores open for at least a year -- for November.

Wal-Mart has made one change that might appeal to Christian groups. It intends to make "Merry Christmas" a prominent theme in its marketing and in-store signs this year, as opposed to the "Happy Holidays" that some retailers have used in the past to the ire of Christian groups.

John Fleming, Wal-Mart's chief marketing officer, said in an interview on Monday that the retailer's "single greatest portion of customers celebrates Christmas, and it is important to them." For example, the section in Wal-Mart stores including Christmas lights and other decorations is now labeled a Christmas shop rather than a holiday shop.

"This is really about listening to our customers and our associates," Mr. Fleming said of the "Merry Christmas" theme. "As one of our associates pointed out last year, 'Why do we call it a holiday shop when it has Christmas trees in it? It's a Christmas tree. We should call it a Christmas tree."

Wal-Mart, which operates nearly 4,000 stores in the U.S. and more than 2,700 abroad, logged more than $312 billion in revenue last year.

Birthrate Among Teenagers Drops To Record Low (USAT)

By Rita Rubin

USA Today, November 22, 2006

The birthrate among U.S. teens, which has been falling since its peak in 1991, dropped to an all-time low in 2005, according to preliminary data released Tuesday by the National Center for Health Statistics, part of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Among Hispanic teens, though, the birthrate is twice as high as the overall teen birthrate.

Overall, the preliminary 2005 rate for females ages 15-19 was 40.4 births per 1,000, down from 41.1 in 2004 and 61.8 in 1991. The Hispanic rate for teens 15-19 was 81.5, down from 82.6 in 2004 and 104.6 in 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0097405

Abstinence and contraceptive use “are still driving factors” behind the declining teen birthrate, says demographer Stephanie Ventura, co-author of the report.

Fear of contracting a sexually transmitted disease has helped spur teens to use condoms or delay having sex, says Bill Albert, deputy director of the National Campaign to Prevent Teen Pregnancy, a non-profit group based in Washington.

“AIDS has a way of getting a guy's attention in a way pregnancy did not,” Albert says.

Some highly effective contraceptives weren't available in 1991, Albert notes. One, Depo-Provera, requires one shot every three months, he says.

Still, Albert says, citing the Hispanic teen birthrate, “there are some hints here that the impressive progress that the nation has made may be slowing down.”

Language and cultural differences may partly explain why the gap between the Hispanic teen birthrate and the overall teen birthrate is as wide as ever, he says.

To help narrow the gap in Washington, Mary's Center for Maternal and Child Care runs programs for teens and preteens, says Vanessa DeCarbo, director of advocacy and communication.

Program goals include motivating young people to consider the impact a baby would have on their families and on their economic futures, DeCarbo says.

Other record findings in the preliminary 2005 births data:

·The proportion of births to unmarried women rose to 36.8% — or more than 1.5 million babies — in 2005, up from 35.8% in 2004. “It's not a teenage issue,” Ventura notes, “which was the case 20, 30, 40 years ago.” About 40% of unmarried women who had their first baby in 2005 lived with the father. “It's not the same as marriage, but at least it suggests some stability,” Ventura says.

·The proportion of preterm babies — those born at less than 37 weeks of gestation — rose to 12.7%, up from 12.5% in 2004. The preterm birthrate has increased 20% since 1990. In addition, the percentage of low-birth-weight babies rose 8.2% — the highest level since 1968 — up from 8.1% in 2005. That rate has increased more than 20% since the mid-1980s.

·The U.S. C-section rate — up 46% since 1996 — hit an all-time high of 30.2%, an increase of 4% over 2004. “It's really going through the roof,” Ventura says. Rates were up for all age groups and all race and Hispanic-origin subgroups.

Assassination Increases Tensions With Syria, Iran (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

President Bush blasted Syria and Iran yesterday after the assassination of Christian cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel for trying to destabilize Lebanon, reflecting tensions between Washington and its two Middle Eastern rivals that are increasingly playing out in Lebanon as well as Iraq.

While the president stopped short of blaming Syria for the killing, he warned that the United States remains "fully committed" to supporting Lebanon's democracy despite attempts by Damascus, Tehran and their allies in Lebanon "to foment instability and violence." During remarks to U.S. troops in Hawaii, he also charged that the regime of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad is in violation of two U.N. resolutions for its ongoing meddling in Lebanon.

For the past 21 months, the Bush administration has tried to steer the Mediterranean country toward democracy and away from the grips of long-standing Syrian and Iranian influence. As Iraq imploded, the Bush administration hoped that Lebanon might prove an alternative model for the flowering of freedom in the Middle East.

The massive Lebanese protests during the Cedar Revolution last year -- when more than 1 million Lebanese turned out to demand Syria's withdrawal after the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri -- eventually brought down a government and forced Syria to end its 29-year occupation. Elections two months later put in place a parliament dominated by anti-Syrian forces.

But the assassination yesterday of Gemayel, who was a member of the third generation of Lebanon's most prominent Christian political family, signals that the battle for Lebanon is far from over, said U.S. officials and regional experts.

And having the United States as an ally is no protection. "The assassination highlights to what extent the United States is in a position of weakness in the region. . . . It doesn't matter what statements the U.S. makes about coups and assassinations, it still happens," Emile el-Hokayem, an expert on Lebanon at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a defense think tank, said in an interview from Beirut.

Indeed, the bullets that raked Gemayel's car also fired on U.S. policy, analysts say.

"The bullets were meant for an outspoken critic of Syria. The Cedar Revolution is seen as an extension of American power, so the assassination of Gemayel was by extension a way of striking the U.S. as well," said Augustus Richard Norton, a former U.N. peacekeeper in Lebanon and now a professor at Boston University.

DOJ_NMG_0097406

Added Lebanese columnist Rami Khouri, currently on a speaking tour in the United States: "This is the new Cold War."

U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said Gemayel's assassination brought new attention to the danger that Syria and Iran are attempting, through Lebanese allies such as Hezbollah, to conduct a coup d'etat against the pro-Western government led by Prime Minister Fouad Siniora.

Over the past week, Hezbollah has threatened to hold large protests to demand more cabinet seats for a bloc that also includes the followers of Christian Michel Aoun.

In an interview with MSNBC, Bolton came the closest of any administration official to blaming Damascus. "One pattern we discern in these political assassinations of Lebanese leaders -- journalists, members of parliament -- they are all anti-Syrian. So I suppose one can draw conclusions from that," he said.

Bashar Jaafari, Syria's U.N. ambassador, denied that his government had a hand in Gemayel's killing. "Syria has nothing to do with this," he said, adding that Damascus condemned the assassination as a "horrible" crime.

In an emergency session yesterday, the U.N. Security Council condemned Gemayel's assassination, expressing "grave concern" that it could undermine Lebanon's effort to consolidate its fledgling democracy.

The council also formally approved plans to create an international tribunal to seek justice for the assassinations of Hariri and other prominent political targets. Most of the killings have been widely linked to Syria.

The tribunal has been a growing flash point between Syria and the international community, as well as among Lebanese. Many U.S. experts say that the recent political turmoil, including the resignation of six Shiite cabinet ministers in an attempt to bring down the government, appears to have been orchestrated by Damascus as way to force a deal with the outside world -- possibly including the survival of the Lebanese government in exchange for dropping the idea of a tribunal that might attempt to try senior Syrian officials.

Leaders Condemn Assassination Of Lebanese Cabinet Minister (NYT)

By Brian Knowlton

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 21 — The assassination of the Lebanese cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel was widely condemned today as an act of terrorism that threatens to upend not only Lebanon's stability, but also tentative moves to engage Syria in talks on regional peace initiatives.

"It's going to complicate U.S. efforts both in Lebanon and with Israeli-Palestinian peace and in Iraq," said Hady Amr, a Brookings Institution fellow of Lebanese descent.

Britain, France, Egypt, the European Union and the United States issued powerful condemnations of the killing. King Abdullah of Jordan called it "a cowardly act that targets the security and stability of Lebanon."

Nicholas Burns, the American under secretary of state, described the killing as an act of terrorism and intimidation. "We believe it's the responsibility of all countries to support the Siniora government and to oppose those who would try to divide Lebanon or return violence to political life in Lebanon," he said, referring to Fouad Siniora, the Lebanese prime minister.

The killing was also condemned today by Syria, which is widely believed to have played a role in the February 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, and by spokesmen for Hezbollah, the pro-Syrian Shiite Muslim party and militia in Lebanon, which is pressing for more power in the government there. Hezbollah's demands, and the resignation of its cabinet members when talks over them broke down Nov. 11, have precipitated a political crisis in Beirut.

Many in Lebanon reacted with anger and frustration over the killing of Mr. Gemayel, and pointed accusing fingers at Syria. Among them is Saad Hariri, the son of Rafik Hariri, whose death sparked an enormous outpouring of anti-Syrian anger among Lebanese, dubbed the Cedar Revolution, that helped force Syria to withdraw its troops from Lebanon last year.

Mr. Hariri said the killing would make the Lebanese people more determined to embrace an international tribunal the United Nations wants to establish to investigate his father's death and conduct trials in the case.

The American ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, spoke with visible anger about the killing. Asked by a reporter whether the tribunal should now be delayed to avoid fanning instability, he said sharply: "How incredibly wrong that would be.

"Instability? They're killing people in Lebanon, they're assassinating political leaders. Not the time to seek justice?"

Mr. Bolton said he hoped the United Nations would now move quickly to set up the tribunal.

Bernard Reich, a professor of international relations at George Washington University who studies terrorism, suggested that Syria has been trying to keep its apparent involvement in Mr. Hariri's death out of the spotlight.

DOJ_NMG_0097407

"Syria clearly is trying to deflect attention from these reports, by virtue of Hezbollah actions, the link to Iraq, the connection to Iran," he said, referring of recent diplomatic moves by the regime in Damascus. "I think this just makes the entire situation far more complicated."

The killing, Mr. Reich continued, was "a bullet not just into Gemayel, but into Lebanese political stability and political cooperation."

"I see nothing good, nothing positive, in this action for any of the major issues that affect U.S. policy or Lebanon or Israel."

James Steinberg, who was a deputy national security adviser to President Bill Clinton, said that Syria was only one possible suspect in a region where politics amounts to "wheels within wheels within wheels."

"There are so many potential candidates who might have played a role," said Mr. Steinberg, who is now the dean of the school of government at the University of Texas. "If you look at it rationally, the Syrians are on a semi-roll now, so why would they do something like that? It doesn't make sense for government policy, but could it be a rogue element? Yes. Gemayel's had a lot of enemies. Could it be one of them? Could there be a Hezbollah role?"

Still, he said, the presumption of a Syrian role is likely to be so widespread that unless Damascus moves strenuously to establish its innocence, the recent push by Britain and by several prominent figures in Washington to engage Syria in talks with the United States on stabilizing Iraq could be disrupted.

What immediate impact the Gemayel assassination will have on the internal situation in Lebanon was unclear.

"I wouldn't rule out the possibility that it could re-rally the forces of moderation," Mr. Steinberg said. "They may be saying, 'The time has come to stiffen our spines again.' "

Mr. Amr, the Brookings fellow, predicted that the pro-Western Siniora government o would "dig in its heels and say, 'This is a sign that we cannot give in to terror.' "

But Mr. Amr, interviewed by telephone in Doha, Qatar, where he had just spent hours on the phone with Lebanese friends, said he was worried about the popular response.

"The real crisis is not going to be initially in the government side, but in how do the Lebanese people respond," he said. "Are we going to see mass anti-Hezbollah demonstrations and mass pro-Hezbollah demonstrations? I fear there's a potential for that.

"It's clear that Lebanon is in big trouble."

Mr. Bolton, pressed by a CNN reporter on the possibility of conflict erupting in Lebanon, responded, "Don't you think that assassination amounts to civil conflict now?"

U.S., Bush Denounce Slaying In Lebanon (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 22, 2006

President Bush denounced Tuesday's assassination of a Lebanese leader as "the vicious face of those who oppose freedom" and said that Syria and Iran are trying to undermine the democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora.

From Washington, the State Department called the murder of Lebanese Christian leader Pierre Gemayel, a foe of Syrian involvement in the country, an act of terrorism and intimidation.

Bush and other U.S. officials stopped short of specifically blaming Iran or Syria for the assassination, although the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, raised the possibility. The president called for a full investigation to identify "those people and those forces" behind it.

"We support the Saniora government and its democracy and we support the Lebanese people's desire to live in peace," Bush said after having breakfast with U.S. troops stationed here. "And we support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country."

An intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity about the evolving situation in Lebanon, said it's not yet clear who is responsible for the assassination. There is no evidence now to substantiate Syrian involvement, although the country remains a suspect. "Nothing is being ruled out," the official said.

Bush said the U.N. Security Council must move quickly to establish a special tribunal to investigate the 2005 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The Security Council is facing a deadline to approve a letter endorsing an agreement with Lebanon to create a tribunal.

"I strongly believe that the United Nations Security Council ought to act today," Bush said sternly. "For the sake of peace, the free world must reject those who undermine young democracies and murder in the name of their hateful ideology."

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters the administration was shocked by the assassination.

"We view it as an act of terrorism," he said. "We also view it as an act of intimidation."

DOJ_NMG_0097408

Burns took note of recent statements by Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah and others that he said are meant "to destabilize Lebanon and to divide the country."

Nasrallah has urged his followers to prepare for mass demonstrations to topple the U.S.-supported government headed by Saniora if it ignores Hezbollah's demands to form a national unity Cabinet. Hezbollah, an ally of Syria, gained political strength in the country as a result of the war it fought last summer against Israel.

The U.S. has accused Syria and Iran of plotting to topple Saniora's government, which is dominated by politicians opposed to Syrian influence in Lebanon.

Referring to an investigation into the assassination in 2005 of Hariri, who also tried to limit Syrian influence in the country, Bolton told reporters: "I think people can draw their own conclusions."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Saniora with condolences and to reiterate U.S. support for democracy in Lebanon, Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said.

Burns praised Saniora's 20-month old government, seeing it as a step toward returning Lebanon "to a position of real sovereignty, freeing it from Syria's influence and from "the politics of violence and assassination."

"We believe it is the responsibility of all countries to support the Saniora government," he said. "We will give full support to the Saniora government in the days and weeks ahead."

In brief remarks at the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said of the killing, "It is certainly a tragedy for Lebanon and for those in Lebanon and that part of the world that believe in peace and representative systems."

Lebanon Official Critical Of Syria Is Assassinated (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Nov. 21 — Pierre Gemayel, a Lebanese cabinet minister and strong opponent of Syrian influence in Lebanon, was gunned down in his car here on Tuesday afternoon, jolting a nation already paralyzed by political conflict that threatens to topple the government.

The killing of Mr. Gemayel, the 34-year-old scion of a prominent Maronite Christian family, inflamed tensions between the anti-Syria coalition trying to hold its government together and the Syrian-allied opposition, led by Hezbollah. An Iranian-supported Shiite group, Hezbollah has threatened street protests if it is not given more power. The demonstrations were expected Thursday — now, there will be a funeral instead.

Lebanese radio reported that shots were also fired Tuesday into the Beirut office of Michel Pharaon, a Greek Catholic member of the ruling coalition and minister for parliamentary affairs.

Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, vowed in a televised speech that his government would hold firm. "I pledge to you that your blood will not go in vain," Mr. Siniora said. "We will not let the murderers control the fate of Lebanon and the future of its children."

In truth, his government may already be on life support. Last week, six pro-Syria ministers aligned with Hezbollah resigned after a failed effort to gain greater control over the government. A seventh minister resigned earlier in an unrelated conflict. With Mr. Gemayel's death, there may now be too few ministers to pass any measures, and it appears that if the government were to lose one more minister it would automatically collapse.

The prime minister's political allies in the so-called March 14 coalition — a pro-Western group of Sunni Muslims, Druse and Christians — blamed Syria for Tuesday's killing. "We believe the hand of Syria is all over the place," Saad Hariri, the son of the assassinated former prime minister, Rafik Hariri, said shortly after Mr. Gemayel was pronounced dead.

Officials in Damascus and Syria's allies in Lebanon condemned the killing.

Mr. Gemayel, the industry minister, was the fifth anti-Syria figure to be killed since Mr. Hariri's assassination rocked Lebanon in February 2005.

The killing reverberated far beyond Lebanon. Condemnations poured in from Britain, Germany, Italy, France, the European Union, Jordan, Egypt and the United States.

President Bush suggested in a statement that the assassination was part of a plan by Syria, Iran and its allies to "foment instability and violence" in Lebanon.

The United States is heavily invested in the survival of Mr. Siniora's government, which has offered Washington a chance — however faded — to thwart the spread of Iranian influence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0097409

The killing also is likely to complicate any American effort to enlist Syria's help to stabilize Iraq. The United States withdrew its ambassador from Damascus after Mr. Hariri was assassinated nearly two years ago and suspicion fell heavily on Syria. Now the White House is under pressure domestically and abroad to engage with Syria and Iran to quell the violence in Iraq.

But the suspicion that Syria is behind the efforts to destabilize Lebanon will make it nearly impossible for Washington to send a full ambassador back to Damascus without appearing to have abandoned the Siniora government.

At the same time, any allegation of Syria's involvement is likely to antagonize Syrian officials — and make them even more reluctant to back off of a military, political and economic alliance with Iran.

For a time, after the initial occupation of Iraq and the assassination of Mr. Hariri, Syria's ruling elite felt threatened, vulnerable and isolated. Syria was humiliated when it was forced, after the Hariri killing, to withdraw its military forces from Lebanon.

But in recent days, Syria has found its strategic stature in the Middle East bolstered by the surge of violence in Iraq, and the suggestion that the United States might soon ask for its help. While it has denied any role in any of the Lebanon violence, it has not denied its desire to reinsert itself as the primary force in Lebanese affairs.

"This is a crime against Lebanon, all of Lebanon," Hassan Khalil, a pro-Syria member of Parliament and member of the Shiite Amal party, said in a television interview. "This is a crime that we condemn."

In the complex and shadowy world of Lebanon's long-warring factions, conspiracy theories can cut both ways. Syrian officials and their Lebanese allies said the only beneficiaries of Mr. Gemayel's death were anti-Syria forces. They also argued that the newly inflamed environment would make it impossible for Hezbollah to follow through anytime soon with its promised protests.

The United Nations Security Council, spurred by Mr. Gemayel's killing, on Tuesday approved a proposal by Secretary General Kofi Annan for the creation of an international tribunal to try those accused of Mr. Hariri's assassination.

The tribunal still has one major hurdle to clear before it can go to work: it must be approved by the government of Lebanon, which is deeply divided over its existence. Moreover, no one has yet been charged in Mr. Hariri's killing.

While young, Mr. Gemayel was a third-generation politician from a family that founded a far-right, nationalist party called Phalange. The party fielded the largest militia during Lebanon's civil war and sought to unite Christians against all other groups. The party today is very small, yet Mr. Gemayel stood as a potent symbol to a portion of Lebanon's Christian community that is frightened and angered by its loss of primacy in Lebanon's political arena.

"He is not powerful in himself," said Elie Fawaz, a Lebanese political analyst. "But his uncle was president, his father was president, his grandfather founded the Phalange. He's a symbol of all that history much more than he is a power on the streets. This is a great blow to Lebanese Christians in general."

The latest assassination to scar the Gemayel family — Mr. Gemayel's uncle, Bashir, was also killed — occurred in broad daylight, in a brazen attack even for a country weary of political killings. While other anti-Syria figures have been killed in the past two years, Mr. Gemayel was the first to be shot in the head and not blown up with a bomb.

Mr. Gemayel was in the passenger seat of his own silver Kia, driving through the Christian neighborhood of Jdeideh, which he represented in Parliament. At about 4 p.m., a car rammed into Mr. Gemayel's and three gunmen rushed his car, spraying it with bullets from silencer-equipped automatic weapons, Lebanese security officials said. The driver, who was not injured, drove to St. Joseph's Hospital, where Mr. Gemayel was soon declared dead.

Crowds of supporters gathered outside the hospital, weeping, waving their fists and screaming anti-Syria slogans even before the death was confirmed.

Mr. Gemayel's father, Amin, tried to calm tensions. Shocked and drawn, the former president stood in the street outside the hospital, speaking to reporters and supporters.

"I would like to ask those who love Pierre to preserve the cause," he said. "We don't want to do anything instinctively. He was serving the cause, and he died for Lebanon, for freedom and for humanity. And we should not desecrate his memory by any irresponsible acts."

While there was anger in the streets, there was also palpable anxiety. The city slowed down, as it might before a storm. Shops closed early in downtown Beirut; the army began patrolling the streets.

In a cafe in Hamra, a predominantly Muslim neighborhood in western Beirut, the manager went around to each table, quietly telling guests the news and urging them to go straight home and stay off the streets in case there were demonstrations.

On the campus of the American University of Beirut, hundreds of students gathered near the main gate, discussing the news in hushed tones. Ali Hamadeh, 18, a first-year civil engineering student, voiced the fears of many students in describing his anxieties about the future.

"We think it may lead to another civil war," Mr. Hamadeh said. "It's a disaster for Lebanon, on the level of the Hariri assassination. The people will go to the streets — and at the very least the government will change."

Latest Political Killing In Lebanon Stirs Fears Of Wider Power Struggle (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon -- The assassination of a prominent Christian cabinet minister inflamed a political crisis in Lebanon, threatening to further destabilize a country buffeted by Washington's struggle for regional influence with Syria and Iran.

The murder of Industry Minister Pierre Gemayel -- who was killed by gunmen who rammed his car and then shot him through its window -- sharpens the divisions between factions backed by Washington and those supporting Hezbollah, the armed militia and Shiite Islamist social movement that fought a war this summer with Israel. Iran and Syria both support Hezbollah -- which, buoyed by what it terms a "victory from God" over Israel, has been gearing up in recent days for big protests to press demands for a new government.

The killing also complicates the policy debate about Iraq in Washington, where some foreign-policy experts have urged the Bush administration to reach out to Syria and Iran in an effort to curb Iraq's violence. Mr. Gemayel was an outspoken critic of Syria, and his allies immediately blamed his murder on Damascus.

While groping for an alternative strategy for Iraq, Washington is also wrestling with a wider issue roiling the entire Middle East: the rise of Shiite Islam. Iran and Hezbollah, the Lebanese militia it helped set up in the 1980s, are predominantly Shiite. Syria's regime, though largely secular, is dominated by members of the Alawite sect, an offshoot of Shiite Islam.

Since spring, say U.S. officials, Washington has been trying to bolster ties with Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Sunni Arab allies in the Middle East. These efforts range from developing joint maritime patrols to a regional missile-defense shield for these countries. Washington has also given strong backing to Lebanon's government, in which Sunnis and Christians hold most senior posts.

Yesterday's murder in Beirut jeopardized the stability of this government and stirred fears that Syria is seeking to sow chaos. "Their aim is to kill every free person," said parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri, who interrupted a presentation to announce news of Mr. Gemayel's murder. The audience shouted in anger. He later told CNN that "the hand of Syria is all over the place." 1

Mr. Hariri's father, Rafik Hariri, was murdered in a bomb attack early last year that a United Nations investigation has linked to Syrian officials. Syria denied involvement in the Hariri killing and yesterday's as well. Along with Hezbollah, it condemned the assassinations.

Washington stopped short of directly blaming Syria for the 34-year-old Mr. Gemayel's killing but said it underscored the need to accelerate the U.N. probe into the Hariri murder. President Bush condemned what he called "Syria's refusal to cease and desist from its continuing efforts to destabilize Lebanon's democratically elected government," adding that the U.S. would "resist these efforts." The U.N. Security Council issued a statement expressing grave concern at the possible impact of Mr. Gemayel's assassination on efforts "to solidify democracy" in Lebanon and condemning "any attempt to destabilize Lebanon through political assassination or other terrorist acts."

U.S. officials said a U.N. tribunal being set up to judge Mr. Hariri's killers should also investigate yesterday's slaying. The U.N. Security Council condemned the murder yesterday and also approved an agreement with the Beirut government that formally establishes the guidelines governing the Hariri tribunal. U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton bristled at suggestions by some at the U.N. that the Hariri probe should be slowed to reduce the risk of further instability in Lebanon. "They're assassinating political leaders. [It's] not the time to seek justice?" Mr. Bolton said after a meeting at the U.N. "There may be those on the Security Council who say it. Let them step forward and say it."

The flurry of accusations against Syria comes as Damascus has been trying to expand its role as a regional player. Its foreign minister visited Baghdad this week to re-establish diplomatic relations with Iraq after a break of more than two decades, and its regime has worked closely with Iran in recent years.

Pressure meanwhile has mounted on the Bush administration to engage Syria and Iran in an effort to stanch the sectarian violence consuming Iraq. Robert Gates, the recently nominated U.S. secretary of defense, has called in recent months for dialogue with Tehran. And former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton are heading a commission studying the Iraq war that is expected to recommend talking directly with Syria and Iran.

Lebanon's current round of political turmoil began earlier this month when Hezbollah and its allies withdrew from an otherwise pro-American cabinet. The move was widely seen by Hezbollah's critics as an attempt to derail the Hariri tribunal's formation. When the government approved the tribunal despite the walkout, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah told supporters to prepare for mass protests to topple a government he derided as a U.S. puppet.

The political showdown between Hezbollah and the government has shattered a brief period of national unity over the summer, when Israel's bombardment of Lebanon enraged and united most of the country's feuding groups. "This is going to be a very difficult period....People expected demonstrations, but not a return to assassinations," said Riad Tabbarah, a former Lebanese ambassador to Washington who heads a Beirut research center. "How far it will go, I don't think anyone knows."

Mr. Gemayel's murder is the fifth of a prominent public figure in Lebanon in the past two years. Several other assassination attempts have left their victims badly injured. Most victims have been opponents of Syria. Mr. Gemayel died in the hospital after gunmen opened fire on his car as he drove back from a visit to a church north of Beirut.

The murder stunned Beirut and led to small, scattered protests. The Lebanese army deployed in force on the streets of the capital, manning roadblocks and reinforcing positions around the houses of leading politicians. Beirut's mobile-telephone system, overloaded by calls, spluttered. Politicians mixed calls for calm with angry accusations.

The youngest member of the Lebanese cabinet, Mr. Gemayel wasn't a political heavyweight. But he belonged to one of Lebanon's most powerful and divisive political dynasties. His grandfather, also called Pierre, opposed French colonial rule of Lebanon but, after independence, cultivated close ties with France and other Western states, which he regarded as bulwark against the rising tide of Arab nationalism. He founded the Christian Phalange Party, and served as both a cabinet minister and National Assembly member.

The younger Mr. Gamayel's uncle, who headed a Christian militia that sided with Israel during its 1982 assault on mainly Muslim West Beirut, was murdered. His father, Amin Gemayel, is a former president who battled sectarian foes during Lebanon's civil war with help from U.S. forces sent by President Reagan. The U.S. withdrew from the conflict after a suicide-bomb attack in Beirut killed 241 Marines in 1983 -- which the U.S. blames on Hezbollah.

Today, Washington again is deeply embroiled in Lebanon's volatile political struggles -- and the wider regional rivalries that shape them. The U.S has no troops on the ground, but has boosted financial and military assistance to Lebanon's military as means to build a counterweight to Hezbollah, which Washington condemns as a terrorist organization and wants disarmed. The U.S. has also played an unusually public role in Lebanese domestic politics. Last week, the American Ambassador to Lebanon, Jeffrey D. Feltman, met with Amin Gemayel to assure him the U.S. would back Lebanon's increasingly beleaguered government.

U.S. support for the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, a former banker, has met with mockery from Hezbollah, which repeatedly reminds supporters the U.S. helped arm Israel for its attacks on Lebanon this summer and resisted calls for an early cease-fire. "It is the government of Feltman, not of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora," Mr. Nasrallah, Hezbollah's leader, announced at a rally during the weekend. He vowed protests to either bring down the government or force early elections.

Bracing for trouble, Beirut residents last night retreated to their homes, leaving streets largely deserted. "At the moment we will listen to our leader's call for calm, but it is going to be very, very difficult," said Sami Haddad, a 22-year-old student, "But I can't guarantee what will happen later. Are we expected to just stand by?"

Killing Seen As Bid By Damascus, Tehran To Hit U.S. Role In Mideast (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

The brazen assassination yesterday of Christian Cabinet minister Pierre Gemayel has pushed Lebanon's fragile democracy, heralded by the United States as a model for the region, to the brink of collapse.

Coming amid moves by Syria and Iran to improve relations with Iraq, the killing also was seen by analysts as part of a coordinated attempt to push the United States out of the Middle East.

"This is part of a broader effort on the part of Syrians and Iranians in their own isolation to prove they have leverage over events in the region and to minimize the role of the U.S. in the region," said former U.S. ambassador to Morocco, Marc Ginsberg.

Suspicion immediately focused on Syria, which stands to be deeply embarrassed by a proposed international tribunal that would investigate its suspected role in the killing of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri on Feb. 14, 2005.

The U.N. Security Council approved plans for the tribunal hours after the killing yesterday, but it must still be approved by a weakened Lebanese government.

"We can add this to the list of Syrian killings of anti-Syrians in Lebanon," said David Schenker of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. Mr. Gemayel was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years.

"There is obviously a concern that a U.N. investigation would be so thorough and comprehensive it will get to the bottom of who killed Hariri and the other murders in Lebanon, and obviously there are some people very nervous about that," Mr. Schenker said.

Syrian officials denied any involvement in the latest assassination, which rattled a Lebanese government already battered by a wave of Cabinet resignations and the threat of street demonstrations by Hezbollah.

"Syria had nothing to do with this," said Syria's U.N. Ambassador Bashar Ja'afari.

But Amal Mudallali, foreign affairs adviser to the head of Lebanon's largest parliamentary faction, said Mr. Gemayal's killing had been carefully planned.

DOJ_NMG_0097412

"The assassination is aimed at stopping the international tribunal," she said. "It is the second time they have killed a Lebanese politician when the U.N. Council was meeting on Hariri -- it is not a coincidence. ...

"This is a struggle for the future of Lebanon and it is being written today and the Lebanese people are writing it with their blood," she said.

Following the walkout of five Hezbollah and one Christian minister on Nov. 11, the death of Mr. Gemayal leaves the anti-Syrian Cabinet with just one member more than the minimum to maintain a constitutional quorum.

"In Lebanon you are getting very close to bringing this government down," said Mr. Schenker. "Only two more people out of 17 have to die."

In broader terms, analysts saw the killing as part of a concerted effort by Iran and Syria to flex their muscles just as pressure is mounting in Washington for President Bush to seek their help in stabilizing Iraq.

Syria yesterday formally established diplomatic relations with Baghdad for the first time in 20 years, while Iraqi President Jalal Talabani is expected to travel to Tehran for talks as early as this weekend. Syria may also be represented at that meeting.

"Iran is projecting its power in the region and sending a message to the U.S.," said Robert Rabil, director of graduate studies at the political science department at Florida Atlantic University.

"It is an assertion of Shi'ite politics, and the Islamists, led by Iran, are using Syria to project their power in the region. So now Iran has a say in the Arab-Israeli conflict, and in Iraq now they have a strong say."

Mr. Bush, in Honolulu on his way home from an Asian summit, stopped short of specifically blaming anyone for the assassination but pledged to defend Lebanon's democracy "against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Washington viewed the murder as "an act of terrorism. We also view it as an act of intimidation."

Hezbollah and its supporters quit Lebanon's Cabinet on Nov. 11 after their demands for a larger role in the government were rejected. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, has vowed to take the group's cause to the streets and bring down the government.

Mr. Ginsberg said it would be a fallacy to think that Sheik Nasrallah was acting for strictly domestic reasons.

"He is a pawn of Iran," Mr. Ginsberg said. "It is like watching a chess player -- Iran -- begin playing some very good matches. We had better stop playing checkers or we are going to wind up handing the Middle East over to our adversaries."

Fears Of Civil Strife Rise In Lebanon (WP)

By Anthony Shadid

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Nov. 21 -- One of Lebanon's most pronounced political crises in a generation slid into bloodshed Tuesday when assailants showered gunfire on a car carrying an anti-Syrian politician and scion of the country's most prominent Christian family, killing him and a bodyguard and pushing Lebanon a step closer to civil strife.

The assassination of Pierre Gemayel, a divisive figure in a country riven by sectarian tension, underlined the lack of red lines in the escalating struggle over Lebanon's political future that has followed this summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel. The struggle is crucial not only to the often zero-sum calculations of Lebanese politics but also to the regional ambitions of the United States, Iran, Syria and Israel.

"We will not allow assassins to control Lebanon's destiny and its people's future," Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said.

The shots along a busy street that killed Gemayel, the industry minister, reverberated across Beirut as dusk fell. In the city's Shiite Muslim south, where Gemayel was among the most reviled of Christian politicians, occasional gunfire erupted in celebration and some residents expressed satisfaction at his death. Across town, in Christian East Beirut, his supporters set fires in protest along usually busy intersections, sending smoke eddying over emptied streets. At the hospital where he was taken, scores gathered in the lobby and parking lot. Some hurriedly spoke into phones. Their eyes red, women sobbed and men wailed with grief.

"We want revenge!" a few shouted. "We want revenge!"

"I have one wish," Gemayel's father, former president Amin Gemayel, told them after nightfall, "that tonight be a night of prayer to contemplate the meaning of this martyrdom and how to protect this country. I call on all those who appreciate Pierre's martyrdom to preserve his cause and for all of us to remain in the service of Lebanon. We don't want reactions and revenge."

As he left, the crowd shouted, "Amin, don't frown! If you want soldiers, we'll don their uniforms."

Gemayel, a 34-year-old father of two and an up-and-coming politician, was killed when his car was ambushed by men from one or two cars that collided with it in the suburban neighborhood of Jdeideh. At least three gunmen opened fire with automatic weapons equipped with silencers, hitting him in the head and chest, officials said. Television footage showed the tinted driver'sside window pocked with at least eight shots and the glass on the passenger's side shattered. The silver sedan's hood was crumpled from the collision.

Doctors said Gemayel was dead when he arrived at the hospital, and his bodyguard later succumbed to his wounds.

Foreign leaders and officials across the Lebanese divide were unanimous in condemning the assassination. President Bush called for an international investigation to "identity those people and those forces behind the killing."

Gemayel's allies were quick to put his killing in the context of a series of assassinations that followed the death of former prime minister Rafiq al-Hariri in a car bombing in February 2005, a turning point in Lebanese politics that led to the departure of Syrian troops from the country. Gemayel's supporters blamed Syria for his death, as they did with Hariri's and the subsequent assassinations of three other anti-Syrian figures. Gemayel, though, was the first killed since Hariri to have an organized and fervent following.

The Syrian government, in a statement carried by its news agency, denied any role in Gemayel's death, as it has in the previous killings.

Lebanon has been locked in a cold war of sorts since Hariri's assassination and the protests that ensued over Syria's 29-year presence here. The largest demonstration, which took place in Beirut's Martyrs' Square on March 14, 2005, was organized by a coalition of Sunni Muslim, Druze and Christian politicians who would take control of the government in parliamentary elections. The event built momentum for the Syrian withdrawal.

Six days earlier, though, a pro-Syrian protest was convened by Hezbollah, the Shiite Muslim movement that fought Israel this July and August and remains the most powerful ally here of Iran and Syria. Since then, Lebanon has been symbolized by those two protests -- divided by sect, outlook, ideology and foreign policy.

The simmering struggle flared this month when Hezbollah and its Christian ally, Michel Aoun, demanded greater representation in the cabinet. Four rounds of talks failed, and two Hezbollah ministers, three other Shiites and an allied politician resigned on Nov. 11, depriving the cabinet of its Shiite representation and the symbolic sectarian consensus on which Lebanese politics depends.

Two days later, the depleted cabinet endorsed a U.N. proposal for an international tribunal to try suspects in Hariri's death, a step Syria has adamantly resisted. This weekend, in another escalation, Hezbollah leader Hasan Nasrallah insisted that the government resign or hold early parliamentary elections. Otherwise, he said, his followers would conduct days, even weeks of protests to bring the government down.

Gemayel's killing was sure to recalculate the arithmetic of the crisis. Some speculated that, given the tension the killing has unleashed, Hezbollah might pause in its threats to begin protests as early as this week. Nasrallah has called sectarian strife unacceptable, and in a statement Tuesday night, Hezbollah warned of repercussions over the killing.

"There is no doubt that those who carried out this crime want to push Lebanon into chaos, loss and civil war," it said.

Since Nasrallah pressed his demand for a greater share of power in late October, Lebanese have been faced with what amounts to a long wait: sensing that something might happen, but not sure what or when. Last week, a hard-line Christian leader, Samir Geagea, predicted that assassinations might be ahead. Others warned that killing three ministers would deprive the cabinet of one-third of its members and, by law, force it to resign, as Hezbollah has demanded. Partisan television stations have railed at one another, streets are awash with politically loaded posters and emigration is the stuff of everyday conversation.

But the turn to violence Tuesday seemed to scare leaders as much as it angered them. Walid Jumblatt, a Druze leader and one of Hezbollah's most outspoken foes, showed up at St. Joseph's Hospital, where Gemayel's body was taken. He spoke briefly to Gemayel's father, who served as president from 1982 to 1988, then turned to the crowd. "Beware," he said. "Let's not give the opportunity to the killers to lead us to civil strife."

Lebanese television broadcast statement after statement appealing for calm from officials in both camps. Aoun, whose alliance with Hezbollah has deeply split the Christian community, appealed for restraint.

"We call on all blocs to practice wisdom and to not fall into what the perpetrators seek," he said.

Gemayel, a rising star in the right-wing Phalangist Party founded by his grandfather and namesake, was expected to carry the mantle of a family that ascended from humble beginnings to become one of the country's most prominent Christian clans. During Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war, the party fielded the largest Christian militia and was allied with Israel. His uncle, Bashir Gemayel, was elected president in 1982 but was assassinated days before he was to take office in an explosion many blamed on Syria.

Pierre Gemayel was elected to parliament in 2000 and again in 2005, emerging as a pivotal player in the anti-Syrian coalition and winning a reputation as one of the most hard-line of Christian leaders. He was a vocal critic of Hezbollah and its ally, pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud. Even today, many Shiites recall an interview Gemayel gave to a Christian-owned television station in spring 2005 in which he was dismissive of the Shiites' standing as Lebanon's largest group.

"They threaten with quantity of people," he said. "We have the quality."

DOJ_NMG_0097414

As during the protests in March 2005, Beirut on Tuesday was of two minds over Gemayel's assassination.

At the hospital, his supporters desperately called on cellphones before word of his death was announced.

"Did you see the body?" one onlooker asked. Another approached an ally of Gemayel's and member of parliament, Elias Atallah, and asked, "Is he dead?" Atallah didn't answer.

News quickly spread, unleashing grief. "Only two days ago I was hugging you," one man cried as he beat the wall. A woman standing outside shouted: "There's nothing left to live for. All that remains are Syrian dogs." Every once in a while, others chanted, "All of us are Pierre Gemayel."

Sentiments soon turned to anger, as the crowd shouted obscenities about Aoun and Nasrallah. Others, huddled in knots, talked about marching on Aoun's headquarters, the presidential palace in Baabda or Nasrallah's stronghold in south Beirut.

Supporters lit fires outside the Phalangist Party headquarters near downtown Beirut and at a nearby intersection. Other fires were lit in trash dumpsters along a street that trailed from Sassin Square, where a monument stands to Gemayel's uncle.

"This is the fire in our hearts," said 50-year-old Yusuf Badawi, as he watched five tires burn.

Down the street, Michel Sangari, a 19-year-old draped in the flag of the Phalangist Party, was bleaker. "A war's going to happen," he said. "Our brothers are prostitutes."

Across town in Haret Hreik, a predominantly Shiite neighborhood, sporadic bursts of gunfire pierced the sky, a traditional show of celebration. They upset Anwar Macki, a 45-year-old pharmacist.

"They say, 'Who cares, let him die. There's one less of them.' " He shook his head in dismay. "If you're against him, it's okay, but you don't have to be happy about it."

He cleared the counter of stray boxes of antibiotics and prepared to close, as his son and daughter waited for him near the door. "Really, the future is obscure," he said finally. "You can't see anything."

Beirut Murder Puts Spotlight On Damascus (FT)

By Roula Khalaf , Guy Dinmore And Dan Dombey

Financial Times, November 22, 2006

Moves to bring Syria back into the diplomatic fold were dealt a blow on Tuesday by the killing in Beirut of a prominent anti-Syrian Christian government minister.

The assassination of Pierre Gemayel, the 34-year-old minister of industry who hails from one of Lebanon's most prominent Christian families, plunged a tense and divided country into deeper turmoil. Mr Gemayel was shot in his car in a Beirut suburb.

The killing drew strong condemnation from George W. Bush. Though the US president did not say who he blamed for the killing, Mr Bush said the US supported Lebanese government efforts to "defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence".

The UN Security Council "unequivocally" condemned the assassination, describing Mr Gemayel as a "symbol of the political independence of Lebanon".

Mr Gemayel's assassination was part of a cycle of killings that Lebanon's parliamentary majority, which controls the government, has blamed on Syrian agents. The assassins first struck in February 2005, killing Rafiq Hariri, the former prime minister and a fierce opponent of Syria.

Supporters of Mr Gemayel gathered on Tuesday night at the hospital in the Christian area of Beirut where his body was kept. His funeral was due to be held in Beirut on Thursday morning. Smaller groups burnt tyres at the roads into Christian districts, near what was the front line in Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war.

Saad Hariri, head of the parliamentary majority and son of the murdered former leader, immediately blamed Damascus – a charge that Syria denied.

Damascus condemned the killing as a "heinous terrorist act". Its embassy in Washington said the murder would undermine international efforts to promote engagement with Syria.

The Gemayel murder came just hours after Syria re-established diplomatic relations with Iraq. A senior US state department official suggested that Mr Gemayel had paid the price for trying to rid Lebanon of Syrian influence. The US stopped short of directly accusing Damascus.

The murder threatens to destabilise a government struggling for unity following the month-long summer conflict between Israel and the Hizbollah militant group. The Shia organisation, backed by Syria and Iran, has been seeking to capitalise on its declared victory against Israel by demanding a greater say in government. Sayyed Hassan Nasrallah, Hizbollah leader, condemned the Gemayel killing, saying the perpetrators "want to push Lebanon into chaos and a civil war".

Beirut has been bracing for street demonstrations called by Hizbollah with the announced aim of bringing down the government or forcing new elections.

Lebanon's anti-Syrian coalition has warned that ministers could be assassinated as a way of bringing down the cabinet. The government has already been undermined by the resignation of six ministers who belonged to Hizbollah and allied parties.

Western governments have been alarmed by the prospect of the collapse of the Lebanese government at a time when thousands of UN peacekeepers are deployed in the country following the ceasefire that ended the war between Hizbollah and Israel.

Anti-Syrian leaders in Beirut also accused political rivals of seeking to derail plans for a special international tribunal to bring Hariri's killers to justice. Plans for the tribunal were approved by the cabinet last week and are being finalised by the UN.

Key Lebanese Politician Assassinated (AP)

Pierre Gemayel, scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family and a leading opponent of Syria, was gunned down Tuesday in a brazen daytime hit. The assassination threatened to intensify Lebanon's power struggle between the U.S.-allied government and the Syrian-backed Hezbollah.

Gemayel, 34, was leaving church when he fell into a well-coordinated attack: One vehicle cut off his car from the front, another rammed him from behind, then gunmen burst out and sprayed a dozen bullets into his passenger-side window.

The killing sent tensions spiraling at a time when Lebanon was already facing a worsening political crisis. The Shiite Muslim guerrilla group Hezbollah and its pro-Syrian allies have threatened massive protests — as early as Thursday — aimed at bringing down Prime Minister Fuad Saniora's government unless it gives them greater power.

President Bush condemned the assassination and accused Syria and Iran of seeking to undermine Saniora's government. Bush stopped short of specifically blaming them for Gemayel's death, though the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John R. Bolton, raised the possibility.

Anti-Syrian politicians in Lebanon, however, directly pointed the finger at Damascus, and some Gemayel supporters demanded revenge against Syria's Lebanese allies.

Bands of young Christians broke car windows and burned tires and garbage cans in their areas of Beirut and the Gemayel family's mountain hometown of Bikfaya to the northeast. But Lebanese troops quickly stopped the unrest and set up checkpoints to prevent demonstrations in the coming days. A funeral was set for Thursday in downtown Beirut, with the anti-Syrian factions calling for mass participation.

Politicians from all sides scrambled to contain the fallout of the assassination, urging calm amid fears of an outbreak of the brutal violence between Lebanon's sharply divided communities that marked the 1975-90 civil war.

A stunned-looking former president Amin Gemayel — Pierre's father and leader of the Phalange Party — urged his supporters to observe a night of "prayer and reflection."

"We don't want an outburst of emotions and revenge," he said outside the hospital where his son died. "He was martyred for the cause of Lebanon, and we want this cause to triumph. ... To all those who love Pierre, we should not be driven by instinct."

Bush called the slaying "the vicious face of those who oppose freedom" and vowed support for Saniora's government.

"We support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies to foment instability and violence in that important country," Bush said after having breakfast with U.S. troops stationed in Hawaii.

Saniora's government is dominated by opponents of Syria. Many see the demands by its opponents as a bid by Damascus to restore its influence in its smaller neighbor — and by Hezbollah to boost its power, riding on increased popularity among Lebanon's Shiite Muslim population following this summer's war with Israel.

Pierre Gemayel, an outspoken opponent of Hezbollah, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years and the first member of the Saniora government to be slain. Many in Lebanon have accused Damascus in the previous assassinations, including the 2005 bomb blast that killed former prime minister Rafik Hariri, a claim Syria has denied.

Saniora went on national television to call for unity and warned that "sedition" was being planned against Lebanon. He linked Gemayel's slaying to the issue that sparked the recent crisis with Hezbollah: a plan for an international court to try suspects in the Hariri assassination. He said Lebanese should rally behind the government's backing for such a court.

"I pledge to you that your blood will not go in vain," Saniora said, eulogizing Gemayel. "We will not let the murderers control the fate of Lebanon and the future of its children."

Syria and Iran both condemned Gemayel's slaying, and Syria's Information Minister Mohsen Bilal denied Syria had any role. "Those who are accusing Syria in this sick way ... do not have an iota of truth or credibility," he said on Al-Jazeera.

DOJ_NMG_0097416

Tuesday's hit came hours before the U.N. Security Council endorsed a draft document creating the international court to try suspects in the Hariri murder, in which an U.N. investigation has implicated several Syrian officials. The document then goes to the Lebanese government for final approval.

With the possibly explosive atmosphere following Tuesday's assassination, it was not clear whether Hezbollah would go ahead with its threat to hold massive anti-government demonstrations. If it does, it would throw Lebanon deeper into turmoil, putting it into confrontation with many Gemayel supporters now itching for a fight.

Gemayel, the industry minister, was the rising star of his Maronite Christian political family, which has seen four other members killed in the past three decades of Lebanon's violence.

Past attacks on Gemayel's family have sparked brutal reprisals. A 1975 assassination attempt against his grandfather, also named Pierre, prompted Phalangists to attack a busload of Palestinian refugees in what became the spark of a 15-year sectarian civil war. After the killing of Amin Gemayel's brother, Bashir, in a 1982 explosion, his militia supporters stormed Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut, killing hundreds of unarmed civilians in one of the worst atrocities of the Lebanon conflict.

On Tuesday, Gemayel was traveling through his mainly Christian constituency of Jdeideh when a vehicle in front of his slammed to a stop, causing his car to ram into it, security officials said. Witnesses said Gemayel's car was also rammed from behind.

Three gunmen stepped out of the other vehicles and shot Gemayel at point-blank range with automatic weapons fitted with silencers, security officials said.

Video showed Gemayel's car, which apparently had been shot at from both sides: The passenger-side window was shattered and the driver's-side window was dotted with about a dozen bullet holes, and the front hood was crumpled.

Gemayel's driver and another person in the car were wounded. They were rushed to a hospital where Gemayel was pronounced dead. The driver died later Tuesday. The attackers fled.

At the hospital, some 300 supporters called for vengeance, many of them chanting slogans against Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah, pro-Syrian President Emile Lahoud and Hezbollah's Christian ally, Michel Aoun.

"We want revenge from Hezbollah and the General (Aoun)!" young men shouted, shaking their fists in the air.

Other Phalange supporters, including women, screamed and wept. They called on supporters to march to a nearby Shiite neighborhood and Aoun's residence in a Christian suburb east of Beirut.

"Nasrallah, Aoun and Lahoud, they killed him," shouted Antoine Shaaya, a man in his late 20s who wore a large cross around his neck. "And we won't be silent after today."

Lebanese Cabinet Minister Shot And Killed In Beirut (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon — A Christian Cabinet minister who had stood against Syrian meddling in Lebanon was shot dead Tuesday, stunning and infuriating a war-haunted nation already teetering on the edge of violence.

Pierre Gemayel, the 34-year-old minister of industry, was gunned down in as he drove through a crowded intersection in the predominantly Christian outskirts of the capital. Witnesses said that at 3:30 p.m. gunmen walked up to the side of the car and shot Gemayel point blank, according to local news reports.

The assassination dealt a hard blow to anti-Syrian leaders, who are struggling to maintain control of the government. To many Lebanese, it was also a symbolically loaded strike against the Christian community.

Gemayel was political heir to one of the most influential — and controversial — Christian dynasties in Lebanon; his family name was shorthand for Christian claims on Lebanon.

As condemnations poured in from Washington, Europe and even Damascus, grave-faced Lebanese leaders took to the airwaves to encourage their people to stay calm — and out of the streets.

"The hand of killers will not terrorize us. Murderers will not control the destiny of Lebanon," Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora said. "I call on all Lebanese to unite and cling together, to defend the security and safety of their nation and be careful of this conspiracy to create strife."

The assassination stirred visceral rage at a time when the menace of street fights shadows Lebanon. As word of Gemayel's death raced through the Christian neighborhoods, furious men filled the darkening streets, chanting obscene slogans against Hezbollah; setting fire to garbage bins; attacking a Syrian laborer and a Syrian taxi.

DOJ_NMG_0097417

"I hit him and I don't care. What are we waiting for?" a young man shouted hysterically in the darkened street in the Christian neighborhood of Achrifiyeh. He was defending his right to have taken part in beating up a Syrian laborer. "I hit him and anybody who defends Syria is a dog like him."

The other men quieted him down and led him away quickly.

Lebanon was already embroiled in a crisis over who should rule the country. The powerful Hezbollah and its Christian allies have been demanding a greater stake in the government, accusing the anti-Syria government of ruling unconstitutionally and hijacking the country for U.S. and European interests.

Just last week, Hezbollah and its allies quit the Cabinet and declared the remaining government illegitimate. This increasingly outspoken opposition has threatened to stage massive street protests in coming days to topple the government. Many here fear the gatherings could degenerate into brawls and further destabilize a fragile nation.

But it now seems the anti-Syria bloc could well beat Hezbollah into the streets. Late Tuesday, the coalition called upon mourners to turn out en masse for Gemayel's funeral.

Gemayel's death leaves the government dangling on a thread. According to Lebanese law, if one more minister quits, dies or is otherwise unable to work, the Cabinet will automatically lose its right to govern.

Some analysts warned that those seeking to shake the anti-Syria coalition out of power might conspire to eliminate enough ministers to force their downfall.

"This plot started with the resignation of the ministers," said Antoine Haddad, a political analyst affiliated with the anti-Syrian bloc. "It's a bloody game. It's a criminal game."

Patrick Haenni, a Beirut-based analyst with the International Crisis Group, also warned of more political violence.

"We are not far away from the quota that should cause the government to fall," he said. "The continuation of political assassinations should be considered as a possible scenario."

Gemayel's father and uncle were both presidents of Lebanon. His grandfather founded the Kataeb Party, also known as the Phalangist Party.

The family history is a dark one and assassinations of the Gemayels have proven disastrous. After his uncle Bachir was assassinated, the Phalangist militia massacred Palestinians at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps in Beirut's southern suburbs. The rampage at the Palestinian camps remains one of the most notorious massacres in Lebanon's long and bloody civil war.

But Tuesday, Lebanese leaders seemed desperate to keep the streets quiet. Amin Gemayel, his face pale and slack, made his way slowly through hordes of mourners to the hospital where his son had died. He paused to beg for calm, speaking with his head tilted and his eyes falling shut.

"I have one wish: That tonight be a night for prayer," Gemayel said. "That we think of the value of martyrdom, and think of how we can protect this country from vengeance. We don't want revenge. We want the Lebanese cause to win."

Despite the talk of Lebanese unity, both sides have been hardening their stances. Even as Gemayel's death fueled their sense of outrage, the "anti-Syria" bloc had shown little willingness to bend to the demands of Hezbollah and its allies.

Just as news of Gemayel's death was spreading through a nerve-shot capital, parliamentary majority leader Saad Hariri was sitting before reporters in his mansion — and accusing his enemies of trying to start a "war."

"They say, 'Just do what I say or I will go to the streets,' " Hariri said. "This is a war. They are trying to take us to a war."

Hariri's father, former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, was the most famous in a string of Lebanese who tangled with Damascus and were assassinated. The Syrian regime was widely blamed in all of the slayings, but it was the elder Hariri's death in a car bomb in 2005 that unleashed a decisive crush of anti-Syria sentiment.

Enormous, angry street demonstrations and international outrage forced Damascus to withdraw its soldiers and end de facto military control over Lebanon.

Saad Hariri, backed by the United States, has been pushing the United Nations to establish an international tribunal to prosecute Hariri's killers. He has also accused Hezbollah and its allies of quitting the government in an effort to block the court, which is awaiting a United Nations vote.

Anti-Syrian Minister's Slaying Stuns Lebanon (USAT)

By Andrew Mills Special For

USA Today, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT — The assassination Tuesday of an anti-Syrian Cabinet minister who was the son of a former president threatened to ignite a confrontation between rival Lebanese factions.

DOJ_NMG_0097418

Pierre Gemayel, 34, the scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family, was gunned down at point-blank range in his car near Beirut. Gemayel, industry minister in the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in Lebanon in the past two years. He was the son of former Lebanese president Amin Gemayel.

Anti-Syrian politicians, including Saad Hariri, blamed Syria for Gemayel's murder. A United Nations probe has focused on possible Syrian involvement in the 2005 bomb blast that killed Hariri's father, former prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Lebanon has been on edge since this summer, when the armed radical Shiite movement Hezbollah fought a 34-day war with Israel. The country's anti-Syrian factions — Sunni, Druze and Christian — sat out the war, as did Lebanon's army.

In recent weeks, Hezbollah has threatened to bring down the government unless its allies get a greater share of power, including enough Cabinet seats to veto key decisions.

Speaking to U.S. troops in Hawaii, President Bush reiterated his support for Saniora's 20-month-old government. “We support their efforts to defend their democracy against attempts by Syria, Iran and allies, to foment instability and violence in that important country,” he said

U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton noted that the White House had warned nearly two weeks ago that Syria and Iran, acting through Hezbollah, might attempt a coup in Lebanon. “One has to wonder whether this despicable assassination is not the first shot,” Bolton told CNN.

Six pro-Syrian ministers resigned from Saniora's Cabinet this month. With Gemayel's death, the departure of two more ministers would bring down the government.

Last month, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah threatened to call demonstrations to force the Lebanese government to resign and create a new government giving Shiites more power and Cabinet posts. Such protests could provoke unrest and a return to civil war. Various Lebanese factions fought from 1975 to 1990, and many groups including Hezbollah remain armed.

Nasrallah on Sunday reissued his call for protests. The first was scheduled for Thursday.

Kamal Salibi, a Lebanese historian, warned that street demonstrations by Hezbollah now would “make immediate war with the Christians.”

Gemayel was a member of the coalition of Sunni Muslim, Christian and Druze members that governs Lebanon. It is known as the March 14 Coalition for the day in 2005 when anti-Syrian protests prompted the withdrawal of Syrian forces after 29 years in Lebanon.

Syria's troop withdrawal followed massive protests in response to Hariri's assassination. The United Nations Security Council on Tuesday approved the creation of an international court to try suspects in Hariri's death.

Saad Hariri pinned blame for Gemayel's killing on Syria. “We believe the hands of Syria are all over the place,” he said.

Gemayel's funeral was set to be held Thursday in downtown Beirut. Anti-Syrian factions called for mass participation, which could spark protests and violence.

“What's most likely now is that the forces from March 14 will have an angry demonstration of their own, pre-empting the protests that Hezbollah was planning,” said Amal Saad-Ghorayeb of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Beirut.

Several hundred Gemayel supporters stormed through the streets of Christian East Beirut after the shooting. They overturned dumpsters, lit small fires and tore down posters of Michel Aoun, a prominent Christian allied with Hezbollah and pro-Syrian forces. Thousands of Lebanese forces deployed across the city and manned checkpoints on all major routes.

“We are ready. We need clashes,” said Roger Nehme, 19, a computer science student and Gemayel supporter.

Rob Malley, Middle East director for the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization that seeks to prevent conflicts, said the assassination of Gemayel is part of a struggle for power that crosses sectarian lines.

Shibley Telhami, a Middle East expert at the University of Maryland, questioned the accusations against Syria and Hezbollah in Gemayel's death. He noted that both benefited from Hezbollah's summer war with Israel. Telhami suggested Gemayel may have been a victim of infighting among Christian factions. “Don't rush to judgment,” he said.

Saniora appealed for calm: “Lebanon will be a master of its destiny. You have not died in vain, Pierre.”

Anti-Syrian Lebanese Christian Official Slain (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

BEIRUT -- Pierre Gemayel, an anti-Syrian politician and scion of Lebanon's most prominent Christian family, was gunned down yesterday in his mainly Christian constituency of Jdeideh, a suburb of Beirut, heightening a growing sense of crisis in the fragile democracy.

An outspoken opponent of the Syrian-allied militia Hezbollah, Mr. Gemayel, 34, was the fifth anti-Syrian figure killed in the past two years and the first member of the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora to be slain.

DOJ_NMG_0097419

The industry minister and Phalange Party member had just left a church and was traveling through Jdeideh when a vehicle in front of him slammed to a stop, causing his car to ram it, security officials said. Witnesses said Mr. Gemayel's car was also struck from behind.

Three gunmen stepped out of the vehicles and shot Mr. Gemayel at point-blank range with automatic weapons, security officials said.

Video showed Mr. Gemayel's car, which apparently had been shot at from both sides: the passenger-side window was shattered and the driver's-side window was dotted with about a dozen bullet holes, and the front hood was crumpled.

Mr. Gemayel's driver, who was wounded but survived, rushed the gravely injured politician to a nearby hospital. Soon afterward, Voice of Lebanon -- the Phalange-run radio station -- reported Mr. Gemayel was dead, the fifth member of his family to die in violence.

Damascus' opponents in Lebanon have accused Syria of being behind previous assassinations, particularly that of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, who was killed in a bombing in Beirut in February 2005. Syria has denied those claims.

A stunned Amin Gemayel, the slain lawmaker's father and Lebanon's former president, urged his supporters to observe a night of "prayer and reflection over the meaning of martyrdom."

"We don't want an outburst of emotions and revenge," he said outside St. Joseph's hospital, where his son died. "He was martyred for the cause of Lebanon and we want this cause to triumph."

Hundreds gathered at the hospital, and supporters railed against Hezbollah and Michel Aoun, a Hezbollah-allied Christian leader who is a rival of the Phalange.

Wael Abu Faour, an anti-Syrian lawmaker, told Al Jazeera: "We directly accuse the Syrian regime of assassinating Gemayel and hold [Syrian] President Bashar Assad responsible for this assassination ... aimed at sending Lebanon into a civil war."

In an interview with CNN, Saad Hariri, the slain prime minister's son and leader of the anti-Syrian parliamentary majority, implicitly blamed Damascus, saying, "We believe the hand of Syria is all over the place." He said Mr. Gemayel was "a friend, a brother to all of us" and appeared to break down after saying: "We will bring justice to all those who killed him."

Mr. Gemayel's death came hours before the U.N. Security Council voted to endorse an agreement with Lebanon to create a tribunal to prosecute suspects in Mr. Hariri's killing.

Four Lebanese generals, top pro-Syrian security chiefs, have been under arrest for 14 months, accused of involvement in Mr. Hariri's slaying.

Pierre Gemayel had been expected to carry the mantle of his political family. Amin Gemayel, his father and the current Phalange leader, was Lebanon's president between 1982 and 1988. His grandfather, Pierre Gemayel, led the right-wing Christian Phalange Party that fielded the largest Christian militia and was allied with Israel during the 1975-90 civil war between Christians and Muslims.

Amin Gemayel's brother, Bashir, was elected president in 1982 but was assassinated days before taking office. Two of Amin Gemayel's nephews and Bashir's daughter were killed in the 1970s and 1980s.

The slain Pierre Gemayel was a prominent figure in Lebanon's anti-Syrian bloc, which dominates the Cabinet of Mr. Siniora and the parliament -- and which is now locked in a power struggle with the Muslim Shi'ite Hezbollah and its allies. He was elected first in 2000, then re-elected in 2005.

Assassins And Diplomacy (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

Former Secretary of State James Baker has been saying that, when it comes to diplomacy, you don't "restrict your conversations to your friends" -- shorthand for the view that the U.S. should engage Syria and Iran to find solutions in Iraq and elsewhere in the Middle East. But yesterday's murder of Lebanese Minister Pierre Gemayel might remind even Mr. Baker and his Iraq Study Group what some of those non-friends are all about.

"The hand of Syria is all over" Gemayel's assassination, said Saad Hariri, the leader of the parliamentary bloc that helped evict the Syrian army in the spring of 2005. Mr. Hariri knows whereof he speaks: His father, former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, was blown up with 22 others in February 2005, and the preliminary U.N. investigation offered a trail of evidence pointing to Damascus as the culprit.

A who's who of anti-Syrian Lebanese politicians and journalists have also since been targeted for assassination. In June 2005 journalist Samir Kassir was blown up by a car bomb. Three weeks later, politician George Hawi was killed the same way. The following month, Defense Minister Elias Murr narrowly survived a car bombing; Mr. Murr was considered pro-Syrian but claimed he had been threatened by Rustom Ghazali, the longtime chief of Syrian intelligence in Lebanon.

In September 2005, TV anchorwoman May Chidiac lost her left leg and arm in a car-bombing. Three months later, Gibran Tueni, a former publisher and editor of the An-Nahar newspaper, was also killed by a car bomb. He had been calling publicly for Syria's withdrawal from Lebanon for nearly six years and had recently been elected to parliament. Tueni's murder coincided with the release of the interim U.N. report on Hariri's murder.

Curiously, Gemayel was killed just as the U.N. agreed on the composition of an international tribunal to try the case. It is no secret that Syrian President Bashar Assad has been pulling out all the stops to quash the trial. Six pro-Syrian politicians in the Lebanese cabinet recently resigned en masse in an attempt to cripple the government, and Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah has been threatening huge demonstrations to bring down the anti-Syrian Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, who is also backed by the U.S. and France. Killing Gemayel removes another obstacle to Syrian dominance in Lebanon.

Which brings us back to Mr. Baker and the rest of the U.S. foreign-policy establishment now urging a new entente with Damascus. It's true that every Administration must deal with the world as it is. But when it comes to Syria, do the sages of the Iraq Study Group really want the Bush Administration to seek the benediction of a country that stirs such mayhem in Beirut?

2 Abducted Red Cross Workers Released (AP-Y)

By Sarah El Deeb

AP, November 22, 2006

Two Italian Red Cross workers kidnapped Tuesday afternoon were released shortly after midnight, Palestinian security officials said.

Just before their release, the Red Cross said it was suspending its activities in the Gaza Strip, fearing for the safety of its workers.

The abductions — the latest in a series of kidnappings of foreigners in the chaotic territory in recent months — dealt a serious blow to aid efforts in the impoverished zone.

Iyad Nasr, a spokesman for the Red Cross's Gaza office, said the organization had ceased all field operations and would intervene only "in matters of life and death." Workers have been ordered to stay in their offices because of fears for their safety, he said.

Over the past two years, there has been a rash of kidnappings of foreign aid workers and journalists in Gaza, usually by groups or families pressing the government for money or job guarantees. In most cases, the hostages were quickly released. None have been seriously harmed.

The Red Cross facilitates movement of ambulances and emergency supplies in the violence-wracked territory. The open-ended suspension of its activities means further hardships.

The Red Cross said Claudio Moroni, 36, and Gianmarco Onorato, 63, were abducted in Deir el-Balah in central Gaza after their car was stopped by gunmen. Palestinian security officials said one of the Red Cross workers was traveling on a Canadian passport. It was not known which one.

There was no immediate word on the conditions of the released aid workers.

Prior to their release, Palestinian security officials said they searched for the two and mediation efforts were carried ouit.

In Rome, Italian Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema said he had been "constantly informed" about the developments in the kidnapping of the two.

He said in a statement he had given orders to "activate all possible channels" to obtain the release of the two men, and had taken some "personal initiatives" in that direction. He did not elaborate.

West Bank Settlements Often Use Private Palestinian Land, Study Says (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 21 -- An Israeli advocacy group has found that 39 percent of the land used by Jewish settlements in the West Bank is private Palestinian property, which the organization contends is a violation of international and Israeli law guaranteeing property rights in the occupied territories.

In a report released here Tuesday, the Settlement Watch project of Peace Now also disclosed that much of the land that Israeli officials have said would remain part of the Jewish state under any final peace agreement is private Palestinian property.

That includes some of the large settlement blocs inside the barrier that Israel is building to separate Israelis from the Palestinian population in the West Bank. The report states that 86 percent of Maale Adumim on Jerusalem's eastern edge sits on private Palestinian land. A little more than 35 percent of the settlement of Ariel, which cuts deep into the northern West Bank, is also on private property.

DOJ_NMG_0097421

Peace Now is an advocacy group that supports the creation of a Palestinian state alongside Israel and contends that Jewish settlements in the West Bank, where roughly 250,000 Israelis live, represent a major obstacle to achieving one.

Israel's government has long maintained that the settlements, developed in large part with public money, sit on untitled property known as "state land" or on property of unclear legal status. Israeli courts have ruled that unauthorized outposts erected on private Palestinian property must be razed, although those orders are rarely carried out.

The 38-page report offers what appears to be a comprehensive argument against the Israeli government's contention that it avoids building on private land, drawing on the state's own data to make the case. Israeli officials said Tuesday they are studying the findings.

The report's authors, Dror Etkes and Hagit Ofran, note that "it is difficult to assess all of the political and legal implications" of their findings. But "it is clear," they write, "that the settlement enterprise has, since its inception, ignored Israeli law and undermined not only the collective property rights of the Palestinians as a people, but also the private property rights of individual Palestinian landowners." The report states that the settlements occupy a total of 15,271 acres of private Palestinian land.

The report draws on maps and data from the Civil Administration, the military authority Israel established to govern the West Bank following the 1967 Middle East war. Its findings were reported first in Tuesday's New York Times.

The database was also used by a state commission, headed by Talia Sasson, a lawyer, that issued a critical report last year on the expansion of unauthorized Jewish outposts in the West Bank. Peace Now officials said they were leaked the information after Israeli courts delayed a hearing on their petition for the data earlier this year.

The Israeli government did not annex the West Bank after the 1967 war -- keeping the Palestinian population there from voting in the Jewish state -- and soon began sponsoring settlement construction in the territories. International law has been widely interpreted to prohibit civilian settlement or construction on land occupied during war.

As the report notes, the West Bank has been under Ottoman, British, Jordanian and Israeli control over the past century, leaving a highly complicated land registry and murky title in many cases.

The report defines private property in the West Bank as land registered by Palestinians before 1968, when Israel stopped the process, and cultivated land that Israel recognizes as private under Ottoman law. It focuses on the West Bank and does not examine property in East Jerusalem, whose annexation by Israel is not recognized internationally.

Of the land occupied by the settlements, the report found, 54 percent is so-called state land while nearly 6 percent is designated "survey land," meaning its legal status is unclear. The report notes that 1.3 percent of the settlement areas is "Jewish land."

The report says Israel most commonly seizes private land citing "military purposes." That designation leaves the land in the name of its Palestinian owners but gives control to the Israeli army for a period that can be extended indefinitely. In other cases, Palestinians are offered compensation by the Israeli government, something they usually refuse in protest.

Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said Tuesday that the government would comment on the report's methods and findings once officials have had time to review it. Olmert won election in March on a pledge to withdraw Israel from much of the West Bank, while holding on to the settlement blocs inside the wall.

"We have to read the full report to understand it," Eisin said. She added that "even if it turns out only 5 percent is private land, that is something we must take note of."

In another development, Israeli troops pushed into the Gaza Strip early Tuesday and killed two Palestinians in fighting near the village of Zeitun. One of them was identified as Ayman Daif Allah, 25, a senior commander of the governing Hamas movement's military wing. Palestinian medical workers said Saadiya Herez, 70, was also killed by gunfire.

The operation is part of Israeli military efforts to stop Palestinian rocket fire into southern Israel that has spiked in recent days. At least four rockets fell Tuesday in and around the Israeli town of Sderot, fatally wounding a factory worker. The U.N. high commissioner for human rights, Louise Arbour, was visiting Sderot at the time of the attack.

Court Says Israel Must Register Same-sex Marriages (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, November 22, 2006

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Supreme Court touched off a fresh controversy over gay rights Tuesday when it ordered the government to register same-sex marriages performed abroad.

The ruling by a seven-judge panel, though limited in scope, reignited a debate over the rights of homosexuals in Israel after ultra-Orthodox religious leaders led protests that resulted in the cancellation of a gay pride parade this month in Jerusalem.

The 6-1 decision was praised by rights advocates as a political advance for gays and lesbians, who have won previous court decisions granting them broader rights in survivor benefits and inheritance. It also was cheered by those who support legalizing civil marriages in Israel, where only religious ceremonies are allowed.

DOJ_NMG_0097422

"I am glad we won and got what we wanted to achieve in this petition, which was the basic right to be registered as married by the Israeli Ministry of Interior, just as any couple marrying abroad does and takes it for granted," Joseph Bar Lev, a 39-year-old dance instructor who was one of the petitioners, told Israel Radio.

"At the same time, this is still the beginning of the road, because the real aspiration is that civil marriage will be possible in Israel too."

The ruling did not legalize same-sex weddings in Israel, where religious authorities by law hold a monopoly on authorizing marriages and divorces.

"We hope that one day any couple who wants to marry in Israel, whether homosexual or heterosexual, will be able to do it," said Yoav Loeff, spokesman for the Assn. for Civil Rights in Israel, which represented two of the five gay couples in the case.

The male couples had wed in Canada, but when they returned to Israel, the Interior Ministry refused to change their marital status from single to married.

The ministry said same-sex marriages were not legally valid in Israel and could not be listed in the government's registry. In its ruling Tuesday, the court ordered the government to register same-sex marriages that are legal abroad.

Activists said that being registered as married could help gay spouses assert the right to decide about medical care for their partners and make it easier for a spouse to gain Israeli citizenship.

Religious conservatives criticized the decision as an erosion of Israel's status as a Jewish state and said it undermined moral teachings.

Some conservatives urged the Israeli parliament, or Knesset, to examine the possible effect on Israeli society.

"This ruling is nothing short of idolatry," Zevulun Orlev, a Knesset member from the National Religious Party, said on Israel's Channel 10 television. "Only 10 days ago we read the weekly Torah portion about Sodom and Gomorrah. How exactly does this ruling reconcile with Israel being a Jewish state? What culture considers people of the same sex to be a family? Not the Jewish one."

Ultra-Orthodox Jewish religious leaders, joined by some Muslim and Christian clerics, protested the gay pride parade as an affront to Jerusalem's sacred standing. For days, protesters rioted, set fires in the streets and vowed to block the gathering.

In the end, parade organizers agreed to hold their rally in a stadium after police expressed concern about their ability to protect marchers. The event proceeded peacefully with a large police presence.

Secular Israelis have long complained about the broad authority wielded by the country's leading Orthodox rabbis. Many couples travel overseas to marry in civil ceremonies, a practice that has spawned a matrimonial cottage industry in the nearby island nation of Cyprus.

The issue of civil marriage is important among emigres from the former Soviet Union, many of whom are not Jewish or can't prove their heritage to the satisfaction of rabbinical authorities in Israel. Several candidates in national elections last spring promised Russian voters that they would try to make it easier for them to marry in Israel, though no reforms have been passed.

The lawyers in the same-sex marriage case cited as a precedent a Supreme Court decision from the 1960s that ordered the government to register civil marriages performed abroad, Loeff said.

Religious liberals said the ruling could help them cut into the clout held by rabbinical leaders in matters of marriage and divorce, as well as in conversions to Judaism.

Members of conservative and reform strains of Judaism have sought for years to have non-Orthodox conversions recognized by Israel's top rabbis.

Although the groups have made inroads in getting official recognition for non-Orthodox conversions done abroad, they are awaiting a court ruling on similar recognition for conversions carried out in Israel.

"The Supreme Court of Israel is the grand hope all liberal Jews have" to check the power of the Orthodox leaders, said Anat Hoffman, a former member of the Jerusalem City Council who directs the Israel Religious Action Center, which advocates religious pluralism in Israel.

Hoffman campaigned in support of the gay pride parade, and said she was appalled by the tone of the protests by religious leaders from all three major faiths.

She said the court's ruling simply recognized the legality of same-sex marriages granted by countries that allowed them.

"If the Canadians recognize these people as a family," Hoffman said, "we can't turn around and say that Israel, as a member of the family of nations, does not."

U.S. Seeks Greater Access To India In Farm Trade (WSJ)

By Sameer Mohindru

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097423

NEW DELHI -- The U.S. is seeking greater market access in India for its agricultural commodities, such as wheat, to ensure balanced farm trade between the two countries, U.S. Agriculture Department Secretary Mike Johanns said.

"We are working on a number of issues...both tariff and nontariff...on commodities such as wheat, edible oils, dairy products...and pet food," Mr. Johanns said in an interview. "There is a trade imbalance in favor of India: It sells more to us.

"We would love to sell wheat to India," he said. India's federal government has imported 5.5 million metric tons of wheat in 2006 amid a decline in local output and granary stocks.

Mr. Johanns said the U.S. hasn't been successful in selling wheat to India despite being a large exporter world-wide, because of stringent sanitary and plant-health norms in India. He favored an approach where India's plant-health norms are protected and wheat trade occurs with the U.S.

He added that discussions on plant-health-related issues are going on so that India will be able to export its mangoes to the U.S. by the next harvest in April.

"We need to be flexible and examine the possibility of how to fit together [issues relating to domestic support, subsidies and market access] to achieve the promises of the Doha round" of global trade talks, he said.

A list of special and sensitive products -- in which countries will be allowed tariff protection -- needs appropriate treatment so that it doesn't slip into an endless list of items, he said. A long list of special or sensitive products can nullify reductions in tariffs of some of the items.

India And China Work On Building Trust (NYT)

By Saritha Rai

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

BANGALORE, India, Nov. 21 — India and China established a 10-point strategy on Tuesday to strengthen economic relations and ease mistrust, agreeing that there is room enough for both to grow.

President Hu Jintao of China was at the start of a four-day visit to India, only the second by a Chinese president. As he and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India came face to face on Tuesday, there was evidence that they were trying to define the Asian version of globalization.

At a joint media briefing with Mr. Hu on Tuesday, Mr. Singh said there was enough space for the two countries, which account for a third of the world's population, to grow in a mutually beneficial manner "while remaining sensitive to each other's concerns and aspirations, as befits good neighbors and partners."

The two countries said they would work to double their trade to $40 billion by 2010, which some see as a sign that centuries of Western dominance in global trade may be ending.

The countries also signed 13 pacts covering joint scientific initiatives, tourism promotion and the opening of new consulates.

Despite the symbolism that is typical of such visits, however, there were no breakthroughs at the leadership level on the first day of talks.

As India and China try to broaden their trade with each other and expand their influence in Asia, there is growing anxiety in India that allowing the entry of China's often subsidized manufacturers could send its own industries into oblivion.

As a prelude to Mr. Hu's visit, Sun Yuxi, China's ambassador to India, appealed to India not to discriminate against Chinese companies.

The ambassador said he understood that every country had security concerns, but added, "If you allow other foreign companies in the area, Chinese companies should be treated equally because we are friends and partners."

China wants its companies to be allowed to invest in sectors like ports and telecommunications, which India considers sensitive and regulates tightly.

As a signal that all is not "Hindi Chini Bhai Bhai," an old slogan that translates as "Indians and Chinese are brothers," even routine business relations have been challenging.

For instance, the Chinese telecommunications company Huawei Technologies said its Chinese employees were not being allowed to work at its Indian unit because the government was reluctant to grant visas.

"For the last nine months, no employment visa has been granted," said Gilbert Millicent Nathan, a spokesman for Huawei Technologies India. Mr. Nathan said employment visa applications were pending without explanation.

Huawei currently has 50 Chinese working at its Indian unit, half of them on employment visas and the rest on business visas.

Its marketing subsidiary for telecommunications equipment, Huawei Telecommunications India, based in the northern city of Gurgaon, is facing restrictions imposed by the Indian government on Chinese companies that sell equipment in sectors deemed sensitive.

DOJ_NMG_0097424

This year, India rejected proposals from Hutchison Port Holdings, based in Hong Kong, to build container ports in India.

Political antagonism between India and China dates to 1962, when China soundly defeated India in a brief war that began as a border dispute. It has not been eased since then by India's growing relations with the United States and China's continued closeness with Pakistan. In fact, Mr. Hu is scheduled to head to Pakistan directly after his visit to India.

Clyde V. Prestowitz, an Asia specialist, said he did not expect a partnership to come out of the Hu visit, but perhaps "less hostility, suspicion and confrontation." Mr. Prestowitz, a trade adviser to the Reagan administration, is president of the Economic Strategy Institute in Washington.

"India, China and the rest of Asia will eventually wrest dominance of world trade away from the West," he said, "though not tomorrow."

Vietnam Signs Deals With Cnooc And PetroChina (WSJ)

By David Winning

Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

BEIJING -- China National Offshore Oil Corp. and PetroChina Co. have signed deals to ramp up investment in Vietnam as leaders in Beijing and Hanoi set aside a long-running maritime border dispute to forge closer energy ties, state media reported yesterday.

Cnooc signed an agreement with Vietnam Oil & Gas Corp., or PetroVietnam, on Friday to begin exploring for oil in the Gulf of Tonkin in the South China Sea on a 50-50 basis. The exploration period is expected to last three to five years, China Oil News said on its Web site, without specifying when the project would begin or the size of the investment involved.

Expectations of oil and gas finds are high, because the area is ringed by proven natural-gas finds, including Vietnam's Nam Con Son gas project to the west, and oil-rich areas being pumped by Malaysia and Brunei to the south.

Steven Knell of London consultancy Global Insight said the joint venture had been in the cards since August, when China and Vietnam issued a joint communique paving the way for a resolution of the dispute over the maritime border, notably around the Spratly Islands. Military clashes between the two countries took place in 1988 and 1992 over the maritime border.

"A final settlement on the matter of the boundary is expected in 2008, but that will not stand in the way of exploration-and-production work in the meantime," Mr. Knell said.

Separately, PetroChina signed a $432 million deal to become the contractor for a fertilizer plant in Vietnam, representing the largest individual project in terms of investment by a Chinese company in the country, according to China Oil News. This project will produce 320,000 metric tons of synthetic ammonia and 560,000 tons of urea annually as well as involve the construction of a 36 megawatt power station. It is expected to begin operation in about 3½ years.

The deals were concluded during Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Vietnam last week for the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

China Buildup Seen Aimed At U.S. Ships (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

China's military buildup includes new missiles and naval weapons designed to sink U.S. aircraft carriers and deny U.S. forces access to the Asia-Pacific region, a congressional commission official said yesterday.

Daniel Blumenthal, a former Pentagon defense policy-maker and now a member of the U.S.-China Economic Security Review Commission, said China's military is building up forces to "deny the United States the use of the commons -- the sea, the air, cyber and space."

"The Chinese have been quite successful ... in the area of sea denial, meaning that if we sent a carrier to or outside the [Taiwan] Strait as we did in 1996, it would be a lot riskier and a lot costlier to the United States," Mr. Blumenthal said at a conference held at the Heritage Foundation.

The comments followed disclosure last week that a Chinese submarine sailed undetected to within five miles of the aircraft carrier USS Kitty Hawk near Okinawa, Japan, and surfaced close enough to fire wake-homing torpedos or anti-ship cruise missiles, according to U.S. defense officials.

The Navy said in response to the surprise encounter that it is reviewing anti-submarine warfare defenses for the carrier battle group. The carrier was engaged in exercises when the Song-class submarine surfaced Oct. 26.

China's government denied that the submarine encounter took place, but Adm. Gary Roughead, commander of the Navy's Pacific Fleet, said Friday in Beijing that Chinese military leaders he met told him the submarine was in international waters when it was near the carrier.

DOJ_NMG_0097425

Mr. Blumenthal, commenting on the release of the China commission's latest annual report, said Chinese weapons include 10 different types of ballistic and cruise missiles and up to 800 missiles aimed at Taiwan, five different types of submarines and 15 types of new warships.

"This is a very concerted and sophisticated, diversified effort to build up a military whose goal is the United States and its ability to meet its own commitments and interests," he said.

Beijing's military also is experimenting with new attack concepts, including land-based attacks on ships "through multiple entry concepts" in what Mr. Blumenthal called "a very serious effort to try to basically sink a carrier or battle group."

The commission report, while mainly focused on economic issues, included a chapter on China's military that said China's military buildup is closing a gap with U.S. forces. The trend shows "a window of vulnerability for the United States between 2008 and 2015" before newer U.S. weapons are fielded, the report continued.

The report revealed that China's new DF-21C ballistic missile is being configured with a guidance system that will allow it to attack ships at sea and defeat shipborne missile defenses. The "development efforts are being pursued vigorously," it stated.

The report stated that China's warships and submarines could delay the arrival of U.S. Navy forces called on to defend Taiwan, but they lack integrated command and control needed for "effective joint targeting of a carrier battle group."

In China, Growth At Whose Cost? (WSJ)

By Andrew Batson And Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

BEIJING -- China's economic miracle has lifted hundreds of millions of people out of poverty, but the country is showing signs that its poorest citizens are falling further behind.

The success of China's transformation into a manufacturing powerhouse has allowed Beijing to dismiss criticism of the downside of Chinese-style economic reform: a dismal environmental record, a repressive political climate and the breakdown of the country's health-care system.

As long as the country's newfound wealth eventually trickled down to everyone, the reasoning went, the benefits outweighed the problems.

But now, as the Chinese government worries about social stability and amid questions about the social costs of China's rapid growth, new figures suggest the poorest of the country's 1.3 billion people are getting even poorer.

From 2001 to 2003, as China's economy expanded nearly 10% a year, average income for the poorest 10% of the country's households fell 2.5%, according to an analysis by the World Bank that has been presented to the Chinese government. Those roughly 130 million Chinese earn $1 a day or less, the World Bank's global benchmark for poverty.

Meanwhile, the nation's total income rose sharply, and other income groups saw gains, suggesting that the rich are getting richer at the expense of the poorest.

The reason for the income decline at the bottom isn't clear. The World Bank hasn't completed its analysis and its conclusions haven't been published. Even so, the data call into question an economic model that economists have held up as an example for other developing nations.

"This finding is very important. If true, it sheds doubt on the argument that a rising tide lifts all boats," said Bert Hofman, the World Bank's chief economist in China.

China's roughly 10% annual growth in the years since it has opened up to foreign trade and investment, dismantled or privatized state-run companies and encouraged entrepreneurship has made it the world's fourth-largest economy. Those gains have helped to persuade development experts that growth is the surest cure for poverty.

But the widening of China's income gap raises questions about the bargain its government made three decades ago when it agreed to accept a measure of social inequality as long as it improved the nation's welfare overall.

Many observers place part of the blame on the way China dismantled its social-welfare system as it phased out state control of the economy -- without building up much to replace it. Health care has become a point of particular concern, as costs shoot up without any widespread system of medical insurance to cover them. Patients who can't pay often-large sums in cash are frequently refused treatment at Chinese hospitals.

"Before the reform period, China's system of social security was already fragile. Now, after the reforms, it has almost entirely disappeared," said Li Zhining, a retired scholar in Beijing. That gives the government few tools to address the income gap, he said. "I think that the disparity between rich and poor in China will be impossible to resolve in a short time."

The World Bank's Mr. Hofman says the bank's analysis shows the majority of China's poorest 10% appear to be only temporarily poor, thrown down by some setback like sudden illness, the loss of a job or the confiscation of land. That suggests that a basic social safety net, like medical insurance or unemployment benefits, could help move them back out of poverty. Only about 20% to 30% of the poorest appear to be long-term poor, and even they have some savings.

DOJ_NMG_0097426

It isn't clear what impact the World Bank data might have on Chinese policy. The World Bank and others are already recommending that China spend more on pensions, health care and other welfare programs.

Still, for the ruling Communist Party, which has staked its legitimacy almost entirely on its ability to make people richer, evidence that incomes are falling could be devastating. During its reform era, China has pulled off one of the greatest economic feats in history, bringing some 400 million people out of poverty in 25 years.

That era dates back to 1978, when former Chinese leader Deng Xiaoping abandoned the egalitarian principles of his Communist predecessors and inaugurated the world's biggest experiment in trickle-down economics. He famously declared that for China to rise out of poverty, some people would be allowed to get rich before others.

Mr. Deng's formula did work: While the manufacturing hubs on the country's south and east coasts got rich first, and are now much better off than the rest of China, average incomes nationwide have risen by about 7% a year since 1978, according to official figures.

In recent years, however, incomes in urban areas have outstripped those in the rest of the country, with city dwellers recording average annual gains of 8% to 9%, compared with less than 5% for rural households. Now, if a large segment of Chinese society has ceased to benefit from economic reforms, it weakens the rationale for continuing down that path.

Other, published figures have also shown that income inequality is rising in China. Its Gini coefficient, a widely used measure of income distribution that starts from zero at perfect equality and tops out at one, last year hit 0.4, up from 0.3 in 1981, according to the Asian Development Bank. That puts socialist China at a level of inequality similar to that of the unabashedly capitalist U.S.

The gap between the highest and lowest incomes is expanding whether one looks at rural and urban residents, inland and coastal cities, or even just high- and low-paying jobs, according to the ADB's analysis of Chinese data.

The rise in inequality has fueled a growing debate among China's intellectuals and politicians about whether the country has swung too far toward capitalism and is leaving behind the Communist Party's core constituency of workers and peasants.

Recognizing that corruption and inequality threaten its authority, China's central leadership has made addressing those issues its top priority. President Hu Jintao's signature slogan is the drive for a "harmonious society" -- one that would bridge the widening income gaps and ease the strains that are causing social unrest.

The World Bank's Mr. Hofman emphasized that the bank's findings, which are based on data collected through a massive household survey by China's National Bureau of Statistics, aren't definitive. For one thing, the survey compares snapshots of the lowest tier of Chinese society at two different points, rather than tracking the same of group of households over time. So, it doesn't necessarily mean that the people who were in the poorest 10% of society in 2001 were all 2.5% worse off in 2003.

Moreover, the World Bank started its analysis in 2005, and so didn't have access to complete figures from that year or 2004. More recent data could help determine whether the decline has continued or was just an isolated phenomenon.

Serving The Nation In Sunny South America (WP)

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

Feeling that blast of winter these past few days? Want a quick trip to sunny climes courtesy of the taxpayers? Then hurry, hurry, hurry. There may still be some seats on an excellent codel to South America right after Thanksgiving. There's chatter that even Rio, where highs are expected to be in the 80s, might be one stop.

Outgoing House Agriculture Committee Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) is leading a group of about 10 committee members, plus spouses, military aides and assorted staff -- perhaps up to 40 folks in all -- on this fine journey with stops in several countries down there.

"The delegation will be meeting with various business and government officials in the region," committee spokeswoman Alise Kowalski tells us, "to discuss agricultural trade -- specifically focusing on expanding U.S. agricultural exports."

We asked for an updated itinerary and passenger list, but she told us that, "for security reasons," the committee did not release such information before the trip. (It was not readily apparent how knowing who was onboard would affect security issues, but never mind.)

Depending on the type of military jet being used, move quickly if you want to go. An early list showed that Goodlatte; incoming Chairman Collin Peterson (D-Minn.); Republican Reps. Frank Lucas (Okla.) and Jerry Moran (Kan.); and Democratic Reps. Bob Etheridge (N.C.), Tim Holden (Pa.), Rick Larsen (Wash.), Leonard Boswell (Iowa), David Scott (Ga.) and Stephanie Herseth (S.D.) had made tentative bookings, but these things are fluid. There's always someone dropping off or hopping on, so get moving.

Note to new members of Congress who become codel-eligible next year: You might ask yourselves, "Why would I want to wander for maybe 10 days going from one boring meeting to another on trade issues?" Well, first, it could be theoretically of importance to your farm constituents.

More important, between meetings, there'll surely be ample time to squeeze in trips to top agricultural sites. For example, during a five-day trip in 2003, a Goodlatte delegation found time to stop at Iguazu Falls, not heretofore known as a major farming site, and trek to the major ecotourist and rain-forest area around Manaus.If No One Publishes a Watchdog's Letters . . .

Just when it seemed Dorrance Smith, assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, had tired in his fight for truth, justice and the American way -- that is, having his "rapid-response team" scour the daily press and demand that perceived mistakes be corrected -- Monday's Pentagon Early Bird features three letters to news organizations demanding corrections.

One went to the Chicago Tribune to take issue with a columnist; another to U.S. News and World Report about what Smith said was a "fairly egregious error" that "requires a correction"; and a third, by press aide Bryan Whitman, notes that USA Today "mischaracterizes" an Army general's comments.

The news outlets did not publish the letters. Undaunted by rejection, Smith self-publishes his views at the top of the Bird, a compilation of news clips distributed throughout the military.

Going South Populism Loses Appeal For Voters In Latin America (WSJ)

By John Lyons

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

QUITO, Ecuador -- The populist political tide that seemed to be sweeping through Latin America earlier this year is sputtering.

Although disappointment with free-market reforms still runs deep through the region, voters have been choosing presidential candidates who tap into a more powerful force: economic stability. Across Latin America, inflation has been on a steady decline for the past decade, and has dropped to the low single digits for the first time in decades in Mexico, Peru, Ecuador and Brazil. Economic growth, while far from spectacular, has been solid for the past five years.

With that stability, more working-class voters have been able to buy homes, take out loans and obtain their first credit cards. As voters get a stake in the economic system, they become wary of risking it all on populist nostrums -- debt repudiation, deficit spending, state ownership of industries -- that in the past produced economic disasters and left them worse off.

This dynamic has played out in election after election across the volatile region this year, despite high-profile efforts by Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez to fuel anti-U.S. sentiment. In February, Nobel Prize winner Oscar Arias won the presidency of Costa Rica against a candidate who wanted to scuttle a free-trade deal with the U.S. In June, onetime populist Alan García regained the presidency in Peru by embracing free trade and open markets -- and by playing off voter fears of Mr. Chávez's growing influence. In Mexico a month later, the populist former Mexico City mayor, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, lost after failing to find support among the working classes of fast-growing central and northern cities.

And while longtime socialist politicians won in Brazil and Chile, they did so by championing market-friendly policies. This month in Nicaragua, former Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega won the presidency, but even he positioned himself as a candidate of stability and reconciliation. He used John Lennon's "Give Peace a Chance" as a theme, not Vladimir Lenin's economics. The sole presidential candidate who looks likely to win this year on a platform of state intervention, income redistribution and anti-American foreign policy is Venezuela's President Chávez, who has billions of dollars in oil wealth to hand out to supporters.

"We haven't achieved [politically] what we thought was going to be achieved at the beginning of the year," says Efren Andrades, a former agriculture minister in Mr. Chávez's government, who now teaches at the University of the Andes in Mérida, Venezuela.

The diminishing electoral appeal of candidates promising radical economic and political change is on display here in Ecuador, ahead of this Sunday's presidential election. Early this fall, Rafael Correa, a telegenic university professor, leapt ahead of his rivals by wrapping himself closely with Venezuela's Mr. Chávez and vowing to dissolve Congress, redo the constitution and renegotiate the foreign debt. During rallies, he snapped his belt to show how he planned to lash the country's rich into submission to help the poor.

But as voters grew wary of his showmanship, Mr. Correa retreated to the middle. In campaign stops, he now rarely mentions his plans to redesign the economy or rewrite the constitution. Instead, he focuses on issues that even his conservative opponent, banana magnate Alvaro Noboa, embraces, such as improving housing. After moderating his stance, Mr. Correa has regained his footing and is now in a virtual tie with his conservative rival. "Ecuador's economy isn't sustainable," says Mr. Correa. "I am talking about changes to create jobs [and] create productive industries."

Populism is far from dead. Latin America remains fertile territory for politicians who promise a heavy government hand and a retreat from market economics. That's because the benefits of recent economic growth have flowed disproportionately to elites, sustaining income inequality rivaled only by sub-Saharan Africa. Resentment simmers among the working class and poor.

Mexico's conservative president-elect, Felipe Calderón, who won by less than a percentage point, is likely to be dogged during his term by Mr. López Obrador, who claims the election was stolen and swore himself in on Monday as the "legitimate" president. In Argentina, President Nestor Kirchner, who slashed foreign debt payments, set price controls and spent heavily, is the early favorite to win a second term next year.

"Voters are opting for stability, but it would be a big mistake to interpret that as a ringing endorsement of politics as usual in Latin America," says Michael Shifter, vice president of the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington, D.C., think tank. "There is still a lot of frustration in the region."

Even so, the electoral failure of populists so far has been good news for foreign investors and businesses. U.S. companies such as Citigroup Inc. and Wal-Mart Stores Inc. have poured billions of dollars into the region in the past decade on the expectation that economic stability and growing consumer wealth would expand local markets. U.S. officials can also breathe easier because Mr. Chávez hasn't managed to form a potent anti-U.S. economic and political bloc in Latin America.

There are also powerful constraints on governments seeking to govern as populists. In December, leftist Indian leader Evo Morales won Bolivia's presidential election and set about nationalizing the country's oil and gas industry. But the staunch Chávez ally hasn't been able to complete the nationalizations because the state lacks the managers and resources to run privately owned fields.

Ecuador, an oil-rich nation of 13 million, illustrates the rise and ebb of radical politics in Latin America this year. Even in a region known for instability, this Colorado-size country stands out. It has had seven presidents in the past 10 years, three of whom where exiled, jailed or both. In 1997, Abdalá Bucaram, who recorded a record album -- "The Madman Who Loves" -- during his presidency, was deposed by congress for "mental incapacity."

The economic situation has been equally volatile. A fierce rivalry between the Sierra mountain dwellers and residents of the muggy coast has made it difficult for the Quito government to work out necessary compromises that could limit government spending. Instead, the Central Bank printed more Ecuadorian sucres to pay for salary increases, public-works projects and repeated bank bailouts -- short-term fixes that boosted inflation. Between 1979 and 2000, the sucre plummeted from 25-to-the dollar to 25,000-to-the-dollar, wiping out savings and prompting the government to default on its debts twice.

As in all Latin American currency crises, the working and middle classes suffered especially sharp declines. In the mid-1990s, Nelson Rivadeneira, an auto-parts salesman in Quito, owned a home and two cars, and hoped that his son, who attended an inexpensive private school, would climb higher up the economic ladder.

Then the sucre plunged, interest rates soared, and he lost his job as the economy nosedived. Facing bankruptcy, he sold his cars. One went to pay his loans and the other to pay his son's tuition.

As the country's banks started to fail, Mr. Rivadeneira and thousands of other Ecuadorians lined up at teller windows to withdraw their savings. Burger Kings started selling Whoppers for dollars, setting their own exchange rates as the sucre lost about 65% of its value. A newspaper printed photos of financiers boarding planes to Miami. To stem a run, the government froze deposits and allowed banks to issue savers like Mr. Rivadeneira promissory notes. These proved to be worth less than their face value, since confidence in the banking system had vanished.

DOJ_NMG_0097429

The economy hit bottom in 2000. Desperate to halt inflation, the Ecuador government dumped its own currency and adopted the U.S. dollar. Although many economists criticized the move because it limited the government's ability to manage the economy, the tactic succeeded in slashing inflation, which now runs about 3% annually -- Ecuador's lowest ever. Interest rates have plunged as well.

Over the past few years, consumers have benefited. Home builders are pouring money into projects in the working-class area south of Quito, where a shopping mall called El Recreo has doubled in size. The highway that climbs a mountain pass to connect the southern neighborhoods with jobs in the city center is crammed with traffic each dawn for the first time in memory.

Banks are handing out credit cards, spurring a consumption boom. Sales of television sets and major appliances are growing at a 35% annual clip at Comandato, one of Ecuador's biggest retailers. Spurred by financing, General Motors Corp.'s annual sales of cars and trucks in Ecuador have quadrupled to 87,000 since 2000.

Against this economic backdrop, Mr. Correa mounted his populist campaign. He played on his close ties to Venezuela's Mr. Chávez and on a nationalist backlash against a U.S. military base used to fight Colombian drug lords. Also a big theme: the growing wealth of the elites who escaped much of the hardship of the late 1990s economic crisis.

A 43-year-old economist, with a doctorate from the University of Illinois, Mr. Correa had considered a presidential run since his university days, his colleagues say. He burnished his populist credentials during a four-month stint last year as finance minister when he declared that half of the oil revenue the government set aside in a "rainy-day fund" for debt reduction could instead be spent now on welfare for the poor.

That prompted a fight with the World Bank, which said the move could undermine the country's creditworthiness, and pressured Ecuador to change course by retracting a Bank credit line. In response, Mr. Correa flew to Caracas to arrange $300 million of financing from Mr. Chávez. Wearying of the conflict, Ecuador's president fired Mr. Correa.

The battle, though, lifted Mr. Correa's profile and powered his presidential bid. When Mr. Chávez called U.S. President George Bush "Satan" during a speech to the United Nations in September, Mr. Correa said he considered the comment an insult to Satan.

But that turned out to be Mr. Correa's political high-water mark. His plans to renegotiate foreign debt payments encouraged foreign investors to sell Ecuador's bonds, creating fears of a return to crisis. His ties to Mr. Chávez created concern as Chávez-inspired policies in Bolivia spawned protests there as well as a fight with Brazil. His popularity took another hit when he hinted that he would ditch Ecuador's link to the U.S. dollar when he took office. Polls show most Ecuadorians view the greenback as the central pillar of the newfound stability.

Mr. Correa, who had written academic papers attacking dollarization, quickly tried to assure voters that he wouldn't tamper with the currency.

Mr. Correa's political problems became evident in the first round of voting in October, where he came in second after leading in most polls to the 56-year-old Mr. Noboa, regarded as Ecuador's richest man. Since neither candidate won a majority in the first round, they must face each other in Sunday's runoff.

In many ways, Mr. Noboa embodies the plutocracy that Mr. Correa likes to rail against. Mr. Noboa inherited his business empire from his father and consolidated his position after a nasty fight with his siblings. He has taken positions well to the right of Mr. Correa, including promising a free-trade pact with the U.S.

Mr. Noboa also has skillfully used Mr. Correa's left-wing rhetoric against him, warning that Mr. Correa would endanger the country's newfound stability. Borrowing a page from conservative campaigns in Peru and Mexico, Mr. Noboa ran television and radio ads linking Mr. Correa to Mr. Chávez, suggesting that the Chávez-style anti-U.S. bravado would bring about ruin for the country by turning the U.S. into an enemy. One TV ad featured ordinary voters saying, "We can't have Chávez meddling in our country."

After his poll numbers sank, Mr. Correa put some distance between himself and Caracas. "Look, Chávez is my friend, but I haven't talked to him in months, and he has nothing to do with my campaign," he said.

Mr. Correa denies he is retreating from his principles. "My positions on the constitution and other things are already well known, so it makes sense to now to talk about new issues. I haven't changed a thing," he said as the SUV he campaigns in zipped between a 7 a.m. television interview and his children's French-language private school.

But that's not the message voters are getting. "Correa is coming back to reality," says Mr. Rivadeneira, the former auto-parts salesman who now has a good job selling Chevrolets. He says Mr. Correa's new campaign pitch is more in line with his own views, and that Mr. Correa may even get his vote. "I don't think anyone wants to risk stability," he says.

Maoists Sign Peace Deal In Nepal (NYT)

By Tilak P. Pokharel And Somini Sengupta
The New York Times, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097430

KATMANDU, Nepal, Nov. 21 — To end a crippling war that raged for more than 10 years and killed thousands, Maoist rebels in Nepal signed a peace deal with the government on Tuesday night, with a pledge to lock up their guns, at least for now, and let voters decide the future of the country.

The accord promises to bring the rebels, who control vast swaths of the destitute countryside, into the political mainstream. Whether the Maoists, who once functioned as a political party but abandoned the electoral path for armed struggle, will now play by the rules of parliamentary democracy is the most important question.

"It is the beginning of a new beginning," the Maoist leader, known by his nom de guerre, Prachanda, said after signing the agreement in Katmandu, the capital.

Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala said: "This has given a message to the international community and terrorists all over the world that no conflict can be resolved by guns. It can be done by dialogue."

The peace agreement paves the way for the fulfillment of one of the Maoists' chief demands: elections to decide whether Nepal will remain a monarchy. The interim government, which the rebels have agreed to join, will organize elections next year for an assembly that will determine whether Nepal will remain a kingdom and if so, what kind.

The Maoists have repeatedly promised to run in the elections and abide by the results. On Saturday, during a visit to New Delhi, Prachanda reiterated that pledge, saying that even if Nepal voted to keep the monarchy, his cadres would continue to press for its abolition — but would do so peacefully.

The agreement signed Tuesday in Katmandu came a year after the rebels teamed up with Nepal's main political parties to topple King Gyanendra, who dismissed the country's elected politicians and took control of the state early last year.

In April, street protests blessed by the Maoists prompted Gyanendra to turn over control to the elected Parliament, which had been suspended four years earlier. This week a government-appointed panel found the king responsible for rights abuses against the pro-democracy protesters and called for him to be punished.

After the king yielded to Parliament, it was swift to take vital powers away from him, including control of the army, and engaged in peace talks with the rebels, who declared a unilateral cease-fire. Under the peace accord, the Maoists will sequester their armed fighters in cantonment sites, and the Nepalese Army will return to its barracks.

Ian Martin, the United Nations envoy to Nepal, said in a statement on Tuesday that agreement had been reached on the locations of the cantonment sites. He added, "Today's agreement promises to convert the cease-fire into long-term peace."

The rebels, still apparently distrustful of politicians and the palace, have not laid down their arms entirely. They have agreed to lock up their weapons but are holding on to the keys. The United Nations is to monitor the safekeeping of weapons through a system of closed-circuit cameras.

Human rights groups have accused the rebels of continuing to recruit members in the countryside, including children, but the Maoists have denied the charge.

The Maoists say they want their troops to be integrated into a new national army. How many and in what fashion remain unclear. "We are not dogmatic Communists, and we are prepared to change and debate our beliefs with anybody," Prachanda was quoted by [a news service] as saying.

The rebels, who called the conflict a "people's war," began with the aim of establishing a Communist state. Maoist insurgencies have blossomed in South Asia long after the demise of Mao and his ideology in China.

In India, a loose confederation of Maoist rebels are active in a swath of territory from the jungles of the far south all the way north to the border with Nepal. The Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, recently described them as the country's most pressing internal security threat.

The peace accord in Nepal includes a provision to establish a truth and reconciliation commission "to find facts about those involved in committing serious human rights violations and those involved in crime against humanity during the armed conflict."

Within minutes of its signing, crowds of well-wishers lined the streets and lighted candles as they waited for Prime Minister Koirala's motorcade to pass.

"Both sides give up state of war; it's celebration time," Kanak Dixit, the editor of Himal magazine, said by telephone amid hoots and hollers on the street. "The only challenge that now remains is that the Maoists, in particular their militia, be held to account by the peace deal."

Basanta Sharma, 35, a student, waited for three hours outside the Birendra International Convention Center for news of the signing. "What else can be there which makes us so happy?" he said. "It seems the common man can now live in peace, work and earn their living."

Peace Agreement Nets Guerrillas Seats In Parliament (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097431

KATMANDU, Nepal -- The government and rebels signed a peace deal yesterday to end a decadelong insurgency, paving the way for the guerrillas to join Nepal's interim leadership.

Nepalese Prime Minister Girija Prasad Koirala and Maoist rebel leader Prachanda signed the accord at a Katmandu convention hall packed with cheering officials, dignitaries and foreign diplomats.

"This ends the more than one decade of civil war in the country," said Prachanda, who goes by a single name. "We will now turn to a campaign of peace and building a new Nepal."

The rebels' fight for a communist state left more than 13,000 people dead before a cease-fire was declared in April. It came after weeks of mass protests that forced King Gyanendra to end his royal dictatorship and restore parliament, which he had suspended 14 months earlier.

The peace deal "has opened the door for a permanent peace, and Nepal has entered a new era," Mr. Koirala said.

The agreement came after months of negotiations that centered on how to disarm the insurgents and bring them into the government, which they helped bring to power by backing the April protests.

The first issue, disarming the rebels, was solved Nov. 8 when the Maoists agreed to confine their fighters to seven camps and lock up their weapons under U.N. supervision.

Talks then shifted focus to integrating the rebels into the interim parliament and government.

Under yesterday's deal, the rebels are to join the interim parliament by Nov. 26 and will get 73 of the chamber's 330 seats. Mr. Koirala's Nepali Congress will remain the biggest party with 85 seats, and the Maoists will share second place with Communist Party of Nepal (United Marxist-Leninist). The rest of the seats will be held by other, smaller parties.

The rebels' large number will give them a significant role in a new interim government, which will be in place by Dec. 1.

The rebels will also get to play a major part in deciding how and when to elect a constituent assembly that is to rewrite the constitution and decide on the monarchy's fate.

The assembly was a key demand of the hundreds of thousands of ordinary Nepalese who took to the streets in April to demand Gyanendra's ouster.

Centrist parties favor a constitution that preserves the monarchy in a ceremonial role, while the Maoist rebels want the crown abolished.

A 2001 palace massacre, in which the crown prince is accused of gunning down Gyanendra's older brother, King Birendra, and much of the royal family and then killing himself, helped pierce the mystique surrounding Nepal's royalty.

The slaughter brought Gyanendra to the throne. Four years later, he dismissed parliament and seized power, saying he would bring order to a chaotic and corrupt political scene and quell the Maoist insurgency.

Internet Extends Reach Of Bangladeshi Villagers (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

CHARKHAI, Bangladesh -- The village doctor's diagnosis was dire: Marium needed immediate surgery to replace two heart valves.

The 28-year-old mother of three said she was confused and terrified. She could barely imagine open-heart surgery. She had no idea how her family of farm laborers could pay for an operation that would cost $4,000.

The next day, Sept. 16, her father went to see Mahbubul Ambia, who had recently installed the only Internet connection for 20 miles in far northeastern Bangladesh. Ambia sat down at a computer, connected to the Internet by a cable plugged into his cellphone, and searched for cardiac specialists in Dhaka, the capital, 140 miles away. He found one and made an appointment for Marium, who like many people here goes by just one name. The specialist examined her and said she needed only a routine surgical procedure that cost $500.

"I felt a very deep sense of relief," Marium said.

Villages in one of the world's poorest countries, long isolated by distance and deprivation, are getting their first Internet access, all connected over cellphones. And in the process, millions of people who have no land-line telephones, and often lack electricity and running water, in recent months have gained access to services considered basic in richer countries: weather reports, e-mail, even a doctor's second opinion.

Cellphones have become a new bridge across the digital divide between the world's rich and poor, as innovators use the explosive growth of cellphone networks to connect people to the Internet.

Bangladesh now has about 16 million cellphone subscribers -- and 2 million new users each month -- compared with just 1 million land-line phones to serve a population of nearly 150 million people.

DOJ_NMG_0097432

Since February, Internet centers have opened in well over 100 Bangladeshi villages, and a total of 500 are scheduled to be open by the end of the year. All of them are in places where there are no land lines and the connections will be made exclusively over cellphone networks.

Before February, analysts said, only 370,000 Bangladeshis had access to the Internet. But now millions of villagers have access to information and services that had been available only by walking or taking long and expensive bus rides, or were beyond their reach altogether.

People now download job applications and music, see school exam results, check news and crop prices, make inexpensive Internet phone calls or use Web cameras to see relatives. Students from villages with few books now have access to online dictionaries and encyclopedias.

"We could not imagine where this technology has taken us in such a short time," said Mufizur Rahman, 48, a grocery shop owner in Charkhai, a town of about 40,000 people whose streets are filled with colorful three-wheeled bicycle rickshaws, and where there are almost no cars.

"For the First World, this is minor," he said. "But this is a big thing for us."

The Internet centers are being set up by GrameenPhone, a cellphone provider partly owned by the Grameen Bank, which shared this year's Nobel Peace Prize with its founder, Muhammad Yunus.

The centers are building on a cellphone network created over the past decade by a Grameen Bank program that helped provide more than 250,000 cellphones in villages. When that program started in 1997, only 1.5 percent of the population had access to a telephone; that has risen to more than 10 percent.Staying Connected

Goats grazed on litter outside Ambia's little Internet shop in Charkhai, where merchants sell bright red tomatoes and honking ducks in the crowded central market.

Bangladesh, where the United Nations says average annual income is about $440, is one of the most densely populated countries in the world, with its 150 million people crammed into an area roughly the size of Iowa.

Ambia's shop sits wedged between a stall where men sell huge sacks of rice and one selling cheap plastic shoes. By midmorning on a steamy September day, at least 20 people stood in line waiting to use one of Ambia's two Chinese-made computers.

A woman named Aleya, 55, sat down on a small plastic chair and handed Ambia a scrap of paper with a London phone number. She said that her 18-year-old daughter was getting married and that she was calling her uncle in England to ask him to help pay for it. Aleya said her husband is a construction worker who earns about $70 a month, barely enough to feed their five children.

Ambia dialed the number on the keyboard of his computer, connected by a cable to a Motorola cellphone. The call connected using VoIP (Voice over Internet Protocol) technology, which allows calls to be placed from a computer to another computer or a telephone anywhere in the world -- for little or no cost.

VoIP technology is growing rapidly. One of the biggest brands, Skype, was founded in August 2003 and now has 136 million registered users. Companies such as Vonage and Yahoo also offer the service and are expanding exponentially.

Aleya picked up the small telephone handset connected to the computer and her face lit up. Her uncle, who owns a restaurant in London, promised that he'd make arrangements to send money for the wedding.

The five-minute call cost 8 Bangladeshi taka, about 11 cents.

"An 8-taka call has earned me thousands," Aleya said with a broad smile.

Before Ambia's center opened in February, Aleya said, she would have called her uncle on a borrowed cellphone at a cost of more than $2, her husband's daily wage.

The only other option would have been to take a bumpy bus to Sylhet, a city about 20 miles down the road, to make the call from an Internet cafe there. She said rutted roads and ancient buses making frequent stops often turned that into an all-day errand that would cost her nearly $3.

As Aleya spoke on the phone, Komoruddin, 50, was waiting to make a call to his son, an electrician living in Saudi Arabia. Komoruddin said he and his other son and five daughters live largely on the money his son sends home.

"I used to have to make a plan and spend a whole day to make a call. Now I can just come in here and relax," he said. "I never thought I'd see anything like this here. Some people still don't believe it."Cyber Vows

Ambia, a lanky 26-year-old, said he was running a small shop doing cellphone repairs when he heard about GrameenPhone's plan to create hundreds of village Internet centers.

"I love browsing the Internet, but I used to have to go to Sylhet to do it," he said. "When I saw the opportunity to combine browsing and business, I took it."

He said his business is growing fast, fueled by villagers' delight at being able to connect with a world beyond theirs. Ambia also sells cellphones in his shop, and each month he signs up about 500 new customers, who pay about $4 to activate a phone.

DOJ_NMG_0097433

Ambia said Internet access is a logical next step in Charkhai's digital evolution. In recent months, he noted, local people have been making long walks through the fields and crossing wide rivers to log into cyberspace.

Before, getting a passport application could take weeks, or would require a bus trip to Sylhet. News of overseas job opportunities used to come by word of mouth. But now people browse online employment bulletin boards, then use the center's scanner to submit completed applications for jobs that before they might never have known about.

Students cram into the two-room center to use computers to check results of their standardized exams, instead of walking miles or taking a bus ride to get them.

Ambia has created a database of land and houses for sale around Charkhai, which better-off Bangladeshis in London or the Middle East use to browse for investments in their homeland.

He is working on databases listing doctors and other basic services. He said a program would soon begin to allow local doctors and their patients to hold video conferences to consult with specialists in Dhaka.

"People are just beginning to know about this," he said. "They are excited to get this kind of information."

One of Ambia's most popular services is video conferencing, using the little Hyundai Web camera mounted atop one of his computer monitors.

Entire families crowd in front of the center's camera to hold video conferences with relatives overseas. Ambia said a mother came in recently to hold up a newborn to give the father, working overseas, his first glimpse of his child.

"People even come here to see how things are being cooked in London, how they are cutting the fish," he said.

And Ambia was preparing to add a 21st-century twist to a traditional ritual, by hosting his first video conference wedding.

Aslam Ahmed, 25, said he planned to sit in front of the Web camera in Charkhai and marry his girlfriend, Jasmine, 17, who would be in front of a Web camera in her home in London.

Weddings conducted over the telephone are common in this part of Bangladesh. Many marriages are still arranged between conservative Muslim families, and often the bride or groom is living overseas.

A marriage certificate is also a fast route to getting a work visa to leave Bangladesh -- and conducting the wedding by phone is faster and cheaper than arranging for the overseas partner and family to travel home for a wedding.

An imam is present at both ends of the call, along with a civil official who certifies the vows. Duplicate sets of paperwork are then exchanged by mail for everyone's signatures.

Ahmed and his bride had planned a wedding by cellphone and knew they would have to pay $30 or $40 just for the call. The video conference over the Internet, however, would cost a fraction of that, so the imams conducting the ceremony would not have to rush through the prayers to save money.

Jasmine's family moved to London in 1986. Ahmed said he had met her just once, in 2002, when her family came back to Charkhai to visit. They spoke on the phone and exchanged e-mail regularly after that -- and once Ambia's center opened, they saw each other regularly by video conference, even though they live 5,000 miles apart.

"I don't know what other people say, but as far as I'm concerned she's Miss World," Ahmed said.

Russian Venom (WSJ)

By Boris Volodarsky

The Wall Street Journal, November 22, 2006

On the evening of Feb. 18, 1954, in Frankfurt, a man called on Georgy Okolovich, a leader of an anti-Soviet émigré union. The business at hand was murder. But things took a different turn when Okolovich opened the door. "I'm a captain in the Ministry of State Security and I have been sent from Moscow to organize your assassination," the visitor told him straight out. "I don't want to carry the order out and I need your help." His name was Nikolai Khokhlov. He defected to the U.S. and revealed that the Soviets used assassination as a political instrument.

Three years later, Mr. Khokhlov was at a conference in Germany when, while with friends, he drank a cup of coffee and collapsed hours later. The doctors called it simple food poisoning, but his condition deteriorated until, 10 days into his illness, his hair began to fall out; his bone marrow was found to be severely damaged and his body showed an almost total loss of the white cells that are vital to the proper functioning of the immune system. Later tests uncovered the culprit: deliberate poisoning by a new and previously unknown form of thallium. He lived to tell the tale.

Fast forward to November 1998, in Moscow, when Col. Alexander Litvinenko of the Russian Ministry of State Security -- the old KGB that today goes by FSB -- publicly accused his superiors of ordering him to assassinate Russian tycoon Boris Berezovsky. He was soon arrested and put in the infamous Lefortovo prison. The head of the FSB at the time was Vladimir Putin. A court cleared Mr. Litvinenko the following year of all accusations, including service misconduct and assorted others, but he was rearrested and retried the following year, and cleared again. In 2000, he and his family went to live in exile in Britain.

There, Mr. Litvinenko published a book that tied the 1999 bombings of Moscow apartment buildings -- which justified Russia's reinvasion of Chechnya -- to the Putin presidential election campaign, which was successfully propelled by that war.

Early this November, Mr. Litvinenko was invited to tea at a London hotel with a Russian man who was familiar to him from his Moscow days. Some hours later, he had a sushi lunch at Piccadilly Circus with an Italian acquaintance, Mario Scaramella, who wanted to give him documents purportedly throwing light on the recent assassination in Moscow of the opposition journalist Anna Politkovskaya, shot dead last month in her apartment building.

That night, he became violently ill. At first, doctors suspected food poisoning. It was only on the 10th day in hospital, when his hair began to fall out, that toxicology tests were performed. His body contained, these tests showed, three times the fatal dose of thallium. John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who was the first to pinpoint the dioxin poisoning of Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko, examined Mr. Litvinenko this Saturday and told the BBC, "There's no doubt that he's been poisoned by thallium." According to my sources close to Alexander, whom I've known for a couple years, investigators now suspect that he was poisoned at the tea, not the lunch. The name of the Russian suspect hasn't been made public by the police.

When I heard the other day that Alexander's condition was worsening, I thought that the doctors perhaps made the same mistake as in the Khokhlov case. Thallium has never been known to attack the blood stream, but that's what's happening to Alexander Litvinenko. Specialists at the U.S. military hospital in Frankfurt only later discovered that Mr. Khokhlov was exposed to radioactivated thallium, which initially only results in non-specific gastrointestinal symptoms; and only later did they observe a moderate elevation of blood lipids, leukocytosis and anemia that occurs in most high-level intoxications. By the time the symptoms known to be after-effects of radiation began to appear, the radioactivated thallium had already disintegrated, making it very hard for doctors to find, and for investigators to confirm, the poisoning. The same scenario may be playing out with Mr. Litvinenko. Yesterday the London hospital treating him said it could not confirm that the poison was thallium -- a diagnosis that in the Khokhlov case was only made by a special U.S. military hospital.

I last met Alexander at London's Connaught Hotel to discuss the Khokhlov case, about which I'd published a monograph. He was investigating the death of Yury Shchekochikhin, an opposition Russian parliamentarian and journalist, who died in suspicious circumstances in 2003 after a two-week illness. His symptoms were similar to President Yushchenko's, pointing clearly to exposure to a toxic agent. After his death, no autopsy was performed and access to medical records wasn't allowed.

Mr. Litvinenko is a small thorn in the side of the current Russian regime. He lives abroad and holds a British passport. That didn't protect him, but nor did it Georgi Markov, the Bulgarian dissident who in 1978 was killed by a KGB ricin-tipped umbrella near Waterloo station.

It is perhaps too early to discuss how and why Mr. Litvinenko was poisoned. Some things are clear. This was likely the work of the Russian secret service that had been after him for years. Whether the Russian president, who was often the object of Mr. Litvinenko's fierce and fearless mockery, is involved is open to doubt. I wonder if Mr. Putin is in control of his squabbling entourage. Whatever the truth, this poisoning also looks to be directed against Boris Berezovsky, now in exile in London and campaigning for regime change in Russia. Mr. Litvinenko is one of his advisers.

Russian foreign intelligence denies any involvement in his poisoning. It cannot deny, however, its long history of using poison as a weapon. The "Kamera," or as KGB veterans might remember it, "Laboratory No. 12," was founded in 1921 in a corner of Lenin's Cheka. This office innovated biological and chemical agents as advancing science and the Kremlin dictated. But one thing in their design has stayed constant: To make the victim's death or illness appear natural, or at least produce symptoms that will baffle doctors long enough to delay proper treatment. The Chechen rebel Khattab was poisoned in 2004, as was Trotsky's secretary Wolfgang Salus in 1957. Countless other victims were never identified as such.

Before the Litvinenko case, the most prominent poisoning involved Mr. Yushchenko, whose digestive tract and once-chiseled face were destroyed by a complex, dioxin-based compound during a meal with the top officials of his country's security service. Mr. Yushchenko was an unwelcome candidate for Moscow in Ukraine's 2004 elections. Like Khokhlov, he survived; all leads in that case point to the Kamera. The investigation has been hindered by overt pressure on Mr. Yushchenko's doctors at home and in Austria, where he was treated, and Ukrainian politicians.

At this hour, Alexander Litvinenko is fighting for his life in a London hospital.

Mr. Volodarsky, a former Soviet military intelligence officer who lives in London, is the author, with Oleg Gordievsky, of the forthcoming "KGB: The West Side Story."

Programs Help Reduce HIV Rates In Parts Of Africa, Report Says (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, November 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097435

Seven African countries are experiencing a decline in the prevalence of HIV infection among young, urban adults, finally reaping the benefit of AIDS prevention and treatment, the United Nations said yesterday in its annual report on the global epidemic.

That good news was offset by troubling signs that the first African country to reverse the epidemic, Uganda, is experiencing a resurgence of infection, as is Thailand, another early success story.

Based on hundreds of national and regional surveys, the report stitches a patchwork of progress and setbacks: a successful national treatment program in Brazil and a new, aggressive response by the Chinese government, alongside a worsening HIV epidemic in the former Soviet bloc and a new outbreak among gay men in Europe.

But the pendulum swing underway in Uganda and Thailand appears to mark a new phase in the 25-year-old AIDS epidemic.

"It should not be a surprise that the countries first to show success will be the first to have a rebound and show problems," said Peter Piot, director of UNAIDS, the program run by the United Nations and the World Bank. "It is something that I am really very worried about."

He and other epidemiologists are trying to learn whether the resurgence of infection in the two nations is a demographic copy of the first wave of AIDS cases or represents the spread of infection to new groups. They are also trying to understand how big a part "prevention fatigue" may be playing in the trend.

"We really don't have an idea why it is happening," Piot said.

The findings make clear that vulnerable populations may differ somewhat from country to country, and that entire nations may be at different stages in the epidemic.

"One of the main messages is the need of countries to know their epidemic," said Paul De Lay, director of monitoring and evaluation at UNAIDS. "The epidemics are continuing to evolve."

Worldwide, 39.5 million people are infected by HIV, up 2.6 million from two years ago. This year, an estimated 4.3 million people will become infected and 2.9 million will die, according to the report. Two-thirds of all adults and children with HIV live in sub-Saharan Africa.

In many countries, HIV incidence is uncertain. Estimates based on the infection rate of pregnant women at public clinics are unrealistically high, and estimates based on household surveys (which often miss such high-risk people as commercial sex workers, drug users, soldiers and migrants) are deceptively low.

Most estimates now combine the methods, and although they are generally lower than previously cited rates, they are still shockingly high for many countries. In Zimbabwe, for example, 20 percent of people 15 to 49 are thought to be infected with the AIDS virus.

Prevalence of the disease in city dwellers 15 to 24, who make up a key demographic gauge of the epidemic's trajectory, has fallen by at least 25 percent in Zimbabwe, Malawi, Kenya, Botswana, Burundi, Rwanda and Ivory Coast. In Zimbabwe, Kenya, Botswana and Tanzania, the rate fell a similar amount among rural people.

In Uganda, the national prevalence is 6.7 percent -- a steep decline from a decade ago, attributed to fewer sex partners, later "sexual debut" by teenagers, increased condom use and rising AIDS mortality through the 1990s. Now, however, AIDS prevalence is rising in some populations, such as rural men (up from 5.6 to 6.5 percent) and rural women (6.9 percent to 8.8 percent), according to recent surveys.

Piot said Uganda also suffered from a period of "decreased credibility" of condoms, the consequence of messages by some fundamentalist groups, a run of defective condoms and then a shortage of condoms.

In Thailand, HIV infection used to be seen almost exclusively in prostitutes and their male clients. The spread of the virus was nearly halted by a national campaign for "100 percent condom use" in commercial sex transactions. Now, however, the epidemic is spreading to married women, who accounted for one-third of new infections last year. It is also becoming far more prevalent in male homosexuals -- up from 17 percent in Bangkok in 2003 to 28 percent in 2005.

In Western Europe, just over one-third of the new HIV infections last year occurred in "men who have sex with men," the term preferred by epidemiologists, because many men infected that way do not consider themselves to be homosexual. The Netherlands, Britain, Portugal, Switzerland and Belgium reported steep increases in the number of infections in that population since 2000.

About 55 percent of new infections in Europe were acquired through opposite-sex intercourse, with three-quarters occurring in immigrants or migrants. The report noted the need to target prevention programs to them.

A major sign of progress is that since 2002, 2 million years of life have been gained by the use of antiviral drugs in low- and middle-income countries. In Africa, 790,000 years of life have been gained, most in the past two years.

DOJ_NMG_0097436

Lifesaving combinations of antivirals became widely used in rich countries beginning in 1996. The idea that a decade later they might be used by more than a handful of people in poor countries was viewed by most as unrealistic and possibly dangerous.

Piot said the report demonstrates that policymakers such as himself "need to safeguard early successes like Uganda." He added: "You develop complacency, and the attention moves to something else. That is completely human. The job is never finished, particularly when you have had some successes."

Iran And Arak (NYT)

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

The International Atomic Energy Agency has always had a conflicted mandate. It is supposed to promote the peaceful use of nuclear technology while also restraining the spread of nuclear weapons. The problem is that some peaceful nuclear technology can be too easily used to make a weapon.

That dangerous duality is being played out again this week in Vienna, where the agency's board is debating whether its staff should provide Iran with technical advice on how to safely complete construction of a heavy water nuclear reactor near the town of Arak. Tehran says that it needs the reactor to produce medical isotopes. The United States and the Europeans suspect that what it really wants is the abundant plutonium that can be extracted from the reactor's spent fuel — plutonium that could form the core of a nuclear weapon.

Denying the request should be a no-brainer — especially at a time when Iran is defying a Security Council order that it stop enriching uranium, usable for nuclear reactor fuel or potentially a nuclear bomb. But Tehran is adept at whipping up the suspicions of the board's nuclear have-nots, who jealously guard their right to all civilian nuclear technology, no matter the potential dangers.

The board needs to soundly reject Iran's request. Anything less — some members of the notoriously conflict-averse board are calling for deferring the decision — will only confirm Tehran's belief that the international community is not serious about containing its nuclear ambitions.

Even more worrisome, the Security Council still cannot agree on how to punish Iran for continuing to enrich uranium — nearly three months past a Council-ordered cutoff.

Moscow and Beijing, which have been protecting Tehran at the Council, need to focus less on Iran's oil wealth and more on the dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran. The Bush administration, which has agreed to talk with Iran if it suspends enrichment, needs to go further, offering Tehran explicit security guarantees in exchange for giving up technology that could feed a nuclear weapons program.

Until there are real incentives and equally real punishments there is no chance of changing any minds in Tehran. The Arak episode is one more reminder of why the world needs to find a better way to guarantee countries the benefits of civilian nuclear technology without also dangling the temptations of nuclear weapons.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Imams' Removal From Plane Raises Questions Of Profiling. NBC Nightly News (11/23, story 5, 2:25, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "Six Islamic religious leader were taken off their flight to Phoenix in handcuffs after passengers reported what they thought was suspicious behavior. After since 9/11 Americans have been told, 'If you see something, say something.' But just what is the standard?" NBC (Pete Williams) added, "They were Muslim religious leaders ready to fly home from a conference. But to a man waiting for the same flight at the airport gate and who watched them pray and overheard them talking, they were something quite different. In a note he passed to the airline, he described, 'suspicious Arabic men saying Allah, Allah, and cursing US involvement in Iraq.' Dozens of US citizens who are Muslim or come from other countries say passenger suspicions often single them out because of the way they look." Reginald Shuford, ACLU: "They are simply reinforcing stereotypes, and number two, they are not doing anything really to make us any safer, only giving out the illusion that they are taking actions that make us safer." NBC (Williams) added, "US Airways, which asked the six Muslims to leave the plane this week, says it won't tolerate discrimination and is investigating. But airlines say they are obligated to take passenger concerns seriously." Steve Pomerantz, former FBI counter-terrorism official: "There simply aren't enough law enforcement people to spot all suspicious behavior, and the whole system is dependent on the concept that people will come forward and report."

Detainee Tries To Halt Heart Surgery At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (11/23, Williams, 850K) reported that Saifullah Paracha, a businessman detained at Guantanamo Bay for "allegedly providing support to Al Qaeda has refused to have a heart operation at the U.S. military detention center hospital here and instead is seeking a court order for civilian treatment in the U.S. or his native Pakistan." The Times added, "The dispute over who should operate and where has spotlighted questions of medical ethics in the handling of some of the 430 terrorism suspects detained at Guantanamo. … Guantanamo officials say that their 150-person medical team is capable of performing the routine operation and that nearly $400,000 was spent flying in a 24-member team of cardiac specialists and equipment to be on hand in case of complications. But Paracha's lawyers told a U.S. district judge in Washington last week that Guantanamo doctors had left him shackled during previous examinations and treatments. Paracha's request for a court order to halt the operation at the prison was denied Monday, when Judge Paul L. Friedman said he was not convinced Paracha faced a risk of "irreparable injury" at Guantanamo."

Reno, Other Former Justice Officials Criticize Detention Policy In Amicus Brief. United Press International (11/22) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other senior Justice Department officials have criticized the Bush administration's terror detention policy. The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case of Qatar native Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a suspected al-Qaida sympathizer arrested in Illinois. In the brief, the officials suggested indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene, the Washington Post reported."

In a brief, the AP (11/22) added, "It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy. The former prosecutors on Monday challenged the department's right to bring the suspect before a military panel."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Whistleblowers Report Continued Reprisals From Superiors. USA Today (11/24, Rampell, 2.27M) reports, "Since the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the average number of employees filing whistle-blower disclosures with the government has risen 43%, from an average of 376 annually in the four years before the attacks to 537 annually after. … An increasing number of whistle-blowers allege that rather than being embraced, they're being retaliated against for coming forward. In the four years before the terrorist attacks, whistle-blowers filed an average of 690 reprisal complaints with the OSC annually. Since the attacks, an average of 835 complaints have been filed each year, a 21% increase. The number of whistle-blower reprisal complaints is higher than the number of whistle-blower disclosure complaints because employees can file reprisal complaints with the OSC even if they had not previously filed their disclosure with the OSC." USA Today notes, "Most national security whistle-blowers are not protected from retaliation by law. … Whistle-blowers employed by these agencies must seek recourse within the same agency they are blowing the whistle on. And even if the investigators within their own agency confirm reprisal allegations, the investigators have no power to remedy the situation."

Woman Was Investigated After Reporting "Shoddy" Translations Of 9/11 Material. In a separate article, USA Today (11/24, Rampell, 2.27M) reports on Sibel Edmonds, who "discovered 'shoddy' translations relevant to 9/11 created by translators who had 'failed the proficiency exams,' she says. A report by the Justice Department's inspector general subsequently confirmed that at least one translator had failed the FBI's language proficiency exams. Edmonds says the translator was sent to Guantanamo Bay to translate 'the most sensitive terrorist-related information' from interviews of detainees." USA Today notes that Edmonds "took a polygraph test and was investigated for typing her allegations … on her home computer, even though her supervisor had given permission for her to do so, the inspector general's report said." USA Today adds, "The state secrets privilege — a series of U.S. legal precedents — has been cited by the federal government at least 18 times since 9/11 and at least 81 times since the privilege was first recognized in 1953, according to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press."

Charity Says It's Not Part Of Bin Laden-Linked Sudanese Group. The AP (11/23) reported that the Missouri-based Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia, a charity "accused of being part of a terrorist organization tried to distance itself in court this week from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida. The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas." The group's attorney, Shereff hadi Akeel, "told a U.S. Court of Appeals on Monday that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said."

New Plan Would Use State Police As "Hubs" For Antiterror Network. UPI (11/24, Waterman) reports, "A new plan from the U.S. intelligence czar will use intelligence centers run by state police as the hubs for a national network of officials from different agencies and levels of government sharing information about terrorism. In a move likely to rattle privacy mavens, the three-year plan for implementing the congressionally mandated Information Sharing Environment (ISE) also lays out policies designed to ease sharing with foreign governments, and proposes to widen the definition of shareable terrorism information."

Seattle Newspaper Calls On Congress to Revise Military Commission Act. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/24, 124K) editorializes, "If congressional Democrats want to exercise the mandate voters gave them in the midterm elections, they'd do well to undo the injury done to civil liberties by the Military Commissions Act passed last month. The law was a controversial response to the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Bush administration using executive power to dictate treatment of so-called 'foreign combatants' at Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba. … Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, who was the defense counsel in the Supreme Court case that spurred the new law, said of the Bush administration's assertions of how detainees could be treated, 'There went the Bill of Rights.' A Democratic Congress would do well to get it back."

WAR NEWS:

Attack On Sadr City Kills At Least 160. All three networks led with the attack on Sadr City, commenting about the likelihood of a "tipping point" being reached or exceeded. ABC World News (11/23, lead story, 3:31, Vargas, 8.78M) said, "At least 160 Iraqis are dead. Another 250 hurt, in what may be the deadliest wave of sectarian violence in one day since the start of the war. It was a series of attacks. The targets were Shiite Muslims, in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City." ABC (Brown): "It started at 10 minutes past 3:00, on a busy afternoon. Three cars, each packed with 1,000 pounds of explosives, blew up in 15-minute intervals." Tony Cordesman, Center For Strategic & International Studies: "If you can get sufficient violence, you will have an open civil war. And if you have open civil war, the United States and its allies will probably be forced to leave." Lt. Charles Morton, 1st Cavalry Division: "If you're helping the Sunni, the Shi'a think you're out to kill Shi'a. So, it's a fragile situation."

CBS Evening News (11/23, lead story, 3:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq remains on the brink of civil war." CBS (Palmer) added, "The slaughter today stunned Iraqis like never before with the tit for tat murder rate now spiraling up; many think the civil war has finally arrived."

NBC Nightly News (11/23, lead story, 3:01, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "There is high anxiety not only because of the number of casualties, but also because the targets, Shi'ites, quickly struck back." NBC (Aspell) adds, "The curfew here can't last forever. When it eases, many here feel there will be a wave of reprisal killings." Col. Jack Jacobs: "You've got warring factions, both armed, who are working extremely hard to take over control of the country. If that isn't civil war, I don't know what is."

Print sources also reported the violence. The AP (11/24, Hurst) reports, "The bloodshed underlined the impotence of the Iraqi army and police to quell determined sectarian extremists at a time when the Bush administration appears to be considering a move to accelerate the hand-over of security responsibilities." The transport ministry "took the highly unusual step of closing the airport and docks in the southern city of Basra, the country's main outlet to the vital shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf." A later Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (11/24, Hurst) article updates the death toll to "at least 202."

Bush-Maliki Summit Will Go On. The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Roug, 850K) reports, "The White House said the attacks, which occurred on the anniversary of the death of the cleric for whom Sadr City is named, would not cause the [Bush-Maliki] meeting to be rescheduled." In Iraq, "Even Iraqis hardened by the relentless violence feared the scale of Thursday's attacks marked a turning point, much as the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra early this year sparked unprecedented rounds of sectarian killing."

Attacks Show Increasing Organization; Politicians Fear US Departure. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, Shishkin, 2.04M) reports that the attacks "reflected the increasing sophistication and coordination of combatants. ... As the violence deepens, one thing unites Iraqi politicians across the Sunni-Shia divide: Growing concern about increasing talk in Washington of a possible withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. Mr. Mashadani, the outspoken Sunni Parliament speaker, suggests the U.S. should have some 500,000 troops in Iraq to truly make a difference. Mr. Sagheer, the Shiite lawmaker, also says the U.S. should stay and keep training Iraqi security forces."

Ministries Become Foci Of Violence. Financial Times (11/24, Negus) reports that the attack "coincided with an assault by up to 100 gunmen on the Ministry of Health, which, like Sadr City, is a base for the Shia Mahdi Army militia loyal to the radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr." The Financial Times adds, "The health ministry assault reflects the growing tendency for ministries in Baghdad, most of which are controlled by sectarian-based parties, to be either the bases for, or the targets of, acts of violence. Sunni say that they risk kidnap and murder if they stray too near to the health ministry, and US troops in August raided the compound looking for hostages."

The New York Times (11/24, Semple, 1.16M), USA Today (11/24, Soriano, 2.27M), AFP (11/23, Karim), and Washington Post (11/24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) all reported the bloodshed. The Post observes, "The attack occurred as Sadr's supporters were commemorating the death of his father, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, one of Iraq's most revered ayatollahs, assassinated by agents of then-President Saddam Hussein in 1999."

US Forces Turn To "Vietnam Playbook." The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Spiegel, 850K) reports in a 2,077-word article, "New tactics favored by U.S. commanders in Iraq borrow heavily from the end of another war that might seem an unlikely source for a winning strategy: Vietnam. The tactics — an influx of military advisors and a speeded-up handover to indigenous forces followed by a gradual U.S. withdrawal — resemble those in place as the U.S. effort in Vietnam reached its end." Even though the public considers Vietnam an "unwinnable war," many in the armed forces believe "Vietnam as a war actually was on its way to succeeding when the Nixon administration and Congress, bowing to public impatience, pulled the plug: first withdrawing U.S. combat forces and then blocking funding and supplies to the South Vietnamese army. ... For many in the military, the lessons of Vietnam are clear: Maintain public support, and be patient." As a result, "officers steeped in Vietnam's lessons have been brought into the Pentagon by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as part of his task force rethinking Iraq strategy." Those involved express concern that, "like the Abrams initiatives, which ran from 1968 through 1973, the current move to step up training of the Iraqi forces comes at a time when domestic support for war is on the wane and political winds are blowing in favor of a quick pullout of combat forces." The Times quotes the opinion of historian Stanley Karnow, who disagrees with the quoted military thinkers: "We were up against an enemy that was prepared to take on unlimited losses."

US Involvement In Iraq To Exceed WWII In Length. AFP (11/23, Bernard) reports, "The US involvement in Iraq will pass another sad milestone on Sunday, when it overtakes the length of America's engagement in World War II. ... the Iraq campaign has become a symbol of the pitfalls of the new style of conflict." AFP adds, "Americans still remember Bush proclaiming on May 1, 2003 the end of 'major combat operations' in Iraq on the flight deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln aircraft carrier. Behind him was a banner stating: 'Mission Accomplished'."

USA Today (11/24, 2.27M) also reports the milestone, noting, "Veterans of that war six decades ago describe a very different experience from that of recent veterans." Texas A & M historian Brett Linn says, "Germans knew they were defeated. The Sunnis didn't think they were defeated."

Marines Hand Off Fallujah Despite "Frustration." The Christian Science Monitor (11/24, Peterson, 59K) reports on the shrinking Marine presence in Fallujah, "The marines still patrol key roads. The US military, which still travels boldly through town despite a surge in deadly sniper attacks and roadside bombs, is spending $200 million on 60-plus projects to rebuild the city, heavily damaged in fighting two years ago. But with just 300 marines, the US military footprint is smaller in this Sunni stronghold of more than 300,000 than it has been in two years. As the marine presence shrinks and Iraqis take more control, Fallujah - once a template for counterinsurgency efforts in Iraq, where US forces have controlled all the variables - is likely again to set a standard for the rest of the country." The Monitor stresses the "frustration" of the Marines, with one asking, "What other war would we allow the enemy to broadcast calls [from mosques] for our defeat?" Another complains, "In Fallujah, [insurgents] know our [rules of engagement] - they know when to stop, just before we engage." In addition, "Officers say the number of direct fire incidents against US forces has shot up 650 percent in the past year."

Iraqi Insurgents Adapt To Fight US Forces. The New York Times (11/24, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "Sunni Arab militant groups suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have established training camps east of Baghdad that are turning out well-disciplined units willing to fight American forces in set-piece battles, American military commanders said Thursday. American soldiers fought such units in a pitched battle last week in Turki ... At least 72 insurgents and two American officers ["both West Point graduates"] were killed in more than 40 hours of fighting. American commanders said they called in 12 hours of airstrikes." Officers said the insurgents showed "remarkable discipline" and "perfect military formation." The Times adds, "Insurgents were apparently able to establish a training camp after American forces moved out of the area in the fall of 2005, Colonel [Andrew] Poppas said."

Insurgents Turn To Sniping. The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Perry, 850K) reports, "When he closes his eyes, Marine Cpl. Christopher Shelhamer can feel the bullet that tore through his body when he was ambushed while on routine foot patrol outside Fallouja, Iraq. ... Ambush attempts of the type that felled Shelhamer are becoming more common, Marines say, as insurgents shift tactics away from face-to-face battles or total reliance on hidden roadside bombs. ... Other cases are classic sniper assaults — one shot, one kill — from hundreds of yards away, accomplished with high-power scopes and Chinese- or Russian-made sniper rifles." The motive of these attacks "is not to win battles but to inflict casualties, in hopes of undercutting the morale of troops in the field and the American public." Brig. Gen. Douglas Stone "believes the insurgents are switching to snipers and other ambush attacks because of the declining success of roadside bombs." Shelhamer will probably be given "medical retirement" and is "thinking of returning to school."

White House Denies Cheney Went To Iraq. USA Today/AP (11/24) reports, "The White House denied Iraqi television reports that U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney made an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Thursday. David Almacy, a White House spokesman in Washington, said Cheney was not in Iraq and that his only currently planned travel to the region is the previously announced trip he will make to Saudi Arabia on Friday." More than 80 sites carried this story.

Justice Department Collects Record Amount On Fraud Claims. The Federal Times (11/22, Castelli) reported, "The Justice Department collected a record amount of money from false claims lawsuits in fiscal 2006. Case settlements and judgments brought the government $3.1 billion from companies accused of fraud against the government. The previous record was $2.2 billion, set in 2003." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales: "These record recoveries send a clear message that the Justice Department will not tolerate fraud against the government."

WTimes Criticizes Frist, White House For Not Approving Circuit-Court Nominees. The Washington Times (11/24, 88K) editorializes, "As the 109th Congress approaches adjournment, conservatives should once again be aghast over the confirmation record of circuit-court judges. This time, however, much of the blame must be shared by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and the White House. According to data compiled by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, if no more circuit-court nominees are confirmed, the Republican-controlled Senate will adjourn leaving 16 circuit-court vacancies unfilled. Thus, the vacancies of the Frist Senate will exceed by one the number that were returned by the 107th Congress under the control of then-Majority Leader Tom Daschle and then-Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy." The Times adds, "Yes, Democrats continued to play an obstructionist role in the 109th. But they were in no position to bottle up appellate-court nominees by refusing to hold hearings for some of them or by declining to cast a committee vote after a hearing or by failing to schedule a nomination for debate on the Senate floor after a favorable committee vote was cast."

Justice Lacks Personnel To Classify Documents, Report Says. The Federal Times (11/22, Hemingway) reported, "The Justice Department doesn't have enough staff to run a program that classifies documents, a shortage that puts sensitive information at risk and limits important information-sharing among agencies, according to congressional auditors. Justice, the third largest classifier of information in the federal government, has 13 full-time positions devoted to information security, according to a Government Accountability Office report. By comparison, the fifth-largest classifier — the Energy Department — has 23 full-time positions. At Justice, one employee oversees classification training programs across the department while three employees oversee compliance at 3,500 department locations."

Gonzales Praises US As "Mature," "Moral" Leader In Air Force Academy Speech. In a press release, the Air Force Link (11/22, Wehry) reported, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told cadets here Nov. 18, that terrorists will not rise to the example of the United States. The judge addressed civil liberties and war on terrorism issues during his lecture to 700 cadets." Gonzales: "The United States has rightfully positioned itself in this conflict and other conflicts throughout history as a mature and moral leader -- an example to follow."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corruption Allegations Tarnish Germany's Image. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, A3, Esterl, 2.04M) reports, "Germany Inc. is churning with charges of corruption and deceit, threatening to undermine perceptions that the world's third-largest economy is one of the cleanest places on earth to do business. Front and center is Siemens AG, the engineering conglomerate enmeshed in a widening cross-border probe into alleged fraud and possible bribery. German prosecutors Wednesday said that they had unearthed €200 million ($257 million) in suspicious transactions after more than 200 police officers searched about 30 offices and homes of Siemens employees last week and seized 36,000 documents. … The probe comes as several other German industrial titans have been buffeted by corruption probes. Prosecutors yesterday charged a former manager of auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG for allegedly cheating the company out of €40 million. … Wednesday, the European Commission accused German utility E.On AG of tampering with evidence related to an antitrust investigation -- an accusation E.On says is unjustified." The Journal adds, "The recent wave of scandals comes nearly a decade after Germany beefed up its laws and increased sentencing guidelines to crack down on corporate corruption -- moves that included the elimination of legislation that had allowed companies to write off international bribes as expenses."

Eon Faces Fine For Alleged Evidence Violations. The Financial Times (11/23, Parker, Atkins) reported, "Eon, Germany's biggest energy group, was on Wednesday facing a possible fine of hundreds of millions of euros after a sealed room was allegedly entered overnight during a two-day raid by European Union cartel busters. The case is viewed by officials in Brussels as 'a serious violation' of rules designed to prevent a company tampering with evidence, in this case relating to an inquiry into anti-competitive abuses in the energy sector.

Bloomberg (11/22, Newman) reported, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, said in a statement that it is pursing a case against E.ON because the company 'intentionally or at least negligently' broke a seal placed on an office by regulators 'to secure documents found in the course of an unannounced inspection.'

Prosecutors Charge Former DaimlerChrysler Official. The New York Times/AP (11/24) reports, "Prosecutors said Thursday they had charged a former DaimlerChrysler AG manager with breach of trust and falsifying documents for allegedly cheating the carmaker out of 40 million euros ($52 million). The 41-year-old, who has been in investigative custody for a year, is accused of filing fake invoices between 2000 and 2005 for computer services that were never delivered, state prosecutors in Stuttgart said. … Prosecutor Bettina Fetter said investigators had seized 20 million euros ($26 million) from the manager. … The case is one of several exposing murky dealings by DaimlerChrysler employees."

Monster Fires lead Lawyer. The AP (11/22, Tong) reported, "Monster Worldwide Inc., the parent of job search site Monster.com, said Wednesday it terminated Myron Olesnyckyj, the company's lead lawyer, as part of its investigation into past stock-option grant practices. Olesnyckyj, the company's general counsel, is the second high-ranking executive to leave the company over backdated stock options. Andrew J. McKelvey resigned his posts as chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9 but at the time retained his seat on the board as chairman emeritus. He resigned fully on Oct. 30, citing an unwillingness to sit for further questions over the company's backdating practices in the past."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Crime Study To Focus On 18 Cities. The AP (11/24) reports, The government selected 18 cities and sprawling suburban regions Wednesday to study for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally. The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity _ including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault _ rising by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase in violent crimes since 2001. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study at a Boston meeting last month with police chiefs and other law enforcement officials." While newspapers in some targeted communities, including the Houston Chronicle (11/22, 530K), ran versions of the AP story that mentioned their communities in the lead, the Hartford Courant and the Charlotte Observer both offer local versions of the story paired with AP copy.

The Hartford Courant (11/24, Brown, 190K) reports, "The rise in Hartford's violent crime has caught the attention of the federal government, which plans to study why violence is increasing here and in 17 other municipalities across the country, the U.S. Justice Department said. By studying crime patterns in Hartford and elsewhere, U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said, the government hopes to shed light on why violent crime has increased in some cities and metropolitan areas and not in others." The Courant notes, "Hartford's crime rate has climbed steadily over the past two years.".

The Charlotte Observer (11/23, Weir, 219K) reported, "Charlotte was one of 18 areas around the country chosen Wednesday to be part of a government study on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally. Charlotte-Mecklenburg police welcome being part of the inquiry, said spokeswoman Julie Hill. She noted the department is always looking for clues on what is driving crime increases."

Judge Says WTimes Article Violated Espionage Trial's Grand Jury Rules. The New York Sun (11/24, Gerstein) reports, "Officials involved in investigating a California family's alleged espionage for China apparently violated grand jury secrecy rules by telling a reporter details of plans to seek a new indictment in the case, a federal judge ruled this week. Judge Cormac Carney concluded that defense lawyers were justified in their objection to a May 16 Washington Times story by William Gertz that said prosecutors were preparing to bring more serious charges against three related individuals, Chi Mak, Rebecca Chiu, and Tai Mak, who were charged initially with failing to register as agents of China." The Sun noted, "By the time that article was published, a prosecutor on the case, Gregory Staples, had already said in open court that he expected a new indictment in the case, but the details of the additional charges were not widely known."

Family To Seek Federal Investigation Of Woman's Shooting During Drug Raid. On its Web site, CNN (11/23) reported, "As family members spent Thanksgiving Day boarding up the home of a 92-year-old woman," Kathryn Johnston, "who was shot to death during a police drug raid, their spokesman said they will request a federal investigation" Rev. Markel Hutchins: "Given recent statements by Atlanta's Assistant Police Chief Alan Dreher and Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard, the family and I have serious and, we believe, founded doubt that absent intense federal oversight, a comprehensive investigation will ever ensue." He "said he planned to travel to Washington next week to hand-deliver a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office requesting a federal investigation of the incident."

Houston Woman Accused Of Filing False Katrina Claim. The Houston Chronicle (11/24, George, 530K) reports, "A Houston woman arrested this month joins 30 others in the Houston area who face federal charges for trying to collect money intended for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. An October indictment against Yolanda Yvette Thomas, 27, accused her of filing a false claim for Hurricane Katrina disaster aid, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas reported. She was arrested Nov. 6 and is free on $10,000 bail. … The indictment also accuses Thomas of falsely stating that she lost work as a result of Katrina and had an essential need for food, clothing and shelter because of the storm. If convicted, she faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Rejects Attempt To Pool Federal Vioxx Claims In One Class Action. The AP (11/27, McConnaughey) reports, "Thousands of federal lawsuits claiming the drug Vioxx caused heart attacks and other conditions that killed or injured people cannot be pooled into one national class action, a New Orleans federal judge has ruled. U.S. District Court Judge Eldon Fallon, who was appointed to deal with pretrial matters for all federal suits involving Merck & Co.'s withdrawn painkiller, did not rule on the possibility of separate class action suits for each state and the District of Columbia." His "25-page ruling rejected the plaintiffs' proposal to try all of the cases under New Jersey laws. They argued that the company should reasonably expect to follow the laws of the state where it is headquartered."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Commissioners "Stunned" At DoJ Proposal For New Elections. The Orlando Sentinel (11/23, Pino, 230K) reported, "All five Osceola County Commission seats would be up for grabs in a special election next year if a federal judge agrees with a proposal submitted Wednesday by the U.S. Department of Justice. The department sued the county last year, alleging that the current at-large system of electing commissioners dilutes the Hispanic vote. … Commissioners, who approved a proposal with five single-member and two at-large districts on Nov. 13, were stunned by the government's proposal." The Sentinel reported, "In addition to seeking elections for all five commission seats, the Justice Department's 21-page memo outlines two different single-member plans centered on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Hands In Windows Information To EU Antitrust Regulators. The AP (11/23, White) reported, "European Union regulators said Microsoft Corp. handed in on time to meet a Thursday deadline information about its Windows operating software that should help other software companies. The data will now be tested to confirm that the company has finally complied with a 2004 antitrust ruling."

Financial Times (11/24, Parker) reports, "Microsoft yesterday claimed to have met a new Brussels deadline to hand over documents to its rivals, in a move designed to head off the threat of further anti-trust fines of up to €3m ($3.9m) a day. The company said it had completed technical work on more than 100 documents, totalling 8,500 pages, in line with the Thanksgiving Day deadline set by Neelie Kroes, European Union competition commissioner, earlier this month. Ms Kroes's department said the documents would be carefully studied to ensure they provided the required information to rivals."

The AFP (11/23) reported, "If it missed the deadline, Microsoft faced the threat of daily fines of up to three million euros, which could have amounted to as much as 350 million euros (448 million dollars) and bring its total penalty to over one billion euros."

The AFX (11/23) reports, "The European Commission said it will decide on whether interface information submitted by Microsoft Corp achieves full antitrust compliance in 'months rather than weeks'. A spokesman for EU competition commissioner Neelie Kroes commented on the timing of the decision when questioned by reporters."

The Dow Jones Newswire (11/23) reported, "This represents the latest chapter in one of the most high profile, long-lasting antitrust battles. While the U.S. authorities have settled their grievances against the company, European regulators have continued to battle with the software company. In March 2004, the commission fined Microsoft a record EUR497 million, or more than $600 million, and ordered it to change some of its business practices. The company appealed that ruling at an E.U. court. The court's decision is expected next year. The commission fined Microsoft an additional EUR280.5 million in July for defying its antitrust orders."

Bloomberg (11/23, Newman, Lacqua) reported, "The commission accuses the company of abusing its 95 percent share of the personal computer software sales to crush competition in related markets. The EU levied a record 497 million-euro fine in March 2004. Microsoft is appealing the ruling and a judgment by the European Court of First Instance is expected next year."

Cable Dispute Causes Families To Miss Some Thanksgiving NFL Games. The Los Angeles Times (11/23, Stewart, Pugmire, 850K) reported, "The months-long impasse over higher fees and cable tiers comes down to this: 50 million cable television households nationwide won't be able to get tonight's game. With no ongoing talks, an 11th-hour deal seems unlikely. … The dispute has led to a nasty marketing war and even caught the attention of Congress. Time Warner, Charter — which has 374,000 customers in the L.A. market — and New York-based Cablevision are among the companies that want to put the NFL Network on a digital sports tier, which costs about $5 a month more per subscriber. NBA TV, College Sports Television (CSTV) and the Tennis Channel are among the channels already on such a premium tier. The NFL Network is demanding that it be part of the basic cable package, thus reaching more viewers."

Orbach: Prices Suggest Antitrust Violation In Movie Industry. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (11/24, E10, 690K), Steven Pearlstein cites a recent paper by Barak Orbach, a teacher at the University of Arizona law school, and Liran Einav, a Stanford University economist, as he ponders why movie theaters do not vary ticket prices for more popular movies. He writes, "What makes the persistence of uniform pricing all the more curious is that theaters actually pay widely varying fees for the licensing rights to the movies they show. The bigger the expected gross, the higher the percentage of ticket revenue that normally goes to the studio and its distributor. And the formula also includes a per-ticket fee that declines each week of the movie run. My hunch is that these pricing arrangements between the studios and the theater chains, which have always been shrouded in secrecy, are the answer to our puzzle. It is the studios that want to maintain uniform pricing because it is the theater owners who would get the most benefit from variable pricing. … Under the antitrust settlement with the Justice Department in the 1950s, this kind of 'vertical price maintenance' was supposed to be prohibited. But in their paper, Orbach and Einav suggest it may still be going strong."

Microsoft Vista Receives Favorable Rating From DoJ. The Dow Jones Newswire (11/22, Boslet, Fleetwood) reported, "Microsoft Corp.'s new Windows Vista operating system for personal computers appears to be in compliance with the company's antitrust judgment with the Department of Justice and state attorneys general, according to a report filed with a District Court judge."

ABA Sees Peril For Companies Under New EU Whistleblower Law. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, A6, 2.04M) reports, "Proposed new European Union rules for corporate whistleblowers would deal an unintended blow to international cartel-busting efforts because they don't guarantee immunity from fines, according to the American Bar Association. The procedures, intended to create a 'one-stop shop' in the 25-nation EU for companies that want to expose illegal price-fixing schemes, could also expose companies to legal jeopardy in the U.S., according to an analysis by the ABA's antitrust and international law section. … Slated for adoption next month, the EU guidelines would for the first time give out 'markers' to companies that are the first to secretly blow the whistle on fellow cartel conspirators. Such markers are offered in the U.S. to assure companies they will be first in line for immunity and not be leapfrogged by other conspirators who approach regulators at a later date."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Environmental Groups Decry Phillips Claims On Clean Air Policy. The New York Times/AP (11/24) reports, "Environmental groups are still angry over an assertion made before the Supreme Court a month ago during arguments in a far-reaching clean air lawsuit. The claim by prominent Washington lawyer Carter Phillips that the federal government had changed course in regulating emissions from coal-fired power plants is simply not true and a paper trail of the industry's own documents proves it, the groups say. … Utility industry attorney Scott Segal jumped to Phillips' defense, saying that "for these environmental groups to go after one of the best lawyers in the country is a travesty. Phillips leads a legal dream team with a spotless record.' Segal was responding to a list of questions a reporter sent to Phillips' office."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Authorities Deploy "Fotonovelas" To Battle Meth Trade Among Immigrants. The AP (11/23, Burke) reported, "Fotonovelas — pocket-sized picture books popular in Mexico — have gotten a California makeover that authorities hope persuades immigrant laborers to resist the easy-money temptation of the methamphetamine trade. Thousands in the meth-plagued Central Valley have read the bilingual graphic-novel story of Jose, a farmworker who creates tragedy for his family by working for a drug ring. 'No Vale La Pena,' or 'It's Not Worth It,' has inspired a Spanish-language docudrama, and police from Tennessee to Colorado have requested copies of both projects." The AP noted, "The Central Valley, a broad agricultural swath that runs up the middle of the state, remains a primary distribution point for meth, according to a U.S. Department of Justice report released last month."

Philadelphia: Newspaper Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on a DEA international, Internet pharmacy case, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/23, Shiffman, 385K) reported, "Now that agents know Temple grad student Akhil Bansal is Mr. Big - the brains behind the biggest global Internet pharmacy network DEA has ever seen - they call in reinforcements from Washington." This installment "begins as agents try to wiretap Akhil's e-mail. It is January 2005. … When the wiretap did work, it was fabulous. Authorities could track the suspected kingpins in real time, reading each e-mail to and from Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal and his father, Brij, a doctor in India." The Inquirer continues, "As the stakes rose - suspects on four continents, tens of thousands of U.S. customers, a pressing public-health threat - DEA and FBI agents had begun to fight over control of the case like boys in a sandbox. DEA was wary, fearing FBI's reputation for stealing cases. FBI felt frustrated because agencies such as DEA often asked for help, then resented sharing control."

Federal Drug Sentences Criticized. In the San Francisco Chronicle (11/23, 384K) Debra J. Saunders wrote, "Thanks to draconian federal drug sentences, the number of federal prisoners reached a record 193,989 on Nov. 9 -- that's a steep increase from 150,000 in 2003. The prison population is not growing because the feds are locking up drug kingpins. As the U.S. Sentencing Commission noted in a 2002 report, while the 1986 federal drug law promised to go after 'serious' and 'major' traffickers, the majority of federal cocaine offenders performed low-level functions. The percentage of biggies behind bars is shrinking, while the low-life chump class grows." Therefore, according to Saunders, President Bush "should not limit his presidential pardon power to one lucky turkey."

Medical Marijuana User In California Convicted Of Violating Federal Laws. The AP (11/23) reported a medical marijuana user "could face more than two decades in prison after a jury convicted him of violating federal drug laws and other charges. Dustin Costa…was found guilty Wednesday in Fresno federal court of growing marijuana, possession of marijuana for distribution, and possession of a firearm. … A previous U.S. Supreme Court decision prevented Costa from using the phrase "medical marijuana" or relying on a medical defense in court. … Costa said he plans to appeal the decision."

76 Arrested In International Drug Crackdown. The AP (11/23, Goodman) reported authorities in Italy, Spain, the United States, and several South American countries "arrested 76 people Wednesday as part of a major drug crackdown in which a restaurant linked to one of Colombia's most feared warlords was seized. Salvatore Mancuso…was accused by federal prosecutors of investing in an upscale Italian eatery in the Caribbean resort town of Cartagena used by the drug ring to launder profits from cocaine shipments to Europe." Police "seized assets worth upward of $35 million during raids in eight Colombian cities Wednesday. … Mancuso is wanted by a U.S. federal court on charges of being among Colombia's biggest drug traffickers. But President Alvaro Uribe has suspended his extradition order as part of a peace deal that Mancuso helped broker and which has led to the demobilization of more than 30,000 right-wing fighters."

IMMIGRATION:

Somali's Case Highlights Situation Of Deportable Somali Immigrants. The New York Times (11/22, Bernstein, 1.16M) reported that the recent deportation and repatriation of Mohama Rasheed Jama, who had "a history of petty crime," "highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate." The Times added, "Conditions in Somalia have worsened in recent months, moving to the brink of an all-out regional war. In June, Mogadishu was seized by Islamic militias suspected of harboring leaders of Al Qaeda. The militias, after routing warlords backed by the United States, began imposing a Taliban-like regime of strict religious courts. A week before his abrupt departure, Mr. Jama's volunteer lawyers filed a habeas petition on his behalf, arguing that his continued detention in the Middlesex County Jail in New Jersey was unlawful because 'it is simply beyond dispute that effecting his removal to Somalia would be impossible.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Democrats To Continue To Seek Information About Detainees. The New York Times (11/24, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "Seeking information about detention of terrorism suspects, abuse of detainees and government secrecy, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee are reviving dozens of demands for classified documents that until now have been rebuffed or ignored by the Justice Department and other agencies." Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy "expressed hope for greater cooperation from the Bush administration, which he described as having been 'obsessively secretive.'" The Times adds, "Now that they are about to control Congress, what he and other Democrats regard as a record of unresponsiveness has energized their renewal of longstanding requests for information about some of the administration's most hidden and fiercely debated operations. … In a letter last Friday," Leahy "asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to release two documents whose existence the Central Intelligence Agency, in response to a suit by the American Civil Liberties Union, recently acknowledged for the first time." The Times also notes, "With Democrats in control, it will be harder for executive branch agencies to sidestep requests for documents. Behind each request will be the possibility of Democrats' voting to issue subpoenas that would compel documents or testimony, although Senate aides said they hoped to avoid conflict." However, "[s]o far, few signs have emerged that the administration is preparing to be more responsive, even in the absence of a Republican majority's protection."

Levin To Fire "First Shot" In "Subpoena Wars." The New York Sun (11/24, Lake) reports, "The first shot in the coming subpoena wars between congressional Democrats and the Bush administration likely will be fired in January by Senator Levin, a Democrat of Michigan. The Senate Armed Services Committee's Democratic staff, soon to be in the majority, is already preparing to ask the Pentagon for documents related to analysis in the lead-up to the Iraq war from the offices reporting to a former undersecretary of defense for policy, Douglas Feith." The Sun adds, "The initial document request will test an unstated Bush administration policy to presuppose that presidential privilege would shield advice and other internal deliberations in the executive branch, and not just the White House, from congressional subpoena."

Democrats Said To Be Seeking Latin America Policy Changes. From Bogota, the Houston Chronicle (11/22, 530K) reported, "For the past six years, Democrats have accused President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress of pursuing counter-productive policies in Latin America or of ignoring the region altogether. Now, following their victories in midterm elections giving them control of the House and Senate, many Democratic lawmakers are promising subtle policy changes on immigration, trade and U.S. military aid. … Under the administration's 'Plan Colombia' policy, the U.S. has provided nearly $5 billion in mostly military aid since 2000 to fight the country's narcotics traffickers and Marxist guerrillas. … Many Democrats want to reduce military spending and use the money to boost programs to fight poverty, relocate people displaced by Colombia's 42-year civil war and encourage farmers to plant legal crops."

Future Of Trade Deal Uncertain. The Washington Post (11/23, A1, Brodzinsky, Goodman, 690K) reported Colombia's President Alvaro Uribe "has championed [a] free-trade agreement and cultivated a friendship with President Bush. The death of the deal would undermine his standing and deprive Colombia of a crucial source of livelihood -- export dollars -- as it confronts American pressure to eradicate cocaine production." The Bush administration "signed the proposed deal, but leading Democrats promptly attacked it, underscoring growing doubts in Washington that Congress will approve the pact."

Willcox, 62, who as Maryland's top federal prosecutor from 1986 to 1991 had two major espionage convictions, died Nov. 16 of cancer in Santa Paula, in Ventura County. In 1986, President Reagan nominated Willcox, a former chief of the Justice Department's government fraud branch, to be U.S. attorney for Maryland."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Imams' Removal From Plane Raises Questions Of Profiling. NBC Nightly News (11/23, story 5, 2:25, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "Six Islamic religious leader were taken off their flight to Phoenix in handcuffs after passengers reported what they thought was suspicious behavior. After since 9/11 Americans have been told, 'If you see something, say something.' But just what is the standard?" NBC (Pete Williams) added, "They were Muslim religious leaders ready to fly home from a conference. But to a man waiting for the same flight at the airport gate and who watched them pray and overheard them talking, they were something quite different. In a note he passed to the airline, he described, 'suspicious Arabic men saying Allah, Allah, and cursing US involvement in Iraq.' Dozens of US citizens who are Muslim or come from other countries say passenger suspicions often single them out because of the way they look." Reginald Shuford, ACLU: "They are simply reinforcing stereotypes, and number two, they are not doing anything really to make us any safer, only giving out the illusion that they are taking actions that make us safer." NBC (Williams) added, "US Airways, which asked the six Muslims to leave the plane this week, says it won't tolerate discrimination and is investigating. But airlines say they are obligated to take passenger concerns seriously." Steve Pomerantz, former FBI counter-terrorism official: "There simply aren't enough law enforcement people to spot all suspicious behavior, and the whole system is dependent on the concept that people will come forward and report."

Detainee Tries To Halt Heart Surgery At Guantanamo. The Los Angeles Times (11/23, Williams, 850K) reported that Saifullah Paracha, a businessman detained at Guantanamo Bay for "allegedly providing support to Al Qaeda has refused to have a heart operation at the U.S. military detention center hospital here and instead is seeking a court order for civilian treatment in the U.S. or his native Pakistan." The Times added, "The dispute over who should operate and where has spotlighted questions of medical ethics in the handling of some of the 430 terrorism suspects detained at Guantanamo. … Guantanamo officials say that their 150-person medical team is capable of performing the routine operation and that nearly $400,000 was spent flying in a 24-member team of cardiac specialists and equipment to be on hand in case of complications. But Paracha's lawyers told a U.S. district judge in Washington last week that Guantanamo doctors had left him shackled during previous examinations and treatments. Paracha's request for a court order to halt the operation at the prison was denied Monday, when Judge Paul L. Friedman said he was not convinced Paracha faced a risk of "irreparable injury" at Guantanamo."

Reno, Other Former Justice Officials Criticize Detention Policy In Amicus Brief. United Press International (11/22) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other senior Justice Department officials have criticized the Bush administration's terror detention policy. The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case of Qatar native Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a suspected al-Qaida sympathizer arrested in Illinois. In the brief, the officials suggested indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene, the Washington Post reported."

In a brief, the AP (11/22) added, "It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy. The former prosecutors on Monday challenged the department's right to bring the suspect before a military panel."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Whistleblowers Report Continued Reprisals From Superiors. USA Today (11/24, Rampell, 2.27M) reports, "Since the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the average number of employees filing whistle-blower disclosures with the government has risen 43%, from an average of 376 annually in the four years before the attacks to 537 annually after. … An increasing number of whistle-blowers allege that rather than being embraced, they're being retaliated against for coming forward. In the four years before the terrorist attacks, whistle-blowers filed an average of 690 reprisal complaints with the OSC annually. Since the attacks, an average of 835 complaints have been filed each year, a 21% increase. The number of whistle-blower reprisal complaints is higher than the number of whistle-blower disclosure complaints because employees can file reprisal complaints with the OSC even if they had not previously filed their disclosure with the OSC." USA Today notes, "Most national security whistle-blowers are not protected from retaliation by law. … Whistle-blowers employed by these agencies must seek recourse within the same agency they are blowing the whistle on. And even if the investigators within their own agency confirm reprisal allegations, the investigators have no power to remedy the situation."

Woman Was Investigated After Reporting "Shoddy" Translations Of 9/11 Material. In a separate article, USA Today (11/24, Rampell, 2.27M) reports on Sibel Edmonds, who "discovered 'shoddy' translations relevant to 9/11 created by translators who had 'failed the proficiency exams,' she says. A report by the Justice Department's inspector general subsequently confirmed that at least one translator had failed the FBI's language proficiency exams. Edmonds says the translator was sent to Guantanamo Bay to translate 'the most sensitive terrorist-related information' from interviews of detainees." USA Today notes that Edmonds "took a polygraph test and was investigated for typing her allegations … on her home computer, even though her supervisor had given permission for her to do so, the inspector general's report said." USA Today adds, "The state secrets privilege — a series of U.S. legal precedents — has been cited by the federal government at least 18 times since 9/11 and at least 81 times since the privilege was first recognized in 1953, according to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press."

Charity Says It's Not Part Of Bin Laden-Linked Sudanese Group. The AP (11/23) reported that the Missouri-based Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia, a charity "accused of being part of a terrorist organization tried to distance itself in court this week from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida. The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas." The group's attorney, Shereff hadi Akeel, "told a U.S. Court of Appeals on Monday that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said."

New Plan Would Use State Police As "Hubs" For Antiterror Network. UPI (11/24, Waterman) reports, "A new plan from the U.S. intelligence czar will use intelligence centers run by state police as the hubs for a national network of officials from different agencies and levels of government sharing information about terrorism. In a move likely to rattle privacy mavens, the three-year plan for implementing the congressionally mandated Information Sharing Environment (ISE) also lays out policies designed to ease sharing with foreign governments, and proposes to widen the definition of shareable terrorism information."

Seattle Newspaper Calls On Congress to Revise Military Commission Act. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (11/24, 124K) editorializes, "If congressional Democrats want to exercise the mandate voters gave them in the midterm elections, they'd do well to undo the injury done to civil liberties by the Military Commissions Act passed last month. The law was a controversial response to the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Bush administration using executive power to dictate treatment of so-called 'foreign combatants' at Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba. … Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, who was the defense counsel in the Supreme Court case that spurred the new law, said of the Bush administration's assertions of how detainees could be treated, 'There went the Bill of Rights.' A Democratic Congress would do well to get it back."

WAR NEWS:

Attack On Sadr City Kills At Least 160. All three networks led with the attack on Sadr City, commenting about the likelihood of a "tipping point" being reached or exceeded. ABC World News (11/23, lead story, 3:31, Vargas, 8.78M) said, "At least 160 Iraqis are dead. Another 250 hurt, in what may be the deadliest wave of sectarian violence in one day since the start of the war. It was a series of attacks. The targets were Shiite Muslims, in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City." ABC (Brown): "It started at 10 minutes past 3:00, on a busy afternoon. Three cars, each packed with 1,000 pounds of explosives, blew up in 15-minute intervals." Tony Cordesman, Center For Strategic & International Studies: "If you can get sufficient violence, you will have an open civil war. And if you have open civil war, the United States and its allies will probably be forced to leave." Lt. Charles Morton, 1st Cavalry Division: "If you're helping the Sunni, the Shi'a think you're out to kill Shi'a. So, it's a fragile situation."

CBS Evening News (11/23, lead story, 3:10, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Iraq remains on the brink of civil war." CBS (Palmer) added, "The slaughter today stunned Iraqis like never before with the tit for tat murder rate now spiraling up; many think the civil war has finally arrived."

NBC Nightly News (11/23, lead story, 3:01, Curry, 9.87M) reported, "There is high anxiety not only because of the number of casualties, but also because the targets, Shi'ites, quickly struck back." NBC (Aspell) adds, "The curfew here can't last forever. When it eases, many here feel there will be a wave of reprisal killings." Col. Jack Jacobs: "You've got warring factions, both armed, who are working extremely hard to take over control of the country. If that isn't civil war, I don't know what is."

Print sources also reported the violence. The AP (11/24, Hurst) reports, "The bloodshed underlined the impotence of the Iraqi army and police to quell determined sectarian extremists at a time when the Bush administration appears to be considering a move to accelerate the handover of security responsibilities." The transport ministry "took the highly unusual step of closing the airport and docks in the southern city of Basra, the country's main outlet to the vital shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf." A later Minneapolis Star Tribune/AP (11/24, Hurst) article updates the death toll to "at least 202."

Bush-Maliki Summit Will Go On. The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Roug, 850K) reports, "The White House said the attacks, which occurred on the anniversary of the death of the cleric for whom Sadr City is named, would not cause the [Bush-Maliki] meeting to be rescheduled." In Iraq, "Even Iraqis hardened by the relentless violence feared the scale of Thursday's attacks marked a turning point, much as the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra early this year sparked unprecedented rounds of sectarian killing."

Attacks Show Increasing Organization; Politicians Fear US Departure. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, Shishkin, 2.04M) reports that the attacks "reflected the increasing sophistication and coordination of combatants. ... As the violence deepens, one thing unites Iraqi politicians across the Sunni-Shia divide: Growing concern about increasing talk in Washington of a possible withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. Mr. Mashadani, the outspoken Sunni Parliament speaker, suggests the U.S. should have some 500,000 troops in Iraq to truly make a difference. Mr. Sagheer, the Shiite lawmaker, also says the U.S. should stay and keep training Iraqi security forces."

Ministries Become Foci Of Violence. Financial Times (11/24, Negus) reports that the attack "coincided with an assault by up to 100 gunmen on the Ministry of Health, which, like Sadr City, is a base for the Shia Mahdi Army militia loyal to the radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr." The Financial Times adds, "The health ministry assault reflects the growing tendency for ministries in Baghdad, most of which are controlled by sectarian-based parties, to be either the bases for, or the targets of, acts of violence. Sunni say that they risk kidnap and murder if they stray too near to the health ministry, and US troops in August raided the compound looking for hostages."

The New York Times (11/24, Semple, 1.16M), USA Today (11/24, Soriano, 2.27M), AFP (11/23, Karim), and Washington Post (11/24, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) all reported the bloodshed. The Post observes, "The attack occurred as Sadr's supporters were commemorating the death of his father, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, one of Iraq's most revered ayatollahs, assassinated by agents of then-President Saddam Hussein in 1999."

US Forces Turn To "Vietnam Playbook." The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Spiegel, 850K) reports in a 2,077-word article, "New tactics favored by U.S. commanders in Iraq borrow heavily from the end of another war that might seem an unlikely source for a winning strategy: Vietnam. The tactics — an influx of military advisors and a speeded-up handover to indigenous forces followed by a gradual U.S. withdrawal — resemble those in place as the U.S. effort in Vietnam reached its end." Even though the public considers Vietnam an "unwinnable war," many in the armed forces believe "Vietnam as a war actually was on its way to succeeding when the Nixon administration and Congress, bowing to public impatience, pulled the plug: first withdrawing U.S. combat forces and then blocking funding and supplies to the South Vietnamese army. ... For many in the military, the lessons of Vietnam are clear: Maintain public support, and be patient." As a result, "officers steeped in Vietnam's lessons have been brought into the Pentagon by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as part of his task force rethinking Iraq strategy." Those involved express concern that, "like the Abrams initiatives, which ran from 1968 through 1973, the current move to step up training of the Iraqi forces comes at a time when domestic support for war is on the wane and political winds are blowing in favor of a quick pullout of combat forces." The Times quotes the opinion of historian Stanley Karnow, who disagrees with the quoted military thinkers: "We were up against an enemy that was prepared to take on unlimited losses."

US Involvement In Iraq To Exceed WWII In Length. AFP (11/23, Bernard) reports, "The US involvement in Iraq will pass another sad milestone on Sunday, when it overtakes the length of America's engagement in World War II. ... the Iraq campaign has become a symbol of the pitfalls of the new style of conflict." AFP adds, "Americans still remember Bush proclaiming on May 1, 2003 the end of 'major combat operations' in Iraq on the flight deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln aircraft carrier. Behind him was a banner stating: 'Mission Accomplished'."

USA Today (11/24, 2.27M) also reports the milestone, noting, "Veterans of that war six decades ago describe a very different experience from that of recent veterans." Texas A & M historian Brett Linn says, "Germans knew they were defeated. The Sunnis didn't think they were defeated."

Marines Hand Off Fallujah Despite "Frustration." The Christian Science Monitor (11/24, Peterson, 59K) reports on the shrinking Marine presence in Fallujah, "The marines still patrol key roads. The US military, which still travels boldly through town despite a surge in deadly sniper attacks and roadside bombs, is spending $200 million on 60-plus projects to rebuild the city, heavily damaged in fighting two years ago. But with just 300 marines, the US military footprint is smaller in this Sunni stronghold of more than 300,000 than it has been in two years. As the marine presence shrinks and Iraqis take more control, Fallujah - once a template for counterinsurgency efforts in Iraq, where US forces have controlled all the variables - is likely again to set a standard for the rest of the country." The Monitor stresses the "frustration" of the Marines, with one asking, "What other war would we allow the enemy to broadcast calls [from mosques] for our defeat?" Another complains, "In Fallujah, [insurgents] know our [rules of engagement] - they know when to stop, just before we engage." In addition, "Officers say the number of direct fire incidents against US forces has shot up 650 percent in the past year."

Iraqi Insurgents Adapt To Fight US Forces. The New York Times (11/24, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "Sunni Arab militant groups suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have established training camps east of Baghdad that are turning out well-disciplined units willing to fight American forces in set-piece battles, American military commanders said Thursday. American soldiers fought such units in a pitched battle last week in Turki ... At least 72 insurgents and two American officers ["both West Point graduates"] were killed in more than 40 hours of fighting. American commanders said they called in 12 hours of airstrikes." Officers said the insurgents showed "remarkable discipline" and "perfect military formation." The Times adds, "Insurgents were apparently able to establish a training camp after American forces moved out of the area in the fall of 2005, Colonel [Andrew] Poppas said."

Insurgents Turn To Sniping. The Los Angeles Times (11/24, Perry, 850K) reports, "When he closes his eyes, Marine Cpl. Christopher Shelhamer can feel the bullet that tore through his body when he was ambushed while on routine foot patrol outside Fallouja, Iraq. ... Ambush attempts of the type that felled Shelhamer are becoming more common, Marines say, as insurgents shift tactics away from face-to-face battles or total reliance on hidden roadside bombs. ... Other cases are classic sniper assaults — one shot, one kill — from hundreds of yards away, accomplished with high-power scopes and Chinese- or Russian-made sniper rifles." The motive of these attacks "is not to win battles but to inflict casualties, in hopes of undercutting the morale of troops in the field and the American public." Brig. Gen. Douglas Stone "believes the insurgents are switching to snipers and other ambush attacks because of the declining success of roadside bombs." Shelhamer will probably be given "medical retirement" and is "thinking of returning to school."

White House Denies Cheney Went To Iraq. USA Today/AP (11/24) reports, "The White House denied Iraqi television reports that U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney made an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Thursday. David Almacy, a White House spokesman in Washington, said Cheney was not in Iraq and that his only currently planned travel to the region is the previously announced trip he will make to Saudi Arabia on Friday." More than 80 sites carried this story.

DOJ:

Justice Department Collects Record Amount On Fraud Claims. The Federal Times (11/22, Castelli) reported, "The Justice Department collected a record amount of money from false claims lawsuits in fiscal 2006. Case settlements and judgments brought the government $3.1 billion from companies accused of fraud against the government. The previous record was $2.2 billion, set in 2003." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales: "These record recoveries send a clear message that the Justice Department will not tolerate fraud against the government."

WTimes Criticizes Frist, White House For Not Approving Circuit-Court Nominees. The Washington Times (11/24, 88K) editorializes, "As the 109th Congress approaches adjournment, conservatives should once again be aghast over the confirmation record of circuit-court judges. This time, however, much of the blame must be shared by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and the White House. According to data compiled by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, if no more circuit-court nominees are confirmed, the Republican-controlled Senate will adjourn leaving 16 circuit-court vacancies unfilled. Thus, the vacancies of the Frist Senate will exceed by one the number that were returned by the 107th Congress under the control of then-Majority Leader Tom Daschle and then-Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy." The Times adds, "Yes, Democrats continued to play an obstructionist role in the 109th. But they were in no position to bottle up appellate-court nominees by refusing to hold hearings for some of them or by declining to cast a committee vote after a hearing or by failing to schedule a nomination for debate on the Senate floor after a favorable committee vote was cast."

Justice Lacks Personnel To Classify Documents, Report Says. The Federal Times (11/22, Hemingway) reported, "The Justice Department doesn't have enough staff to run a program that classifies documents, a shortage that puts sensitive information at risk and limits important information-sharing among agencies, according to congressional auditors. Justice, the third largest classifier of information in the federal government, has 13 full-time positions devoted to information security, according to a Government Accountability Office report. By comparison, the fifth-largest classifier — the Energy Department — has 23 full-time positions. At Justice, one employee oversees classification training programs across the department while three employees oversee compliance at 3,500 department locations."

Gonzales Praises US As "Mature," "Moral" Leader In Air Force Academy Speech. In a press release, the Air Force Link (11/22, Wehry) reported, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told cadets here Nov. 18, that terrorists will not rise to the example of the United States. The judge addressed civil liberties and war on terrorism issues during his lecture to 700 cadets." Gonzales: "The United States has rightfully positioned itself in this conflict and other conflicts throughout history as a mature and moral leader -- an example to follow."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corruption Allegations Tarnish Germany's Image. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, A3, Esterl, 2.04M) reports, "Germany Inc. is churning with charges of corruption and deceit, threatening to undermine perceptions that the world's third-largest economy is one of the cleanest places on earth to do business. Front and center is Siemens AG, the engineering conglomerate enmeshed in a widening cross-border probe into alleged fraud and possible bribery. German prosecutors Wednesday said that they had unearthed €200 million ($257 million) in suspicious transactions after more than 200 police officers searched about 30 offices and homes of Siemens employees last week and seized 36,000 documents. … The probe comes as several other German industrial titans have been buffeted by corruption probes. Prosecutors yesterday charged a former manager of auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG for allegedly cheating the company out of €40 million. … Wednesday, the European Commission accused German utility E.On AG of tampering with evidence related to an antitrust investigation -- an accusation E.On says is unjustified." The Journal adds, "The recent wave of scandals comes nearly a decade after Germany beefed up its laws and increased sentencing guidelines to crack down on corporate corruption -- moves that included the elimination of legislation that had allowed companies to write off international bribes as expenses."

Eon Faces Fine For Alleged Evidence Violations. The Financial Times (11/23, Parker, Atkins) reported, "Eon, Germany's biggest energy group, was on Wednesday facing a possible fine of hundreds of millions of euros after a sealed room was allegedly entered overnight during a two-day raid by European Union cartel busters. The case is viewed by officials in Brussels as 'a serious violation' of rules designed to prevent a company tampering with evidence, in this case relating to an inquiry into anti-competitive abuses in the energy sector.

Bloomberg (11/22, Newman) reported, "The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, said in a statement that it is pursing a case against E.ON because the company 'intentionally or at least negligently' broke a seal placed on an office by regulators 'to secure documents found in the course of an unannounced inspection.'

Prosecutors Charge Former DaimlerChrysler Official. The New York Times/AP (11/24) reports, "Prosecutors said Thursday they had charged a former DaimlerChrysler AG manager with breach of trust and falsifying documents for allegedly cheating the carmaker out of 40 million euros ($52 million). The 41-year-old, who has been in investigative custody for a year, is accused of filing fake invoices between 2000 and 2005 for computer services that were never delivered, state prosecutors in Stuttgart said. … Prosecutor Bettina Fetter said investigators had seized 20 million euros ($26 million) from the manager. … The case is one of several exposing murky dealings by DaimlerChrysler employees."

Monster Fires lead Lawyer. The AP (11/22, Tong) reported, "Monster Worldwide Inc., the parent of job search site Monster.com, said Wednesday it terminated Myron Olesnyckyj, the company's lead lawyer, as part of its investigation into past stock-option grant practices. Olesnyckyj, the company's general counsel, is the second high-ranking executive to leave the company over backdated stock options. Andrew J. McKelvey resigned his posts as chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9 but at the time retained his seat on the board as chairman emeritus. He resigned fully on Oct. 30, citing an unwillingness to sit for further questions over the company's backdating practices in the past."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Crime Study To Focus On 18 Cities. The AP (11/24) reports, The government selected 18 cities and sprawling suburban regions Wednesday to study for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally. The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity _ including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault _ rising by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase in violent crimes since 2001. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study at a Boston meeting last month with police chiefs and other law enforcement officials." While newspapers in some targeted communities, including the Houston Chronicle (11/22, 530K), ran versions of the AP story that mentioned their communities in the lead, the

Hartford Courant and the Charlotte Observer both offer local versions of the story paired with AP copy.

The Hartford Courant (11/24, Brown, 190K) reports, "The rise in Hartford's violent crime has caught the attention of the federal government, which plans to study why violence is increasing here and in 17 other municipalities across the country, the U.S. Justice Department said. By studying crime patterns in Hartford and elsewhere, U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said, the government hopes to shed light on why violent crime has increased in some cities and metropolitan areas and not in others." The Courant notes, "Hartford's crime rate has climbed steadily over the past two years.".

The Charlotte Observer (11/23, Weir, 219K) reported, "Charlotte was one of 18 areas around the country chosen Wednesday to be part of a government study on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally. Charlotte-Mecklenburg police welcome being part of the inquiry, said spokeswoman Julie Hill. She noted the department is always looking for clues on what is driving crime increases."

Judge Says WTimes Article Violated Espionage Trial's Grand Jury Rules. The New York Sun (11/24, Gerstein) reports, "Officials involved in investigating a California family's alleged espionage for China apparently violated grand jury secrecy rules by telling a reporter details of plans to seek a new indictment in the case, a federal judge ruled this week. Judge Cormac Carney concluded that defense lawyers were justified in their objection to a May 16 Washington Times story by William Gertz that said prosecutors were preparing to bring more serious charges against three related individuals, Chi Mak, Rebecca Chiu, and Tai Mak, who were charged initially with failing to register as agents of China." The Sun noted, "By the time that article was published, a prosecutor on the case, Gregory Staples, had already said in open court that he expected a new indictment in the case, but the details of the additional charges were not widely known."

Family To Seek Federal Investigation Of Woman's Shooting During Drug Raid. On its Web site, CNN (11/23) reported, "As family members spent Thanksgiving Day boarding up the home of a 92-year-old woman," Kathryn Johnston, "who was shot to death during a police drug raid, their spokesman said they will request a federal investigation" Rev. Markel Hutchins: "Given recent statements by Atlanta's Assistant Police Chief Alan Dreher and Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard, the family and I have serious and, we believe, founded doubt that absent intense federal oversight, a comprehensive investigation will ever ensue." He "said he planned to travel to Washington next week to hand-deliver a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office requesting a federal investigation of the incident."

Houston Woman Accused Of Filing False Katrina Claim. The Houston Chronicle (11/24, George, 530K) reports, "A Houston woman arrested this month joins 30 others in the Houston area who face federal charges for trying to collect money intended for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. An October indictment against Yolanda Yvette Thomas, 27, accused her of filing a false claim for Hurricane Katrina disaster aid, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas reported. She was arrested Nov. 6 and is free on $10,000 bail. … The indictment also accuses Thomas of falsely stating that she lost work as a result of Katrina and had an essential need for food, clothing and shelter because of the storm. If convicted, she faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Rejects Attempt To Pool Federal Vioxx Claims In One Class Action. The AP (11/27, McConnaughey) reports, "Thousands of federal lawsuits claiming the drug Vioxx caused heart attacks and other conditions that killed or injured people cannot be pooled into one national class action, a New Orleans federal judge has ruled. U.S. District Court Judge Eldon Fallon, who was appointed to deal with pretrial matters for all federal suits involving Merck & Co.'s withdrawn painkiller, did not rule on the possibility of separate class action suits for each state and the District of Columbia." His "25-page ruling rejected the plaintiffs' proposal to try all of the cases under New Jersey laws. They argued that the company should reasonably expect to follow the laws of the state where it is headquartered."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Commissioners "Stunned" At DoJ Proposal For New Elections. The Orlando Sentinel (11/23, Pino, 230K) reported, "All five Osceola County Commission seats would be up for grabs in a special election next year if a federal judge agrees with a proposal submitted Wednesday by the U.S. Department of Justice. The department sued the county last year, alleging that the current at-large system of electing commissioners dilutes the Hispanic vote. … Commissioners, who approved a proposal with five single-member and two at-large districts on Nov. 13, were stunned by the government's proposal." The Sentinel reported, "In addition to seeking elections for all five commission seats, the Justice Department's 21-page memo outlines two different single-member plans centered on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside."

DOJ_NMG_0097458

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Hands In Windows Information To EU Antitrust Regulators. The AP (11/23, White) reported, "European Union regulators said Microsoft Corp. handed in on time to meet a Thursday deadline information about its Windows operating software that should help other software companies. The data will now be tested to confirm that the company has finally complied with a 2004 antitrust ruling."

Financial Times (11/24, Parker) reports, "Microsoft yesterday claimed to have met a new Brussels deadline to hand over documents to its rivals, in a move designed to head off the threat of further anti-trust fines of up to €3m ($3.9m) a day. The company said it had completed technical work on more than 100 documents, totalling 8,500 pages, in line with the Thanksgiving Day deadline set by Neelie Kroes, European Union competition commissioner, earlier this month. Ms Kroes's department said the documents would be carefully studied to ensure they provided the required information to rivals."

The AFP (11/23) reported, "If it missed the deadline, Microsoft faced the threat of daily fines of up to three million euros, which could have amounted to as much as 350 million euros (448 million dollars) and bring its total penalty to over one billion euros."

The AFX (11/23) reports, "The European Commission said it will decide on whether interface information submitted by Microsoft Corp achieves full antitrust compliance in 'months rather than weeks'. A spokesman for EU competition commissioner Neelie Kroes commented on the timing of the decision when questioned by reporters."

The Dow Jones Newswire (11/23) reported, "This represents the latest chapter in one of the most high profile, long-lasting antitrust battles. While the U.S. authorities have settled their grievances against the company, European regulators have continued to battle with the software company. In March 2004, the commission fined Microsoft a record EUR497 million, or more than $600 million, and ordered it to change some of its business practices. The company appealed that ruling at an E.U. court. The court's decision is expected next year. The commission fined Microsoft an additional EUR280.5 million in July for defying its antitrust orders."

Bloomberg (11/23, Newman, Lacqua) reported, "The commission accuses the company of abusing its 95 percent share of the personal computer software sales to crush competition in related markets. The EU levied a record 497 million-euro fine in March 2004. Microsoft is appealing the ruling and a judgment by the European Court of First Instance is expected next year."

Cable Dispute Causes Families To Miss Some Thanksgiving NFL Games. The Los Angeles Times (11/23, Stewart, Pugmire, 850K) reported, "The months-long impasse over higher fees and cable tiers comes down to this: 50 million cable television households nationwide won't be able to get tonight's game. With no ongoing talks, an 11th-hour deal seems unlikely. … The dispute has led to a nasty marketing war and even caught the attention of Congress. Time Warner, Charter — which has 374,000 customers in the L.A. market — and New York-based Cablevision are among the companies that want to put the NFL Network on a digital sports tier, which costs about $5 a month more per subscriber. NBA TV, College Sports Television (CSTV) and the Tennis Channel are among the channels already on such a premium tier. The NFL Network is demanding that it be part of the basic cable package, thus reaching more viewers."

Orbach: Prices Suggest Antitrust Violation In Movie Industry. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (11/24, E10, 690K), Steven Pearlstein cites a recent paper by Barak Orbach, a teacher at the University of Arizona law school, and Liran Einav, a Stanford University economist, as he ponders why movie theaters do not vary ticket prices for more popular movies. He writes, "What makes the persistence of uniform pricing all the more curious is that theaters actually pay widely varying fees for the licensing rights to the movies they show. The bigger the expected gross, the higher the percentage of ticket revenue that normally goes to the studio and its distributor. And the formula also includes a per-ticket fee that declines each week of the movie run. My hunch is that these pricing arrangements between the studios and the theater chains, which have always been shrouded in secrecy, are the answer to our puzzle. It is the studios that want to maintain uniform pricing because it is the theater owners who would get the most benefit from variable pricing. … Under the antitrust settlement with the Justice Department in the 1950s, this kind of 'vertical price maintenance' was supposed to be prohibited. But in their paper, Orbach and Einav suggest it may still be going strong."

Microsoft Vista Receives Favorable Rating From DoJ. The Dow Jones Newswire (11/22, Boslet, Fleetwood) reported, "Microsoft Corp.'s new Windows Vista operating system for personal computers appears to be in compliance with the company's antitrust judgment with the Department of Justice and state attorneys general, according to a report filed with a District Court judge."

ABA Sees Peril For Companies Under New EU Whistleblower Law. The Wall Street Journal (11/24, A6, 2.04M) reports, "Proposed new European Union rules for corporate whistleblowers would deal an unintended blow to international cartel-busting efforts because they don't guarantee immunity from fines, according to the American Bar Association. The procedures, intended to create a 'one-stop shop' in the 25-nation EU for companies that want to expose illegal price-fixing schemes, could also expose companies to legal jeopardy in the U.S., according to an analysis by the ABA's antitrust and international law section. … Slated for adoption next month, the EU guidelines would for the first time give out 'markers' to companies that are the first to secretly blow the whistle on fellow cartel conspirators. Such markers are offered in the U.S. to assure companies they will be first in line for immunity and not be leapfrogged by other conspirators who approach regulators at a later date."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Environmental Groups Decry Phillips Claims On Clean Air Policy. The New York Times/AP (11/24) reports, "Environmental groups are still angry over an assertion made before the Supreme Court a month ago during arguments in a far-reaching clean air lawsuit. The claim by prominent Washington lawyer Carter Phillips that the federal government had changed course in regulating emissions from coal-fired power plants is simply not true and a paper trail of the industry's own documents proves it, the groups say. … Utility industry attorney Scott Segal jumped to Phillips' defense, saying that "for these environmental groups to go after one of the best lawyers in the country is a travesty. Phillips leads a legal dream team with a spotless record.' Segal was responding to a list of questions a reporter sent to Phillips' office."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Authorities Deploy "Fotonovelas" To Battle Meth Trade Among Immigrants. The AP (11/23, Burke) reported, "Fotonovelas — pocket-sized picture books popular in Mexico — have gotten a California makeover that authorities hope persuades immigrant laborers to resist the easy-money temptation of the methamphetamine trade. Thousands in the meth-plagued Central Valley have read the bilingual graphic-novel story of Jose, a farmworker who creates tragedy for his family by working for a drug ring. 'No Vale La Pena,' or 'It's Not Worth It,' has inspired a Spanish-language docudrama, and police from Tennessee to Colorado have requested copies of both projects." The AP noted, "The Central Valley, a broad agricultural swath that runs up the middle of the state, remains a primary distribution point for meth, according to a U.S. Department of Justice report released last month."

Philadelphia: Newspaper Highlights DEA Internet Pharmacy Investigation. In a continuing report on a DEA international, Internet pharmacy case, the Philadelphia Inquirer (11/23, Shiffman, 385K) reported, "Now that agents know Temple grad student Akhil Bansal is Mr. Big - the brains behind the biggest global Internet pharmacy network DEA has ever seen - they call in reinforcements from Washington." This installment "begins as agents try to wiretap Akhil's e-mail. It is January 2005. … When the wiretap did work, it was fabulous. Authorities could track the suspected kingpins in real time, reading each e-mail to and from Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal and his father, Brij, a doctor in India." The Inquirer continues, "As the stakes rose - suspects on four continents, tens of thousands of U.S. customers, a pressing public-health threat - DEA and FBI agents had begun to fight over control of the case like boys in a sandbox. DEA was wary, fearing FBI's reputation for stealing cases. FBI felt frustrated because agencies such as DEA often asked for help, then resented sharing control."

Federal Drug Sentences Criticized. In the San Francisco Chronicle (11/23, 384K) Debra J. Saunders wrote, "Thanks to draconian federal drug sentences, the number of federal prisoners reached a record 193,989 on Nov. 9 -- that's a steep increase from 150,000 in 2003. The prison population is not growing because the feds are locking up drug kingpins. As the U.S. Sentencing Commission noted in a 2002 report, while the 1986 federal drug law promised to go after 'serious' and 'major' traffickers, the majority of federal cocaine offenders performed low-level functions. The percentage of biggies behind bars is shrinking, while the low-life chump class grows." Therefore, according to Saunders, President Bush "should not limit his presidential pardon power to one lucky turkey."

Medical Marijuana User In California Convicted Of Violating Federal Laws. The AP (11/23) reported a medical marijuana user "could face more than two decades in prison after a jury convicted him of violating federal drug laws and other charges. Dustin Costa…was found guilty Wednesday in Fresno federal court of growing marijuana, possession of marijuana for distribution, and possession of a firearm. … A previous U.S. Supreme Court decision prevented Costa from using the phrase "medical marijuana" or relying on a medical defense in court. … Costa said he plans to appeal the decision."

DOJ_NMG_0097460

76 Arrested In International Drug Crackdown. The AP (11/23, Goodman) reported authorities in Italy, Spain, the United States, and several South American countries "arrested 76 people Wednesday as part of a major drug crackdown in which a restaurant linked to one of Colombia's most feared warlords was seized. Salvatore Mancuso…was accused by federal prosecutors of investing in an upscale Italian eatery in the Caribbean resort town of Cartagena used by the drug ring to launder profits from cocaine shipments to Europe." Police "seized assets worth upward of $35 million during raids in eight Colombian cities Wednesday. … Mancuso is wanted by a U.S. federal court on charges of being among Colombia's biggest drug traffickers. But President Alvaro Uribe has suspended his extradition order as part of a peace deal that Mancuso helped broker and which has led to the demobilization of more than 30,000 right-wing fighters."

IMMIGRATION:

Somali's Case Highlights Situation Of Deportable Somali Immigrants. The New York Times (11/22, Bernstein, 1.16M) reported that the recent deportation and repatriation of Mohama Rasheed Jama, who had "a history of petty crime," "highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate." The Times added, "Conditions in Somalia have worsened in recent months, moving to the brink of an all-out regional war. In June, Mogadishu was seized by Islamic militias suspected of harboring leaders of Al Qaeda. The militias, after routing warlords backed by the United States, began imposing a Taliban-like regime of strict religious courts. A week before his abrupt departure, Mr. Jama's volunteer lawyers filed a habeas petition on his behalf, arguing that his continued detention in the Middlesex County Jail in New Jersey was unlawful because 'it is simply beyond dispute that effecting his removal to Somalia would be impossible.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Democrats To Continue To Seek Information About Detainees. The New York Times (11/24, Johnston, 1.16M) reports, "Seeking information about detention of terrorism suspects, abuse of detainees and government secrecy, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee are reviving dozens of demands for classified documents that until now have been rebuffed or ignored by the Justice Department and other agencies." Vermont Sen. Patrick J. Leahy "expressed hope for greater cooperation from the Bush administration, which he described as having been 'obsessively secretive.'" The Times adds, "Now that they are about to control Congress, what he and other Democrats regard as a record of unresponsiveness has energized their renewal of longstanding requests for information about some of the administration's most hidden and fiercely debated operations. … In a letter last Friday," Leahy "asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to release two documents whose existence the Central Intelligence Agency, in response to a suit by the American Civil Liberties Union, recently acknowledged for the first time." The Times also notes, "With Democrats in control, it will be harder for executive branch agencies to sidestep requests for documents. Behind each request will be the possibility of Democrats' voting to issue subpoenas that would compel documents or testimony, although Senate aides said they hoped to avoid conflict." However, "[s]o far, few signs have emerged that the administration is preparing to be more responsive, even in the absence of a Republican majority's protection."

Levin To Fire "First Shot" In "Subpoena Wars." The New York Sun (11/24, Lake) reports, "The first shot in the coming subpoena wars between congressional Democrats and the Bush administration likely will be fired in January by Senator Levin, a Democrat of Michigan. The Senate Armed Services Committee's Democratic staff, soon to be in the majority, is already preparing to ask the Pentagon for documents related to analysis in the lead-up to the Iraq war from the offices reporting to a former undersecretary of defense for policy, Douglas Feith." The Sun adds, "The initial document request will test an unstated Bush administration policy to presuppose that presidential privilege would shield advice and other internal deliberations in the executive branch, and not just the White House, from congressional subpoena."

Democrats Said To Be Seeking Latin America Policy Changes. From Bogota, the Houston Chronicle (11/22, 530K) reported, "For the past six years, Democrats have accused President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress of pursuing counter-productive policies in Latin America or of ignoring the region altogether. Now, following their victories in midterm elections giving them control of the House and Senate, many Democratic lawmakers are promising subtle policy changes on immigration, trade and U.S. military aid. … Under the administration's 'Plan Colombia' policy, the U.S. has provided nearly $5 billion in mostly military aid since 2000 to fight the country's narcotics traffickers and Marxist guerrillas. … Many Democrats want to reduce military spending and use the money to boost programs to fight poverty, relocate people displaced by Colombia's 42-year civil war and encourage farmers to plant legal crops."

Future Of Trade Deal Uncertain. The Washington Post (11/23, A1, Brodzinsky, Goodman, 690K) reported Colombia's President Alvaro Uribe "has championed [a] free-trade agreement and cultivated a friendship with President Bush. The death of the deal would undermine his standing and deprive Colombia of a crucial source of livelihood -- export dollars -- as it confronts American pressure to eradicate cocaine production." The Bush administration "signed the proposed deal, but leading Democrats promptly attacked it, underscoring growing doubts in Washington that Congress will approve the pact."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guantanamo Detainee Refuses Heart Operation (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 23, 2006

Businessman wants to have the procedure away from the prison, but the military says its doctors are able to perform the surgery.

GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA — A businessman being held for allegedly providing support to Al Qaeda has refused to have a heart operation at the U.S. military detention center hospital here and instead is seeking a court order for civilian treatment in the U.S. or his native Pakistan.

The dispute over who should operate and where has spotlighted questions of medical ethics in the handling of some of the 430 terrorism suspects detained at Guantanamo.

Saifullah Paracha, a 59-year-old real estate and media mogul who lived in the United States for 16 years, was to have undergone a cardiac catheterization this week to explore the cause of recurring chest pains and two previous heart attacks.

Guantanamo officials say that their 150-person medical team is capable of performing the routine operation and that nearly $400,000 was spent flying in a 24-member team of cardiac specialists and equipment to be on hand in case of complications.

But Paracha's lawyers told a U.S. district judge in Washington last week that Guantanamo doctors had left him shackled during previous examinations and treatments. Paracha's request for a court order to halt the operation at the prison was denied Monday, when Judge Paul L. Friedman said he was not convinced Paracha faced a risk of "irreparable injury" at Guantanamo.

Friedman said that government doctors operate on prisoners throughout the U.S. correctional system, but that he was troubled by the reports that Paracha was treated with his arms and legs restrained by metal shackles.

Cardiac catheterization is a diagnostic procedure that involves inserting a thin plastic tube into a vein or artery and threading it to the heart to locate any blockages and measure blood pressure, said Capt. Ronald Sollock, commander of the U.S. Naval Hospital here.

DOJ_NMG_0097466

"We have absolutely all the expertise and equipment here to do the procedure, be it the catheterization or stent replacement or open-heart surgery," Sollock said in an interview, reiterating the assertions he submitted to Friedman through the Justice Department last week. "We would never have suggested doing it here if we didn't have every capability available."

Sollock and Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., who commands the prison and interrogation network, said Paracha's refusal to allow the surgery would be respected for now.

But, Harris said, he has a responsibility to keep the terrorism suspects in his custody alive to face war-crimes trials or testify against other prisoners. He and his predecessors in the command have previously authorized medical intervention to prevent suicides and halt hunger strikes.

The admiral said in an interview that he sees a clear ethical distinction between preventing self-inflicted harm and forcing a prisoner to have a surgical procedure he doesn't want, even if it could prove to be lifesaving.

"Can we make a detainee or a patient undergo it?" Harris said. "Today the answer to that is no if the patient doesn't want it."

Physicians for Human Rights said that any operation forced on a detainee would be an ethical violation as recognized by the military medical community as well as the American Medical Assn.

"Medicine in the military is set up to ensure that a doctor does not have to take an order that goes against basic medical ethics," said Nathaniel Raymond, a spokesman for the group.

And, Raymond said, military medical professionals at Guantanamo had "clearly violated" rules against force-feeding hunger strikers who are still conscious and capable of deciding for themselves whether to eat.

Paracha and his son are said to be key figures in the case against Majid Khan, one of 14 "high-value" detainees relocated here from secret CIA prisons in September.

Khan, according to U.S. authorities, allegedly researched poisoning U.S. reservoirs and was considered for an Al Qaeda plan to kill Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. He was captured in 2003.

Paracha has said that he lived in the United States full time from 1971 to 1987, after which he visited frequently to oversee his businesses in New York, Chicago, Washington and San Francisco.

His son, Uzair Paracha, was arrested in the United States in May 2003 and charged with aiding an Al Qaeda operative who intended to bomb U.S. targets. He was sentenced to 30 years in prison earlier this year.

In a January 2005 hearing before a U.S. military panel in Guantanamo Bay, Saifullah Paracha recounted how he was arrested at the Bangkok airport in July 2003 while on a business trip and sent to Afghanistan — where he was held until his transfer here 15 months later.

Paracha told the Combatant Status Review Tribunal that he had met Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden twice but described the encounters as news-gathering for Universal Broadcast Ltd., one of seven companies he owns.

He was informed at the tribunal that he is suspected of laundering money for Al Qaeda, plotting to smuggle explosives into the United States and recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

Pakistan's chief coordinator for human rights issues, Khawaja Khalid, told journalists in Islamabad last week that Paracha and Khan were in poor health and could die in detention if they didn't receive treatment soon.

Paracha's attorney, Gaillard T. Hunt, spoke with his client by telephone Tuesday and said that "he still thinks it is unsafe to go ahead [with the operation] at Guantanamo."

Hunt said he was preparing to appeal Friedman's ruling.

Janet Reno Speaks Out Against Detentions (UPI)

United Press International, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 (UPI) -- Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other senior Justice Department officials have criticized the Bush administration's terror detention policy.

The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case of Qatar native Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a suspected al-Qaida sympathizer arrested in Illinois.

DOJ_NMG_0097467

In the brief, the officials suggested indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene, the Washington Post reported.

Reno has kept a low profile since leaving the top job of the Justice Department in 2001, and law professor Carl Tobias of the University of Richmond said her addition to the pool was significant, as other signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years along with prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor.

"It carries more weight because these are high-ranking officials in several administrations from both parties," Tobias told the Post.

Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials have filed court papers arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system.

It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy. The former prosecutors on Monday challenged the department's right to bring the suspect before a military panel.

Staff member cleared over leaked documents

A Democratic staff member of the House Intelligence Committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, according to committee officials.

The staff member, Larry Hanauer, was suspended last month from access to classified materials by the committee's chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, a Republican from Michigan.

Hoekstra said at the time that he thought Hanauer might have been a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Hanauer had obtained a copy of the classified study at the request of a Democratic panel member, Representative John Tierney of Massachusetts, shortly before it was described in the article.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Whistle-blowers Tell Of Cost Of Conscience (USAT)

By Catherine Rampell, Usa Today

USA Today, November 24, 2006

He knew there were problems. He didn't think he was one of them.

In 2002, decorated FBI Special Agent Mike German was investigating meetings between terrorism suspects. When he discovered other officers had jeopardized the investigation by violating wiretapping regulations, he reported what he found to his supervisors, in accordance with FBI policy.

At the time, Coleen Rowley, the FBI agent who had raised concerns about how the pre-9/11 arrest of al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui was handled, was being hailed as a national hero. German says he had also just received a mass e-mail from FBI Director Robert Mueller, urging other whistle-blowers to come forward.

"I was assuming he'd protect me," German says.

DOJ_NMG_0097468

Instead, German says his accusations were ignored, his reputation ruined and his career obliterated. Although the Justice Department's inspector general confirmed German's allegations that the FBI had "mishandled and mismanaged" the terrorism investigation, he says he was barred from further undercover work and eventually compelled to resign. FBI spokesman Bill Carter declined to comment.

The experience is familiar to other government employees who have blown the whistle on matters of national security since 9/11.

Whistle-blower filings

Since the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the average number of employees filing whistle-blower disclosures with the government has risen 43%, from an average of 376 annually in the four years before the attacks to 537 annually after. The statistics are kept by the Office of the Special Counsel, an independent federal investigative agency that handles whistle-blower cases if employees prefer not to directly confront their bosses about suspicions of wrongdoing.

An increasing number of whistle-blowers allege that rather than being embraced, they're being retaliated against for coming forward.

In the four years before the terrorist attacks, whistle-blowers filed an average of 690 reprisal complaints with the OSC annually. Since the attacks, an average of 835 complaints have been filed each year, a 21% increase.

The number of whistle-blower reprisal complaints is higher than the number of whistle-blower disclosure complaints because employees can file reprisal complaints with the OSC even if they had not previously filed their disclosure with the OSC.

"The sad reality is that rather than learning lessons from 9/11, the government appears to have become more thin-skinned and sensitive," says Tom Devine, legal director of the Government Accountability Project, a non-profit group that offers legal aid to whistle-blowers.

Even advocates have begun to dissuade some government employees from coming forward.

"When I get calls from people thinking of blowing the whistle, I tell them 'Don't do it,' " says William Weaver, a professor at the University of Texas at El Paso and a senior adviser to the National Security whistle-blowers Coalition. "Most of the time they go ahead and do it anyway and end up with their lives destroyed."

Those who come forward often face harassment, investigation, character assassination and firing — not to mention the toll their whistle-blowing takes on their families, Weaver and Devine say.

Lack of protection

For those who are fired or have their security clearances revoked — tantamount to firing in the intelligence agencies — there is little recourse.

Most national security whistle-blowers are not protected from retaliation by law. That's because the intelligence-gathering agencies are exempted from the 1989 whistle-blower Protection Act, which guarantees investigations into disclosures made by federal employees and protects whistle-blowers from retaliation.

Whistle-blowers employed by these agencies must seek recourse within the same agency they are blowing the whistle on. And even if the investigators within their own agency confirm reprisal allegations, the investigators have no power to remedy the situation.

Devine says the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has ruled against whistle-blowers in 125 of 127 of the reprisal cases seen by the court since 1994. "They've gutted the law," Devine says, "and it's degenerated into a rubber stamp for retaliation."

Lawmakers recently considered two sets of legislation that would affect whistle-blowers. One attempted to extend the whistle-blower Protection Act to cover intelligence agency employees through amendments to the 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

In October, a conference committee removed the whistle-blower amendments from the final version of the bill.

The other bill that might affect whistle-blowers stiffens penalties for knowingly leaking classified information to those not authorized to receive it. That bill was introduced by Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., in response to recent leaks to the media about national security programs, says Bond's press secretary, Rob Ostrander.

DOJ_NMG_0097469

"When classified information is printed in the newspapers, it's not just Americans who read it," Ostrander says. "It's also America's enemies."

Bond's legislation would make prosecuting leakers easier by eliminating the need to prove the disclosure damaged national security. The measure would subject those who leak classified information to a fine and up to three years in prison. It would apply to those who signed a non-disclosure agreement, regardless of their job at the time of the leak.

The bill uses language identical to that in a 2000 bill — dubbed the "Official Secrets Act," after a similar British law — that was vetoed by President Clinton. It has been endorsed by the Association of Intelligence Officers, a 31-year-old group of 4,500 current and former intelligence officers.

Bond's legislation has been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. If it does not make it to a floor vote by the end of this session, he will have to resubmit it when the next session begins in January.

The National Security whistle-blowers Coalition, the Government Accountability Project and various media organizations have criticized the legislation and claimed it would deter whistle-blowers from coming forward.

Ostrander says, "There are adequate opportunities for whistle-blowers to contact superiors and the federal inspector general's office or their own representatives" without leaking classified information to outside sources.

National security whistle-blowers who have come forward since 9/11 aren't so sure.

Many had been star employees at the top of the pay scale and had spent decades in civil service before blowing the whistle. The median number of years of government service for National Security whistle-blowers Coalition members is 22 years, says Sibel Edmonds, an FBI whistle-blower who founded the coalition. Edmonds and others worry that fear of committing career suicide may dissuade others from coming forward.

"I'm one of the last people who survived," says Rowley, the former FBI whistle-blower and Time magazine "Person of the Year" who recently lost her bid for a U.S. congressional seat in Minnesota. She says widespread, favorable media coverage saved her FBI career

"But is that the important story here — that one person in the country has been fired or is not being used to their fullest potential?" she asks. "It's the country that's going to suffer from a lack of whistle-blower protections."

'State Secrets Privilege' Blocks Fired Translator From Suing FBI (USAT)

By Catherine Rampell, Usa Today

USA Today, November 24, 2006

Sibel Edmonds, who formed the 100-plus member National Security whistle-blowers Coalition in 2002, began working as a linguist for the FBI the week after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack.

Several months into her contract, she discovered "shoddy" translations relevant to 9/11 created by translators who had "failed the proficiency exams," she says.

A report by the Justice Department's inspector general subsequently confirmed that at least one translator had failed the FBI's language proficiency exams. Edmonds says the translator was sent to Guantanamo Bay to translate "the most sensitive terrorist-related information" from interviews of detainees.

Edmonds also notified her superiors that a co-worker was responsible for translating wiretaps of a company the latter used to work for. The co-worker "was blocking the intelligence coming from her family members and friends," Edmonds says.

Edmonds took a polygraph test and was investigated for typing her allegations — which contained classified information — on her home computer, even though her supervisor had given permission for her to do so, the inspector general's report said.

The Middle Eastern language specialist was fired in March 2002. When Edmonds asked why, she received a letter saying her contract had been "terminated completely for the government's convenience," according to legal briefings her lawyers filed in the lawsuit contesting her firing.

In its final report, the inspector general concluded that "we believe that many of (Edmonds') allegations were supported, that the FBI did not take them seriously enough, and that her allegations were, in fact, the most significant factor in the FBI's decision to terminate her services."

DOJ_NMG_0097470

The same month the report was released, Edmonds' lawsuit to contest her firing was dismissed. Legal briefs show the government had invoked the so-called state secrets privilege, arguing that the lawsuit would jeopardize national security.

The state secrets privilege — a series of U.S. legal precedents — has been cited by the federal government at least 18 times since 9/11 and at least 81 times since the privilege was first recognized in 1953, according to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

"Instead of protecting and standing up for whistle-blowers, this is just giving the complete green light to retaliate," says Edmonds, who lost her appeal.

FBI spokesperson Bill Carter declined to comment, citing privacy concerns.

Missouri Group Denies Terrorist Connections (AP)

AP, November 23, 2006

WASHINGTON | A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of a terrorist organization tried to distance itself in court this week from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida.

The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas.

The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money.

Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told a U.S. Court of Appeals on Monday that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said.

If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said, the charity sought U.S. permission.

A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday.

The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group.

Akeel said that in the world of aid organizations, charities in the United States frequently became partners with groups in impoverished areas.

The judges heard public and classified testimony Monday and did not rule on the case.

State Police Eyed As Hubs Of Terrorism Data Network (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

UPI, November 24, 2006

A new plan from the U.S. intelligence czar will use intelligence centers run by state police as the hubs for a national network of officials from different agencies and levels of government sharing information about terrorism.

In a move likely to rattle privacy mavens, the three-year plan for implementing the congressionally mandated Information Sharing Environment (ISE) also lays out policies designed to ease sharing with foreign governments, and proposes to widen the definition of shareable terrorism information.

The plan "provides a road map for the successful implementation of the ISE, and responds to the recommendations of the September 11 commission," said Thomas McNamara, program manager for the ISE in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Enacted as part of the 2004 intelligence reform law, ISE tried to create a seamless "network of networks" connecting officials -- and the terrorism-related information to which they have access -- by changing rules across the increasing number of federal, state and local agencies whose mission includes protecting the United States from terrorism.

Mr. McNamara said the aim was to create "a virtual interstate system," and that the law-enforcement "fusion" centers being set up in states and large municipalities would be the "nodes where information can be processed, condensed and evaluated."

DOJ_NMG_0097471

But such information includes personal data about Americans held by government agencies. In the wake of revelations that a Pentagon terrorist threat database contained reports about lawful anti-war protests, questions continue to be raised about the civil liberties and privacy implications of the seamless sharing of information envisaged by the ISE.

John Rollins, an analyst with the Congressional Research Service who formerly worked on information-sharing issues at the Department of Homeland Security, said concerns have been raised about regulations affecting the fusion centers.

He said federal regulations already governed the centers' state and local databases, but it was not clear how much oversight the Justice Department planned to do.

Mr. McNamara argues that the new system will strengthen civil liberties and privacy "if it is done right."

"There is already information sharing going on," he said, adding that ISE systems could add oversight capabilities that would "track, audit and monitor the use of the system" to prevent abuse.

Two contentious areas on which his plan proposes to proceed are the sharing of information with foreign governments and private-sector firms.

The plan says that federal departments and agencies should begin to ensure that their so-called "systems of records" notices and routine disclosures required by the Privacy Act "provide for terrorism information sharing with foreign partners."

It also calls for information sharing with the private sector that is "likely to entail issues requiring executive level decisions or legislative changes."

Mr. Rollins called the plan "a good start" but said that more than five years after September 11, "all we have is a plan. ... The real hard work starts now."

Civil Liberties: New Law Needs Fix (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 24, 2006

If congressional Democrats want to exercise the mandate voters gave them in the midterm elections, they'd do well to undo the injury done to civil liberties by the Military Commissions Act passed last month.

The law was a controversial response to the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Bush administration using executive power to dictate treatment of so-called "foreign combatants" at Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba.

The law, in essence, codified the Bush administration's evisceration of the Constitution.

Among other things, the law tossed out the time-honored right to challenge in court the legality of one's detention, known as habeas corpus.

Now the Bush administration is claiming in federal court that, under the new law, even immigrants arrested in the United States can be held indefinitely on suspicion of terrorism and may not challenge their detention in civil courts. Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials have challenged the administration's position in the case.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, who was the defense counsel in the Supreme Court case that spurred the new law, said of the Bush administration's assertions of how detainees could be treated, "There went the Bill of Rights."

A Democratic Congress would do well to get it back.

Attack On Baghdad Shiite Slum Kills 161 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst,

AP, November 24, 2006

Sunni Muslim insurgents blew up five car bombs and fired mortars into Baghdad's largest Shiite district Thursday, killing at least 161 people and wounding 257 in a dramatic attack that sent the U.S. ambassador racing to meet with Iraqi leaders in an effort to contain the growing sectarian war.

DOJ_NMG_0097472

Shiite mortar teams quickly retaliated, firing 10 shells at Sunni Islam's most important shrine in Baghdad, badly damaging the Abu Hanifa mosque and killing one person. Eight more rounds slammed down near the offices of the Association of Muslim Scholars, the top Sunni Muslim organization in Iraq, setting nearby houses on fire.

Two other mortar barrages on Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad killed nine and wounded 21, police said late Thursday.

The bloodshed underlined the impotence of the Iraqi army and police to quell determined sectarian extremists at a time when the Bush administration appears to be considering a move to accelerate the hand-over of security responsibilities. President Bush plans to visit the region next week to discuss the security situation with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We condemn such acts of senseless violence that are clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq," said Jeanie Mamo, a White House spokeswoman.

On Friday, about 300 mourners chanted as they beat their chests while walking through the Sadr City slum alongside slow-moving the cars and minivans carrying 16 wooden caskets tied to the rooftops.

Once the processions reached the edge of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, the cars and minivans left most of the mourners behind for the 100-mile drive south to Najaf, a treacherous journey that passes through many checkpoints and areas controlled by Sunni militants in Iraq's so-called "Triangle of Death."

Iraq's government imposed a curfew in the capital and also closed the international airport. The transport ministry then took the highly unusual step of closing the airport and docks in the southern city of Basra, the country's main outlet to the vital shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf.

Leaders from Iraq's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities issued a televised appeal for calm after a hastily organized meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad. The U.S. Embassy said it had nothing to report about the session.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, also went on state TV and blamed Sunni radicals and followers of Saddam Hussein for the attacks on Sadr City — the deadliest on a sectarian enclave since the war began.

The coordinated car bombings — three by suicide drivers and two of parked cars — billowed black smoke up into clouds hanging low over blood-smeared streets jammed with twisted and charred cars and buses.

Hospital corridors and waiting rooms were awash in blood and mangled survivors of bombs that struck at 15-minute intervals in the sprawling Shiite slum, which is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia of radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a key al-Maliki backer.

The militia and associated death squads are believed responsible for the slayings of hundreds of Sunnis since suspected al-Qaida in Iraq militants bombed a revered Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra last February.

That attack set off a surge of retaliatory killings between Shiites and Sunnis that have raged all year.

Al-Sadr associates, speaking to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information, said the cleric feared that the Sadr City bombings would make it impossible for him to hold back his heavily armed fighters from a furious round of revenge attacks.

In a television statement read by an aide, al-Sadr urged unity among his followers to end the U.S. "occupation" that he said is causing Iraq's strife. Al-Sadr said the attacks coincided with the seventh anniversary of the assassination of his father, Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, a revered Shiite religious leader. The anniversary reckoning was by the Islamic calendar.

"Had the late al-Sadr been among you he would have said preserve your unity," the statement said. "Don't carry out any act before you ask the Hawza (Shiite seminary in Najaf). Be the ones who are unjustly treated and not the ones who treat others unjustly."

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the pre-eminent Shiite religious figure in Iraq, condemned the bombings and issued condolences to family members of those who were killed. He called for self-control among his followers.

Iraq is suffering through a period of unparalleled violence. The United Nations said Wednesday that 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October, the most in any month since the war began 44 months ago, and a figure certain to be eclipsed in November.

DOJ_NMG_0097473

The Sadr City slaughter occurred just moments after U.S. helicopters and Iraqi armor had to intervene to stop an attack by 30 masked Sunni gunmen who tried to storm the Shiite-dominated Health Ministry, about a mile west of the Shiite slum. Seven ministry guards were wounded.

Residents also reported heavy mortar fire and gunbattles in Hurriyah, a now-largely Shiite neighborhood in northwest Baghdad. There were pitched battles between gunmen and the army on Haifa Street, a dangerous thoroughfare running north from the Green Zone, site of the American and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government and parliament.

Iraqis also reported heavy fighting around the Jadriyah Bridge near Baghdad University and AP personnel saw 12 pickup trucks loaded with men armed with rocket-propelled grenade launchers and heavy machine guns driving through the center of the city.

Counting those killed in Sadr City, at least 233 people died or were found dead across Iraq on Thursday.

Before dawn Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi forces searching for a kidnapped American soldier swept through an area of Sadr City, killing four Iraqis, wounding eight and detaining five, police said.

The raid was the fourth time in six days that coalition forces raided the district looking for U.S. soldier Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old Ann Arbor, Mich., resident who was snatched from the street while he was visiting his Iraqi wife in Baghdad on Oct. 23.

The Mahdi Army is believed to have grabbed al-Taayie as well as dozens of people during a raid on a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad on Nov. 14. The ministry is predominantly Sunni Arab.

During the 4:30 a.m. raid coalition forces searched houses and opened fire on a minivan carrying Iraqi workers in al-Fallah Street, killing four and wounding eight, said police Capt. Mohammed Ismail. He said coalition forces also detained five Iraqis.

In a statement, the U.S. military confirmed the raid and said it was part of the effort to find al-Taayie. It confirmed the detention of five Iraqis and said a vehicle was shot at by Iraqi troops after "displaying hostile intent." The statement did not report Iraqi casualties.

The military also reported that three Marines were killed during combat in Anbar province, where many Sunni-Arab insurgents are based. That raised the U.S. death toll so far this month to 52.

Baghdad Attack Death Toll Rises To 202 (AP)

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - Sunni Muslim insurgents blew up five car bombs and fired mortars into Baghdad's largest Shiite district Thursday, killing at least 202 people and wounding 252 in a dramatic attack that sent the U.S. ambassador racing to meet with Iraqi leaders in an effort to contain the growing sectarian war.

The death toll, released by Rahim Qassim, a Health Ministry official in Sadr City, and police Col. Death toll is at least 152 in a Shiite district of the capital. Bush and Maliki will meet in Jordan as planned.

BAGHDAD — A series of fiery suicide car bombings killed at least 152 people and wounded 236 others Thursday in the deadliest sectarian attack in Baghdad since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

The explosions in the Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Sadr City followed a highly coordinated militant assault on the Shiite-controlled Health Ministry complex, and they were met with almost immediate reprisal attacks in Sunni Arab Muslim neighborhoods that killed at least nine people. Other bombings and shootings killed 18 people in and around the capital, making for one of the deadliest days in Iraq's sectarian war.

The sound of mortar shelling and gunfire echoed throughout the night in the capital, where an open-ended curfew was imposed. The government closed the airport, and the nation's top clerics and political leaders appealed for calm.

The intensified violence came just days before President Bush is to meet with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki in Jordan to discuss the rapidly deteriorating security situation. The White House said the attacks, which occurred on the anniversary of the death of the cleric for whom Sadr City is named, would not cause the meeting to be rescheduled.

Starting about 3 p.m., three suicide bombers blew up their cars minutes apart, incinerating commuters inside their vehicles, shredding market stalls and streaking streets with blood, witnesses and police said. Bodies, some of them on fire, lay twisted in the dust.

A couple of inches separated life and death on this afternoon.

Saif Murtadha, 17, a falafel seller, was shielded from shrapnel by a car and escaped unharmed. A man standing near his cart was less fortunate, Murtadha said, and was wounded by the flying debris.

Wedding photographer Ali Hadid, 30, watched through the lens of his video camera as one of the bombs tore through a crowd of revelers, turning the nuptial celebration into a scene of death and despair. He lost six friends, he said.

Witnesses said the first bomb went off near a traffic-control point and ignited a fuel truck, setting off a chain reaction as cars erupted in flames.

"I felt it in my body more than in my ears," said Saad Umran, a 45-year-old grocery shop owner. "Many, many people died. The only thing we could do was cover the dead bodies with blankets."

Fifteen minutes later, he heard the second bomb explode less than a mile away. There, standing at a takeout restaurant, Naeem Jassim, 34, watched as the explosion seared the flesh of bystanders and turned cars into burning wrecks.

"Police and medics were in shock," he said. "They were looking at the dead people. They didn't know what to do or where to start."

DOJ_NMG_0097476

At 3:35 p.m., the third bomb killed Shiites who had sought refuge from the civil war in a temporary housing complex.

After that explosion, police sealed off entrances to Sadr City, and a fourth car bomb detonated outside its gates. A fifth apparently failed to go off and was defused by authorities.

Doctors were overwhelmed by the carnage. At a hospital, dozens of injured lay on the bloodied floors, unattended. As space ran out in the hospital morgue, workers loaded bodies into refrigerated trucks normally used to transport food.

At Imam Ali Hospital in Sadr City, at least 20 relatives and friends mourned the death of Hussam Jassim, a 17-year-old grocery clerk.

"He was always making me laugh," said his cousin, Ali Khali. "I can't believe he is dead."

After the bombings, bystanders pulled a burned corpse from a smoldering bus as angry young men held their handguns and AK-47s high, vowing revenge. Others, standing amid smoking vehicles, cursed U.S. forces and the Iraqi government, saying they had failed to provide security. Some had harsh words for the Sunnis.

"They are killing us to secure their chairs!" one man yelled, referring to Sunni political ambitions. "May God curse the Sunnis and Adnan Dulaimi," another said, referring to a leading politician.

Al Furat, a conservative Shiite television channel, replayed images of the devastation in a slow-motion loop overlaid with religious music: "Our blood, our blood," a popular singer chanted.

Even Iraqis hardened by the relentless violence feared the scale of Thursday's attacks marked a turning point, much as the bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra early this year sparked unprecedented rounds of sectarian killing.

"This is a huge escalation and a bad omen," said Jamal Samarra, a Sunni professor of political science at Mustansiriya University. "The situation provokes anxiety and fear. One must be careful, careful, careful."

The Iraqi Islamic Party, the biggest Sunni political group, said that after the Sadr City attacks, 17 mortar rounds hit Sunni neighborhoods. It was unclear whether anyone was killed in the attacks.

The Associated Press reported that separate mortar barrages in west Baghdad killed nine people and wounded 21.

Appearing on national television after the bombings, Maliki said he blamed politicians for provoking civil war. "We condemn these sectarian practices which aim to fragment the unity of the nation," he said.

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, appeared on TV with Sunni Vice President Tariq Hashimi and Abdelaziz Hakim, the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in parliament. "We appeal to everybody to show self-restraint," Hashimi read from a joint statement.

Shiite clerics Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani and Muqtada Sadr urged followers not to retaliate.

An influential Shiite lawmaker, Qusai Abdul-Wahab, said the bloodshed showed that U.S. forces were unable to protect Iraqis and should leave. "What happened today highlights that the Iraqi security forces must take control," he said.

Sadr City is named for Muqtada Sadr's father, a revered cleric believed to have been killed by Saddam Hussein's forces. The slum is home to the country's largest Shiite militia, which is loyal to the younger Sadr.

The attacks were the deadliest since 181 people were killed in coordinated explosions in Baghdad and Karbala in March 2004.

The day's violence began around noon, when mortar rounds pummeled the Health Ministry complex. At least 30 heavily armed militants then surrounded the government building, trapping about 2,000 administrators and officials inside. In a dramatic live interview with an Iraqi TV station, Deputy Health Minister Hakim Zamili charged that Iraqi soldiers stood by while gunmen attacked.

"We can see the terrorists through the windows, moving freely," Zamili said. "Nobody is stopping them."

Later, ministry spokesman Qasim Yahia Allawi said Iraqi soldiers had not responded to calls for help during the three-hour standoff between gunmen and ministry guards. Eventually the assailants scattered when U.S. helicopters arrived, he said.

"We're not provoked by such operations," said Sheik Jaladin Sahir, a spokesman for the ruling Shiite bloc, referring to the attacks. "The political process must continue. Terrorism must be defeated."

But he added, "If the situation continues in this manner, I think the street will explode."

Deadly Iraq Attacks Underscore Militants' Growing Organization (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Underscoring the increasingly organized and brutal nature of sectarian violence here, at least 160 people were reported killed and hundreds more injured in the deadliest attacks on civilians in Baghdad since the U.S. invasion in March 2003.

Yesterday's attacks -- a wave of car bombings in a Shiite Muslim area of Baghdad that were followed almost immediately by mortar attacks on Sunni Muslim neighborhoods -- seemed likely to push Iraq further into civil war and to complicate U.S. efforts to bring stability to the country. The attacks also reflected the increasing sophistication and coordination of combatants.

The worst damage came in the teeming Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City, a stronghold of one of the country's most feared Shiite militias. The Associated Press said at least 160 were left dead by what the U.S. military said were five car bombs and two mortar rounds. The attacks came after a siege against the headquarters of the Shiite-run Health Ministry in northern Baghdad, which was fended off by Iraqi troops and U.S. helicopters.

Shortly afterward, in an apparent revenge attack, militants fired scores of mortars aimed at the overwhelmingly Sunni neighborhood of Adamya, home to one of the holiest Sunni mosques in Baghdad. Several mortar rounds also hit the Association of Muslim Scholars, a hard-line Sunni group in Baghdad. The Interior Ministry imposed an indefinite curfew on vehicles and pedestrians.

With Iraqi security forces widely viewed as inefficient or tainted by sectarianism themselves, many Iraqis still look to the U.S. for protection. But despite stepped-up patrols and security sweeps in Baghdad in recent months, U.S. forces and their Iraqi counterparts have been unable to stem sectarian violence, raising questions of what kind of a security strategy can succeed in stopping what many Iraqis now openly call a civil war.

While the Bush administration has resisted using that term to describe the violence, military leaders have been steadily ringing alarm bells about the worsening sectarian strife. In early August, Gen. John Abizaid, top commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, described the situation this way: "I believe that the sectarian violence is probably as bad as I've seen it, in Baghdad in particular, and that if not stopped, it is possible that Iraq could move towards civil war." The situation has worsened since then.

U.S. forces didn't deploy to Sadr City yesterday, instead leaving the area to Iraqi security forces and armed Shiite militiamen. Top Iraqi politicians, including President Jalal Talabani, held an emergency meeting and issued a statement calling for "a revision of the government's existing security plans for Baghdad to better protect innocent civilians."

Iraqi television showed mangled bodies, charred cars and plumes of smoke and fire in Sadr City. Angry crowds gathered on the streets of the poor Shiite district, with people shouting and brandishing weapons in the air.

Fearing a reprisal from Shiite militias roaming the city, Sunnis across Baghdad hurried home. The ensuing mortar attacks in Adamya left several civilians dead, though the exact death toll remained unclear. "It's very sad to watch such a huge number of civilians, of women and children, who went to the market and died," said Raad Nabil, a 24-year-old Sunni university student, of the Sadr City attack. "The cheapest thing in this country now is human life. It will be another spark for the civil war."

The carnage broadens the sectarian warfare between Sunnis, a minority population but one that dominated the ranks of Saddam Hussein's government, and Shiites, the majority of the population, who often were marginalized by the former regime.

Fighting between Shiite and Sunni militias broke out in earnest after insurgents -- presumed to be Sunnis -- destroyed a landmark Shiite shrine in Samarra in February. Afterward, Shiite militias, often operating from within Iraq's security forces, went on a spree of gruesome killings and torture of Sunnis. The Sunni insurgents ratcheted up attacks against Shiite civilians, alongside their older fight against the U.S. occupation.

The new Shiite-dominated government, which took office in May, has failed either to disarm the Shiite militias or defuse the Sunni insurgency. Both sides instead have grown more recalcitrant and brazen in the ferocity of their attacks.

On Wednesday, the United Nations said 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October, the single deadliest monthly toll since the U.S.-led invasion. "Hundreds of bodies continued to appear in different areas of Baghdad -- handcuffed, blindfolded and bearing signs of torture and execution-style killing," the U.N. said. It attributed much of the violence to sectarian warfare.

The main battleground of this war is Baghdad, a city of some five million where Sunnis and Shiites have long lived in mixed neighborhoods. "If the government doesn't control Baghdad, it will lose this war," says Mahmoud Mashadani, the Sunni speaker of Iraq's Parliament.

The Parliament itself -- dominated by Shiite political parties that were the big winners of last year's elections -- has grown increasingly polarized. Lawmakers trade insults and often divide along sectarian lines on key points of national policy. "The Parliament represents the streets," says Jalaladdin al-Sagheer, an influential Shiite lawmaker. "We have a conflict on the streets, so it's the same inside the Parliament."

After receiving word of the car bombings in Sadr City on his mobile phone, Mr. Sagheer had little doubt as to what would come next: "Of course the Mehdi army will take revenge." The Mehdi army, a powerful Shiite militia that follows radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, has been a constant fixture of the Iraq war, turning its weapons twice against the Americans and more recently focusing on sectarian attacks against Sunnis.

Despite its promises to crack down on the Mehdi army and other Shiite militias linked to powerful political parties, the Iraqi government has achieved little success. Ordinary Iraqis have largely despaired in their government, seen as weak and protected from the real Iraq by the fortified walls and checkpoints of the Green Zone, the large, U.S.-protected enclave in the center of the city.

As the violence deepens, one thing unites Iraqi politicians across the Sunni-Shia divide: Growing concern about increasing talk in Washington of a possible withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. Mr. Mashadani, the outspoken Sunni Parliament speaker, suggests the U.S. should have some 500,000 troops in Iraq to truly make a difference. Mr. Sagheer, the Shiite lawmaker, also says the U.S. should stay and keep training Iraqi security forces.

Suicide Attacks On Baghdad Shia Kill 160 (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent

Financial Times, November 24, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0097479

In what may be the single deadliest attack in Iraq since the 2003 US-led invasion, at least 154 people were killed on Thursday in a series of coordinated suicide car bomb attacks in the crowded east Baghdad slum of Sadr City.

According to police sources quoted by wire agencies, at least 257 people were also injured in the bombings, which may escalate Iraq's cycle of violence. They may also harden sectarian attitudes and disrupt efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to oust militia-affiliated ministers from his Shia-dominated government.

The attacks coincided with the Thanksgiving holiday in the US. Mr Maliki is scheduled to meet US president George W Bush next week to discuss how to quell the sectarian violence that saw more than 3,000 civilians killed last month alone.

Police said that at least three car bombers blew up their vehicles at 15 minute intervals in three markets and squares in the city while mortar rounds landed nearby. The attack coincided with an assault by up to 100 gunmen on the Ministry of Health, like Sadr City a base for the Shia Mahdi Army militia loyal to the radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

The assault on the health ministry appeared to be an unusually large-scale operation for a central area of the capital.

Ministry sources said that attackers started the siege with a mortar barrage before opening up with small arms fire from surrounding buildings. Thousands of employees were trapped inside during the attack, which ended when US helicopter gunships and ground forces drove off the attackers.

Iraqi officials complained that Iraqi military forces in the area did not respond quickly enough to the assault.

Both attacks seemed aimed at the radical Shia Sadrist movement, whom Sunnis blame for murder and torture of their co-religionists. The sprawling slum is home to up to 2m people.

The health ministry assault reflects the growing tendency for ministries in Baghdad, most of which are controlled by sectarian-based parties, to be either the bases for, or the targets of, acts of violence.

Sunni say that they risk kidnap and murder if they stray too near to the health ministry, and US troops in August raided the compound looking for hostages. The attacks follow last week's raid on a research institute run by the ministry of higher education – which is in turn contolled by the Sunni-dominated Iraqi Islamic Party – in which dozens were abducted.

Thursday's bloodshed will almost certainly trigger reprisals. Within hours mortar rounds were reported to have been launched from Sadr City aimed at the Abu Hanifa mosque in the predominantly Sunni district of Adhamiya.

Iraqi state television reported that the interior ministry imposed an indefinite curfew on the city after the day's violence.

The attacks came as Mr Maliki plans a reshuffle of his cabinet, which some government sources say is aimed at removing Sadrist ministers who abuse their position as well as partisan Sunnis. Neither side may be in much mood for compromise, however, after this recent round of violence.

The death toll may still rise, and already exceeds the single worst blast in Iraq's postwar history, a February 2005 car bomb in the southern Iraqi city of Hilla which killed 125. It may also exceed a pair of apparently coordinated attacks on Shia religious commemorations in Baghdad and the holy city of Karbala, which killed at least 170.

Bombings Kill 144 In Baghdad Slum; Siege At Ministry (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 23 — In the deadliest sectarian attack in Baghdad since the American-led invasion, explosions from five powerful car bombs and a mortar shell tore through crowded intersections and marketplaces in the teeming Shiite district of Sadr City on Thursday afternoon, killing at least 144 people and wounding 206, the police said.

The coordinated bombings followed a two-hour siege by dozens of Sunni Arab insurgents against the headquarters of the Shiite-run Health Ministry in northeastern Baghdad, about three miles west of Sadr City, according to ministry officials. The gunmen, shooting from nearby buildings and surrounding streets, pelted the ministry with mortar shells and gunfire, though they fled when Iraqi troops and American military helicopters arrived, the officials and witnesses said.

The attacks were the worst in an intensifying series of revenge killings in recent months, in a cycle that has increasingly paralyzed the political process and segregated the capital into Sunni and Shiite enclaves, and threatened to drag Iraq into an all-out civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0097480

Shiite revenge was swift. Shiite fighters fired about a dozen mortar shells into the predominantly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Adhamiya in northern Baghdad, wounding at least 10 people, an Interior Ministry official said. Five more mortar shells were aimed at the former Mother of All Battles Mosque commissioned by Saddam Hussein in Ghazaliya, according to the mosque's imam, Sheik Mahmoud al-Sumaidaie.

Political leaders held an emergency meeting after the attacks and later appeared together, Sunni, Shiite and Kurd, to broadcast an appeal for calm and national unity. Top clerics sent similar messages.

"In this painful tragedy, I call on everybody to practice self-restraint and stay calm," Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki said in a separate televised address. "I hope that all political and civic powers will stand together to protect the citizens from criminal action."

The government imposed an indefinite curfew on the capital, banning all vehicles and pedestrians from the streets, and closed Baghdad International Airport as well as the airport and seaport in the southern city of Basra. The Iraqi military command put the army on high alert, beefed up checkpoints throughout the city and established a cordon around Sadr City, according to an Iraqi military spokesman.

The authorities seemed intent on avoiding a repeat of the violent fallout that followed the bombing of a major Shiite shrine in Samarra in late February. That attack set off the eruption of sectarian killings, which has gathered momentum during the year and has spun well beyond the control of Iraqi and American security forces.

The attacks on Thursday came at a critical time for the Iraqi and American governments, which have been struggling to figure out a political and military formula to curb the violence.

American and Sunni Arab officials have argued that a key to peace rests with the aggressive demobilization of the Shiite militias tied to the most powerful Shiite political parties. But Shiite leaders have insisted that the militias remain their final bulwark against the Sunni Arab-led insurgency. And Mr. Maliki, responding to his power base, has chosen a softer, negotiated approach to the militias, frustrating his American partners.

Thursday's bombings will probably harden the Shiites' position on militias and further complicate diplomacy between Mr. Maliki and President Bush, who are scheduled to meet in Amman next Wednesday to discuss strategies for stabilizing Iraq.

"We blame the government for the attacks," said Said Adel al-Nuri, a representative of the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, echoing the general sentiment of frustration and anger in the working-class district, which has more than two million people. "We have no trust in the government or in the Americans. We have completely lost faith in the government."

According to the police, the Sadr City assault began when a suicide car bomber blew himself up at about 3:15 p.m. at a checkpoint leading into the neighborhood. That blast was followed in quick succession by that of two other suicide car bombers and two unattended car bombs, which exploded at different locations along a main avenue crowded with commuters and shoppers, witnesses said. At least one mortar shell exploded in the neighborhood, the police said, and a sixth car bomb was discovered and defused.

The car bombings destroyed dozens of other vehicles, scattered charred and mangled bodies and sent flames and thick pillars of smoke into the air. Frenzied crowds clawed through the wreckage, pulling bloodied bodies from cars and minibuses and moving them out in wooden carts.

Residents and Shiite militiamen flooded the streets, firing assault rifles into the air, shouting epithets against Sunni Arabs, the American authorities and the Iraqi government, and vowing revenge. Gunmen of the Mahdi Army, the militia loyal to Mr. Sadr, commandeered the district, setting up roadblocks and searching cars.

"The people don't know what to do," said Muhammad Ali Muhammad, a 27-year-old Shiite laborer in Sadr City. "They're going to the hospital to give blood. Some are standing around shocked."

Fighting flared at the Health Ministry earlier Thursday. The attack on the ministry headquarters began around midday when three mortar shells hit the main building, Lt. Ali Muhsin of the Iraqi Police told The Associated Press. Gunmen positioned on the upper floors of surrounding buildings then opened fire on the main building, pinning down hundreds of workers inside, ministry officials said. Ministry security guards with assault rifles fired back and managed to keep the insurgents at bay until Iraqi and American troops responded two hours later, the officials said.

Sabah Chalob, a ministry spokesman, said about 15 mortar shells hit the building over the course of the firefight.

DOJ_NMG_0097481

"The employees stayed inside the ministry, away from the windows that were being targeted by the snipers," said Hakim al-Zamili, a deputy health minister, in an interview on the state-run Al Iraqiya network. "We saw the masked men moving freely, and with no fear, in the streets."

At least seven ministry guards were wounded, First Lt. Maitham Abdul-Razzaq of the Iraqi police told The A.P., though a military spokesman denied that report.

The attack on the Health Ministry building was the fourth against the ministry's employees in less than a week. The health minister, Ali al-Shemari, is an associate of Mr. Sadr, and the ministry is widely perceived by Sunni Arabs as a bastion of Shiite favoritism.

On Nov. 19, gunmen kidnapped a deputy health minister from his home in northern Baghdad. The following day, another deputy health minister narrowly escaped an ambush when gunmen opened fire on his convoy, though two of his bodyguards were killed. On Wednesday, gunmen shot and killed an assistant director general from the ministry, Mr. Zamili said.

The violence had the aspect of sectarian revenge. On Nov. 14, Shiite militiamen raided a building belonging to the Sunni Arab-run Ministry of Higher Education and abducted scores of people, some of whom remain missing, officials said.

As dusk fell on Baghdad, and with Sadr City in turmoil, several top political officials held an emergency meeting, including President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd; Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni vice president; and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, a Shiite leader. Afterward, they appeared together on television to deliver a joint statement that sought to reduce tensions.

"We call on people to act responsibly and to stand together to calm the situation," said the joint statement, read by Mr. Hashemi.

The government's spokesman, Ali al-Dabbagh, also appeared on television with what he said was an appeal from the reclusive Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani.

The ayatollah, he said, "denounced the evil attack against Sadr City and expressed his grief for the huge number of dead and injured people caused by the attack, and he is calling the people to control themselves and not to react outside the law."

The American military said Thursday that three marines were killed Wednesday while fighting in Anbar Province, a stronghold of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Synchronized Bombings Kill 157 Around Baghdad (USAT)

By César G. Soriano,

USA Today, November 24, 2006

BAGHDAD — Gunmen, suicide bombers and mortar teams launched coordinated attacks on strongholds of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr on Thursday, killing 157 and wounding more than 250 in the deadliest such wave of the war.

Attackers detonated three suicide car bombs within minutes of each other in Sadr City, the Shiite slum in northeast Baghdad that is home to al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, said Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Gen. Abdul-Karim Khalaf. Mortar rounds struck in two public squares in Sadr City, he said.

At the same time, bombs exploded in two parked cars in Sadr City, one behind the main office of al-Sadr's political organization, police Col. Hassan Chaloub said.

Earlier, the Health Ministry was attacked by about 30 gunmen. They fled after a 50-minute gun battle with Iraqi security forces, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, chief U.S. military spokesman.

Three mortar shells hit the ministry building, police Lt. Ali Muhsin said. Ali al-Shemari, the health minister, is an al-Sadr loyalist.

Before dawn, Iraqi and U.S. forces looking for a kidnapped American soldier conducted a raid through an area of Sadr City, the fourth in six days. Recent U.S. raids there have been condemned by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite whose coalition government includes al-Sadr loyalists.

Hours after the attacks in Sadr City, Sunni neighborhoods and landmarks came under assault. Mortar rounds fell at the Abu Hanifa mosque, Baghdad's holiest Sunni shrine. One round punched a hole in the dome. Other rounds smashed into the Association of Muslim Scholars, Iraq's top Sunni political organization.

DOJ_NMG_0097482

"I would not classify the violence as escalating when the same kind of attack occurred yesterday and the day before across the country," Garver said. "It's just more sensational because of the size of the attack and where it took place."

The Iraqi government imposed an indefinite curfew in Baghdad, starting at 8 p.m. Thursday. It said all vehicles and people should stay off the streets until the curfew is lifted. Baghdad's airport was closed to commercial flights.

Senior Iraqi leaders held an emergency meeting. In a joint televised news conference afterward, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, Shiite leader Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, and Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a Sunni, called for calm.

They said the government must revise current security plans in Baghdad to end sectarian killings and better protect civilians.

President Bush is to meet al-Maliki on Wednesday and Thursday in Jordan to discuss the security situation in Iraq. In other Iraq news:

•The U.S. military on Thursday reported the deaths of three Marines, killed in Anbar province.

•The United Nations on Wednesday said 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October, highest monthly total since the March 2003 U.S. invasion. July's toll — 3,590 — had been the highest.

143 Killed In Baghdad Sadr City Bombings (AFP)

By Ammar Karim

AFP, November 24, 2006

Insurgents have killed 143 people and wounded 220 in a series of bombings, including at least three car bombs, in Baghdad's Shiite district of Sadr City, security and medical sources said.

"Of those killed, 88 bodies are in the Imam Ali hospital and 55 in Sadr City hospital," a medic told AFP Thursday.

One car bomb exploded at a market in Sadr City, a regular target for Sunni insurgents in the sectarian conflict that has killed thousands in Iraq.

Minutes before the blasts masked gunmen launched a daring raid on the health ministry, trapping about 2,000 people inside the building.

The explosions that killed 25 people and wounded 75 in Sadr City included three car bombs, the security source said.

He said one device went off at a market, a regular target for Sunni insurgents in the sectarian conflict that has killed thousands in Iraq.

In an audacious raid about 100 masked gunmen also attacked the health ministry in central Baghdad, clashing with guards and Iraqi army soldiers, deputy health minister Hakim al-Zamili told AFP.

He was trapped in the building with around 2,000 employees.

"First a series of mortars were fired at the building from the nearby Al-Fadhel neighbourhood, and then about 100 masked gunmen holding machine guns attacked the building," said Zamili.

"About 2,000 employees are trapped in the building. I am also in the building," he added.

"The gunmen came in civilian cars and pick-up trucks and started shooting at the building and wounded a number of employees."

A security source said: "Fierce clashes are going on at this moment between the gunmen and guards of the building who are backed by Iraqi army soldiers."

"There are casualties but we do not have any details."

DOJ_NMG_0097483

On Sunday gunmen kidnapped deputy health minister Ammar al-Assafar from his home in Baghdad's northern Adhamiyah district, while Zamili himself escaped an assassination bid on Monday.

Two of Zamili's guards were killed in the ambush.

Insurgents have recently stepped up attacks against the government by targeting state-owned institutes and buildings.

On November 14 dozens of men wearing security forces uniforms assaulted a scientific research institute of the ministry of higher education and kidnapped around 150 people.

About 80 people, many of them employees of the ministry, are still believed to be hostages.

Sadr City, the impoverished district of followers loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, was also the site of an early morning incident involving US troops.

"US troops fired on a minibus carrying workers and killed a number of them in Al-Falah street at 6 am today," Imam Abdel Zahra al-Suwaidi from the Sadr movement told AFP.

"I condemn this shooting that targeted the workers and accuse US forces of repeating such acts which leave many victims every day," Suwaidi said.

A medic at the Sadr City hospital said four people were killed and eight wounded, including two women.

An Iraqi security source also confirmed the incident.

"US forces fired on the minibus as the vehicle was seen on the streets before the dusk-to-dawn curfew was lifted," the source said.

But the US military said that Iraqi forces fired on the vehicle during a raid to detain the leader of a kidnapping cell.

"A vehicle displaying hostile intent was identified as an immediate threat to Iraqi forces. Iraqi forces fired on the vehicle to neutralise the threat," the military said without mentioning civilian casualties.

The security source said the workers were headed to a market in the Jamila neighbourhood near Sadr City at the time.

A daily curfew is imposed on Baghdad from 9:00 pm to 6:00 am (1800 GMT to 0300 GMT).

US forces have regularly raided Sadr City to hunt for leaders of kidnapping cells who the military alleges are militiamen loyal to Sadr.

On Wednesday a UN report said that Iraq's sectarian conflict killed at least 3,709 people in October -- the highest monthly death toll since the 2003 US-led invasion.

The figures, from data provided by the Baghdad health ministry and morgues, compared with a previous high of 3,590 in July, which the United Nations called "unprecedented" at the time.

The report blamed the militias for the bloodshed.

"Hundreds of bodies continued to appear in different areas of Baghdad handcuffed, blindfolded and bearing signs of torture and execution-style killing," the report said.

"Many witnesses reported that perpetrators wear militia attire and even police or army uniforms."

The UN mission regularly received reports that security forces were either "infiltrated or act in collusion with militias, while police and military security operations continued to be based on massive sweeps", the report said.

It came a week before a meeting between US President George W. Bush and Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki in Jordan on November 29.

The US military said Thursday that three more soldiers were killed in Iraq, bringing its losses since the invasion to 2,866, according to Pentagon figures.

Police also recovered eight bodies near the central city of Diwaniyah, while in the restive city of Baquba 12 people were reported killed.

Assault On Iraqi Civilians Is Deadliest Since 2003 (WP)

BAGHDAD, Nov. 23 -- A barrage of car bombs, mortar attacks and missiles battered the Shiite Muslim slum of Sadr City on Thursday afternoon, killing at least 138 people and injuring more than 200, in the single deadliest assault on Iraqi civilians since the start of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

The highly orchestrated attacks on the stronghold of anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr threatened to unleash yet another cycle of reprisal killings and push the country closer to all-out civil war. The attacks, targeting the heart of Baghdad's Shiite community, seem designed to stoke the sectarian rage gripping Iraq.

Plumes of black smoke, and anguished screams, rose above a chaotic landscape of flames and charred cars, witnesses said. Bodies littered the streets and the smell of burned flesh filled the air. Relatives searched for loved ones as strangers helped the wounded reach hospitals overflowing with victims.

Meanwhile, angry Shiite residents and men from Sadr's Mahdi Army militia, wielding guns and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, roamed the streets, hurling curses and vowing revenge against Sunni Arabs.

"Our bellies are full of blood," declared Ibrahim Tabour, a resident. "We're going to fight the terrorists until the last breath."

By nightfall, violence had spread to other neighborhoods in retaliatory attacks across Baghdad, even as politicians and senior religious clerics appealed for calm. Mortar shells landed near Abu Hanifa mosque, Baghdad's most important Sunni shrine, killing 22 people and injuring 17, said Bessam al-Sammaraie, a doctor at al-Nouman Hospital in the Sunni neighborhood of Adhamiyah.

In an effort to stop tensions from mushrooming, the Iraqi government locked down the capital with an indefinite curfew and shut down Baghdad International Airport to all commercial flights. Iraqi security forces flooded neighborhoods around Sadr City to contain the violence.

The attack occurred as Sadr's supporters were commemorating the death of his father, Grand Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, one of Iraq's most revered ayatollahs, assassinated by agents of then-President Saddam Hussein in 1999. Earlier Thursday, gunmen attacked the Shiite-run Health Ministry, fighting a pitched battle against guards and trapping hundreds of employees inside until Iraqi and U.S. forces intervened two hours later.

Thursday's carnage began around 3:30 p.m., witnesses said. Six parked cars packed with as much as 220 pounds of explosives detonated in three sections of the sprawling working-class area, including a crowded marketplace, said Jihad al-Jabri, an Interior Ministry commander in charge of defusing bombs, in an appearance on state television.

As the bombs started exploding in 10- to 15-minute intervals, Katyusha rockets and several mortar shells rained on Sadr City, Jabri and witnesses said. Residents grabbed the driver of another car before he could detonate a bomb near a police station, Jabri added.

As of Thursday night, police were searching for as many as three cars filled with explosives that were part of the same plot, said Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani. He said some of the cars bore license plates from majority Sunni regions.

Mahdi Army militiamen sealed off parts of the slum and patrolled the streets, said Ahmed Abu Mohammed, a militiaman who asked that his full name not be used. Army Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, said U.S. troops were not present in Sadr City at the time of the attacks. U.S. helicopters flew overhead but did not engage any targets, he said.

Shiite political and religious leaders, including Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, immediately blamed Sunni insurgents and Hussein's former Baathist Party loyalists for the carnage. Yet they expressed fear that the bloodletting could become a grim turning point in Iraq's post-invasion history, in the same way the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra triggered cycles of sectarian revenge killings. Since then, the violence has escalated, taking the lives of a record 3,709 Iraqi civilians in October, according to a U.N. report, the highest recorded monthly death toll since the invasion.

Shiite and Sunni leaders delivered statements on state television Thursday night, with some urging Iraq's two main sects to leash their fury.

"They wanted to abolish the memory of our beloved Sadr on the anniversary of his martyrdom," said Moqtada al-Sadr, referring to the Baathists. Addressing his followers, he added that his father would have said to them: " 'Stay united, stay together and keep your patience.' "

DOJ_NMG_0097485

"This land is your responsibility. This sect is your responsibility, and Iraq is your responsibility," Sadr continued. "Please do not lose your right after this incident with irresponsible acts."

A spokesman for the Iraqi government, Ali Dabbagh, read a statement on behalf of the country's most influential Shiite religious figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, in which he condemned the "sinful aggression" against Sadr City and expressed "his extreme sadness for the large number of martyrs and wounded." Sistani called upon citizens "to have self-control and not conduct anything against the law," Dabbagh said.

In a show of unity, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, a Sunni, and Abdul Aziz Hakim, a Shiite cleric and leader of Iraq's most powerful religious party, conferred Thursday night in an emergency session. Afterward, they issued a joint statement condemning the attacks.

Describing the attacks as "an attempt to tear the fabric of the Iraqi people," Maliki said in a statement that he would not have tolerance for anyone who inflames sectarian tensions, and he urged Iraqis to have self-restraint.

As the appeals were delivered, retaliatory attacks unfolded in the capital. A dozen mortars pounded the Sunni neighborhood of Ghazaliya, killing three and injuring seven, said police Lt. Mohammad Khalil. In Maalif, a mixed neighborhood, gunmen in cars shot at Sunni houses for about 45 minutes in clashes that killed 13 people and injured 11, authorities said. The battles ended when U.S. forces arrived in 15 vehicles.

In Hay al-Amil, a mixed Sunni and Shiite neighborhood, clashes erupted between Shiite militias and residents on Janabat Street, named for a Sunni tribe. U.S. troops surrounded the Sunni neighborhood of Amiriyah to prevent retaliatory attacks. Armed groups guarded entry points to the area to keep out strangers, residents said.

Shihab Ahmed, a 24-year-old salesman, was walking toward Jamila market when he heard the first explosion Thursday afternoon. He ran to the scene to help the wounded. "There were dead people in the streets, there was blood everywhere," he recalled.

Ahmed and other residents loaded a few of the wounded into his car to take them to the hospital. Ten minutes later, as Ahmed was pulling away, a second car bomb exploded, less than 20 yards from the first bomb. Shrapnel hit Ahmed, slightly injuring his arm. "I looked back, and I saw cars burning," he recalled. "The fire was reaching the sky. A lot of people I know were killed while they were picking up bodies and helping people."

Mahdi Army militiamen helped transport the wounded to hospitals, witnesses said. Outside the overcrowded Khadisiya Hospital, the injured waited on the street for assistance, witnesses said. By the end of the evening, relatives were carrying bodies out in wood coffins, the start of a long journey to the holy city of Najaf, where Shiites are buried.

The dead included women and children, witnesses said. "I saw a child who was totally burned," Abu Mohammed said. "I saw another child who was carried by an old man."

The carnage spoke of the deepening sectarian divide and the dread that has engulfed the capital. "No one believes that any Shiite would kill their Shiite brothers. It's the Sunnis and the Americans who did this," said Kareem Hendul Miyahem, 40, a driver.

Tabour, like so many other Shiites, was thinking about revenge.

"If I catch a terrorist, I will not kill him with a weapon. I will not turn him over to the government," he said. "I'll catch him and cut him to pieces and drink his blood until the last drop."

Iraq Strategy Takes Page From Vietnam Playbook (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — New tactics favored by U.S. commanders in Iraq borrow heavily from the end of another war that might seem an unlikely source for a winning strategy: Vietnam.

The tactics — an influx of military advisors and a speeded-up handover to indigenous forces followed by a gradual U.S. withdrawal — resemble those in place as the U.S. effort in Vietnam reached its end.

DOJ_NMG_0097486

In historical assessments and the American recollection, Vietnam was the unwinnable war. But to many in the armed forces, Vietnam as a war actually was on its way to succeeding when the Nixon administration and Congress, bowing to public impatience, pulled the plug: first withdrawing U.S. combat forces and then blocking funding and supplies to the South Vietnamese army.

If they hadn't, the South Vietnamese army, which had been bolstered by U.S. advisors and a more focused "hearts and minds" campaign in the later stages of the war, could have been able to fend off the communist North, many leading military thinkers have argued.

In their view, progress was undermined by President Nixon's decision to begin withdrawing U.S. troops in 1969 in the face of political pressure at home, despite military objections that the South Vietnamese army was not ready to go it alone. Another key U.S. mistake, they contend, was the deep cuts Congress made to military aid to Saigon beginning in 1974.

For many in the military, the lessons of Vietnam are clear: Maintain public support, and be patient.

Consciously or not, President Bush encapsulated that view during his weekend trip to Hanoi, where he was asked whether there were lessons in Vietnam for the war in Iraq. Instead of military tactics or strategy, he answered by talking about the impatience of the American public, and how success in war can be slow. "We'll succeed unless we quit," Bush said.

Differing views

The view that Vietnam could have been won if public opinion and political will had continued to support the war effort is far from universal, particularly among historians outside the military.

Stanley Karnow, a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist who covered the war from the day the first American was killed in 1959 to its end, said Hanoi was nowhere near capitulation by 1973, when the Paris peace accords were signed.

"They're clutching at some sort of way to justify hanging on in Iraq," said Karnow, whose "Vietnam: A History" is considered by many to be the definitive account of the conflict. "The war in Vietnam, in my estimation, was unwinnable for the simple, basic reason that we were up against an enemy that was prepared to take on unlimited losses. They would have gone on fighting endlessly."

For years, the debate over the end of the Vietnam War occupied students and scholars in the military's academies and war colleges. But with the Pentagon struggling to find answers in Iraq, the lessons of Vietnam have taken on more than just an academic interest.

The course that senior military commanders now appear to be steering in Iraq closely mirrors the "Vietnamization" program implemented by Nixon and his commander in Vietnam, Army Gen. Creighton Abrams, in the late stages of the war.

Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, laid out that path at congressional hearings last week. He said the biggest change he anticipated in the coming months was a large-scale increase in U.S. advisors.

He also said he hoped to hand over responsibility for security to Iraqi forces in less than a year — faster than Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the U.S. commander in Iraq, had estimated just weeks earlier — and spelled out his resistance to an increase in American combat troops.

"I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more," Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "If more troops need to come in, they need to come in to make the Iraqi army stronger."

Familiar strategy

For some military experts and historians, several of whom advise the Pentagon on Iraq policy, that strategy sounded familiar, recalling Abrams' shift in Vietnam after he took over from Army Gen. William C. Westmoreland in 1968. After that revamp, an increased advisory effort and an accelerated pacification program, which included enlarging the South Vietnamese army, was finally beginning to work by the early 1970s, the military scholars argue.

Those efforts were undermined, their thesis goes, by a lack of political will at home, which forced the Army of the Republic of Vietnam (ARVN) and the Saigon government to go it alone before they were ready.

"Gen. Westmoreland preferred to fight the war with American troops; he saw the advisory effort to help the South Vietnamese as very secondary," said Kalev Sepp, a counterinsurgency expert at the Naval Postgraduate School who has traveled to Iraq frequently to advise U.S. commanders. "When Abrams took over, he turned it back around, and he emphasized the advisory system as part of the way the Americans could disengage."

DOJ_NMG_0097487

Abizaid is known to have studied Abrams' conduct of the war. Late last year, he was seen reading "A Better War," a 1999 book by Vietnam veteran Lewis Sorley that argues Abrams was winning before being let down by politicians in Washington.

Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, an influential former commander in Iraq who now heads the Army's system of war colleges and training centers, also studied Abrams' strategy early in his own rethinking of Iraq strategy.

Among the administration's Iraq war planners, the influence of the late Gen. Abrams has been felt before. The strategy of "clear, hold and build," in which U.S. forces remain in captured towns to provide security while reconstruction begins, was first articulated by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice more than a year ago and closely echoes Abrams' "clear and hold" strategy implemented shortly after he took over from Westmoreland. Philip Zelikow, a close aide to Rice, has acknowledged reading Sorley's book as well.

More recently, officers steeped in Vietnam's lessons have been brought into the Pentagon by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as part of his task force rethinking Iraq strategy.

Among them are Army Col. H.R. McMaster, whose doctoral thesis was on the failures of the military leadership during Vietnam, and Army Col. Peter Mansoor, head of the military's new counterinsurgency center — an organization dedicated, in many ways, to reteaching the "hearts and minds" strategies that Abrams emphasized.

Although possible recommendations are still being debated within the Pentagon, the panel is reportedly leaning toward a short-term increase in U.S. forces, perhaps as many as 20,000, followed by a significant boost in training and advising efforts for Iraqis, including an increase in the size of the Iraqi military.

Andrew Krepinevich, a military analyst and Vietnam veteran who has spoken with members of Pace's panel, noted that McMaster and Mansoor are Iraq combat veterans who are known for their expertise in irregular warfare.

"It wouldn't be a surprise at all that these people would be drawing on the Vietnam experience," Krepinevich said.

The argument that Abrams was on the right track has gained a strong following among influential military thinkers, including Sepp and Krepinevich, who have the ear of many in the Pentagon.

"There's a considerable sentiment of those who really studied Vietnam and, ideally, served there, that the approach to the war after Westmoreland left was on a new track," said retired Army Col. Stuart A. Herrington, another Vietnam veteran who has advised the Pentagon on Iraq policy. "It was a radical change in the approach to the war, and there's no question that even [former North Vietnamese] adversaries now admit that the second approach was extremely, extremely damaging to them."

Veterans of later years of the Vietnam conflict, some of whom are now in positions at the military's leading war colleges, often describe a strategy that was beginning to work even as combat forces began to withdraw in the early 1970s.

James Willbanks, a former military advisor in Vietnam who heads the history department at the U.S. Army's Command and General Staff College, argued that pacification efforts — the strategy of pushing South Vietnamese forces into the countryside to provide a physical and psychological sense of security — had largely succeeded by 1972. He adding that the ARVN was even able to hold its own without American combat troops until Congress decided to withhold military funding to Saigon shortly after U.S. troops withdrew in 1973.

"We trained them to fight like us, and then we pulled all our support out," Willbanks said, echoing sentiments of other military scholars.

Clear difficulties

These same experts acknowledge that, much like 30 years ago, any strategy that relies on U.S. forces serving as the backbone of a nascent indigenous force is fraught with military and political difficulties.

Perhaps most important, much like in Vietnam, the new strategy is being pushed after several years of large-scale combat operations that may have killed thousands of insurgents, but also alienated the local population.

In addition, the Iraqi and South Vietnamese militaries are hardly comparable. Although the ARVN was notoriously corrupt and politicized, it was a functioning institution that had been engaged in fighting the communist North for decades. Conversely, the Iraqi army is being built from scratch, and unlike the ARVN, which was clearly aligned with the government in Saigon, Abizaid noted last week that it remained unclear whether the Iraqi government sees their armed forces — rather than armed militia — as their preferred fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0097488

Perhaps more troubling, however, is that like the Abrams initiatives, which ran from 1968 through 1973, the current move to step up training of the Iraqi forces comes at a time when domestic support for war is on the wane and political winds are blowing in favor of a quick pullout of combat forces.

"There are certain things you just can't do in a military situation like Iraq or Vietnam, and if you violate these tenets, you're at great risk," Herrington said. "One of them is to take too long to figure out what you ought to be doing so the American public falters in its support."

Such fears, and the consequences of losing political backing for the war in Iraq, have colored military strategy. Senior military officials have acknowledged that maintaining domestic support for the war effort is frequently factored into planning discussions.

"Unfortunately, the timeline we see that it would take to build a fully capable, competent [Iraqi] force — and for us to feel comfortable stepping away — is longer than the timeline that we feel now our country will support," said Gen. James T. Conway, the new commandant of the Marine Corps. "So we have a little bit of a mismatch there."

Their fear is that, like the ultimately failed Vietnamization effort, an unwillingness by the American public to support the war could force the Pentagon to pull its backing from the Iraqi military before the developing forces are ready.

"The [Vietnam] war was so far along and the withdrawal was so far along that the U.S. advisory effort was losing its effectiveness," recalled retired Army Col. Walter Clark, who served as a provincial military advisor in the Mekong Delta in 1971 and 1972 before becoming commandant of the Citadel, the private military college in South Carolina. "I couldn't snap my fingers and get a bunch of helicopters the Vietnamese might need."

Lessons learned?

Despite the hurdles, the signs that the administration is heeding the lessons of Vietnam, as prosecuted by Abrams, are increasingly apparent.

Bush himself, as recently as June, told a White House news conference that he saw no parallels between the two wars. More recently, however, in addition to his comments in Hanoi, Bush acknowledged in an interview with ABC News that American setbacks in Baghdad may be comparable to the Tet offensive, the 1968 battle between American forces and Viet Cong guerrillas generally seen as the point where public opinion turned against the war.

But even among Abrams' advocates, there is a nagging concern that, even with the relearning of Vietnam's lessons, it may still turn out to be too little, too late.

"Having wasted more than three years … pursuing a flawed strategy, the Pentagon lost the support of the American population and was not given the time to get it right, even when it was clear that Gen. Creighton Abrams' pacification and Vietnamization approach might have worked," Herrington wrote in a recent issue of Parameters, the journal of the U.S. Army War College.

US Involved For Longer Time In Iraq Than In World War II (AFP)

By Jerome Bernard

AFP, November 24, 2006

The US involvement in Iraq will pass another sad milestone on Sunday, when it overtakes the length of America's engagement in World War II.

While the two wars are far apart in character -- and in their death tolls -- the Iraq campaign has become a symbol of the pitfalls of the new style of conflict.

World War II ended for Americans after 1,348 days. US soldiers facing a still largely unknown enemy in Iraq do not know when their country will leave, more than three years after the US-led invasion.

American politicians have not failed to note the symbolism.

DOJ_NMG_0097489

"I remember the (World War II) period well," Senator John Warner, Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services committee, who served as a sailor during the war, said at a hearing last week on Iraq.

"I note that on November 26, 2006 this year, but a few days away, our involvement in Iraq will surpass the length of this historic World War II period," Warner said.

The committee's top Democrat, Senator Carl Levin, pointed to the Iraq war's length as he pushed for a phased withdrawal of US troops within four to six months.

"We are three and one-half years into a conflict which has already lasted longer than the Korean conflict and almost as long as World War II. We should put the responsibility for Iraq's future squarely where it belongs: on the Iraqis. We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves," Levin said.

America's involvement in World War II started with Japan's air raid on US Navy ships in Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941.

The European war ended with Germany's surrender on May 8, 1945, while the Pacific operations ended August 15, 1945 with Japan's surrender.

According to Defense Department figures, more than 2,860 US soldiers have died in Iraq since the March 2003 invasion. More than 21,000 have been wounded, according to the independent website Iraq Coalition Casualties.

The grim figures do not compare with the US military casualties in World War II, when 406,000 American soldiers died and 671,000 were wounded, according to official US statistics.

"It is an entirely different affair, because it is the same length of time but a far smaller level of national effort," Geoffrey Wawro, a history professor at the University of North Texas, told AFP.

"Expenditures have been lower, there has been no conscription, no draft to bring in the bulk of the society, so the experience of the war has been confined to a small professional army," Wawro said.

During World War II, Americans were forced to tighten their belts, while US President George W. Bush has pursued his tax-slashing policy during the Iraq war, he said.

"During the Second World War, you would have had tax increases, you would have had austerity, you would have had rationing, and so the experience of war would have been deeply felt," Wawro said. "Here, it is very superficially felt."

Iraq war critics use Sunday's milestone "to show that this has not been the cakewalk that George W. Bush and his acolytes pretended it would," the historian said.

Americans still remember Bush proclaiming on May 1, 2003 the end of "major combat operations" in Iraq on the flight deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln aircraft carrier. Behind him was a banner stating: "Mission Accomplished".

Wawro said that there was a "sense of amazement and bewilderment at the length of this war" and that its supporters said it would be short and not paid for by US taxpayers.

"In fact, it is long, and it is American-financed," said Wawro. "They are pointing out that this war, that was supposed to be a lightning campaign, has become more like World War II, a war of attrition."

WWII Vets Fought A Different Kind Of Fight Than Those In Iraq (USAT)

By Oren Dorell,

USA Today, November 24, 2006

William Guise, an Army infantrymen in World War II, spent months crawling on his belly to avoid enemy fire while fighting in Europe.

German shells landed so close that shrapnel snapped his rifle in two, destroyed his pistol and slashed the back of his jacket.

MORE: Iraq reaches WWII benchmark

Unlike insurgents in Iraq who often fire on U.S. troops evacuating their wounded, "the Germans treated us pretty decently," says Guise, 82, a resident of Arlington, Va., who fought with the 83rd Infantry Battalion. "When we'd have wounded, they'd have a cease-fire and clean all the wounded off the battlefield."

On Sunday, the Iraq war will have lasted 1,347 days, the length of direct U.S. involvement in WWII. Veterans of that war six decades ago describe a very different experience from that of recent veterans.

DOJ_NMG_0097490

Brian Linn, a historian at Texas A&M University, says the Pentagon used the post-WWII occupation of Germany as a partial model for Iraq. But the swift success of the initial Iraq invasion made this war much different than WWII.

"Germans knew they were defeated," Linn says. "The Sunnis didn't think they were defeated."

In WWII, U.S. forces went toe-to toe against men in uniform with thousands of infantry troops, tanks, ships and planes.

In Iraq, the U.S. military is up against terrorists and fighters who dress and look like civilians. Everyone is a potential enemy.

Civilians were not involved in the fight in WWII like they are in Iraq, but they were often "in the way" and died in great numbers, says Richard Stewart, chief historian at the U.S. Army Center of Military History in Washington.

"We had no choice but to roll over them if we were to accomplish our objectives," Stewart says.

In Iraq, minimizing civilian deaths is crucial to achieving the political objective of the war, he says.

Nathaniel Haynes, 80, of Portland, Ore., manned a 5-inch gun on a destroyer in the Pacific. Battles were different then, he says.

"The Japanese were shooting at the Marines, and they were cutting them down just like grass," Haynes says of beach invasions. "When you're on the ship, you see all those bodies, but you can't do anything about it."

Technology has changed, too. In WWII, hundreds of unguided bombs were dropped from planes to hit a single target. Today, one guided missile can do the job. Communication has gone from Morse code to encrypted satellite radios.

John Mallon, 81, of Arlington, Va., recalled going on beach raids in the Pacific for the Navy, carrying a radio that had a manual generator. "You had to crank it and keep cranking to keep the power up," he says.

Iver Burke, 87, a farmer from Fruitland, Wash., who served with the Army's 106th station hospital in Italy and Okinawa, says getting to the war zone was more perilous.

"We went over on ships and trains and trucks," Burke says. "The submarines were a threat then."

Arno Christopher, 83, of Seymour, Ind., spent nearly three years in Europe with the Army's 264th Field Artillery Battalion. Unlike today, when U.S. troops deploy for periods of several months to more than a year, no one in WWII knew when or how they'd return home, Christopher says.

"They were there until (German) surrender or whatever was going to happen," Christopher says.

World War II looked a lot different on the home front as well, Stewart says. Rationing affected the availability of tires, new cars, nylon stockings and gasoline. In contrast, the Iraq war has done little if any harm to the economy, Stewart says.

Herb Zumhingst, 82, of Seymour, Ind., was a second lieutenant in the Air Force, training to fly B-29 bombers in Texas when World War II ended. His father's lumber mill and construction business in Indiana practically shut down because of government restrictions on new construction.

Women worked in factories to replace men who had gone to war. Ford plants stopped making cars and built B-24 bombers. People planted "victory gardens" to replace farm-raised vegetables that were sent overseas.

"Everybody was for one thing, and that was to win the war," Zumhingst says.

As for the reaction when he made it home: "You couldn't go into a bar and buy a drink ... they'd buy it for you."

Under Fire, US Marines Hand Off Battered Fallujah (CSM)

By Scott Peterson, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, November 24, 2006

Just 300 marines now patrol key Sunni city as Iraqi military takes over.

FALLUJAH, IRAQ

From Observation Post Blazer, marines view Fallujah through a thick sheet of bullet-proof glass - already tested with numerous impacts. Or they stare through night-vision goggles or a thermal imaging scope that can pick up the heat of a dog hundreds of yards away.

The marines still patrol key roads. The US military, which still travels boldly through town despite a surge in deadly sniper attacks and roadside bombs, is spending $200 million on 60-plus projects to rebuild the city, heavily damaged in fighting two years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0097491

But with just 300 marines, the US military footprint is smaller in this Sunni stronghold of more than 300,000 than it has been in two years. As the marine presence shrinks and Iraqis take more control, Fallujah - once a template for counterinsurgency efforts in Iraq, where US forces have controlled all the variables - is likely again to set a standard for the rest of the country.

"A lot of us feel like we have our hands tied behind our back," says Cpl. Peter Mattice, of Bravo Company, 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment. "In Fallujah, [insurgents] know our [rules of engagement] - they know when to stop, just before we engage."

During this transition, frustration runs deep in this fortified bunker, and at a handful of posts that now dot Fallujah. They are designed to watch the main roads where marines travel, to prevent the laying of roadside bombs.

Here echo the conclusions of a report written by the chief of intelligence for the Marine Corps in August, and first described by The Washington Post, which determined that there is little the military now can do to improve prospects in insurgent-riddled Anbar Province, which includes Fallujah.

"They say we are here to win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people, but I just don't see that happening," says Corporal Mattice, of Gladwin, Mich. OP Blazer is perched on the northern edge of the city, looking due south down a main street known to the marines as Ethan, site of numerous roadside bombs.

"As soon as we leave, I'm afraid that the insurgents will take over.... They watch us, as we watch them," says Mattice, echoing the fears of Fallujans who, while unhappy with the marine presence, are far more worried that a hurried US departure will leave them vulnerable to Sunni militants, and exposed to sectarian killings.

That fear has been fueled by a spike in insurgent attacks since summer, against both Iraqis and US troops. The 1/24 Marines, a reserve unit headquartered in Detroit and recently arrived, suffered nine dead and more than 40 seriously wounded in their first month in Iraq. Another marine died Sunday from a roadside bomb.

Since August, an assassination and intimidation campaign here has also killed the head of the city council and another prominent member; numerous policemen - including the deputy police chief - and contractors and workers on US-funded projects have also been murdered.

The numbers underscore the dilemma for marines in Fallujah, and for US troops across Iraq, as they begin to pull back and hand more responsibility to Iraqi forces.

The 300 marines here are attacked five to eight times each day. That presence is a significant drop from the 3,000 marines posted here in March 2005, and the 10,000 that took part in the late 2004 invasion.

Another metric: Officers say the number of direct fire incidents against US forces has shot up 650 percent in the past year. Three marines had been hit by snipers in one 48-hour span earlier this week.

"It is no secret," Col. Lawrence Nicholson told the Fallujah City Council during their regular Tuesday meeting. "My mission is to do less, every single day, as Iraqi forces do more."

Fallujah was the test case counter-insurgency invasion in November 2004 - effectively destroying the city to root out insurgents in the biggest urban battle for US marines since Hue City in Vietnam in 1968. Fallujah later became the model for a "go and stay" strategy attempted in cities along the Euphrates in the fall of 2005, which the August intelligence report found to have failed.

Senior officers now refer to Fallujah as a "gated community" - putting a deft gloss on the fact that Fallujah has for two years had only six entry points, and entering Iraqi residents still require US-issued biometric cards with retinal scans and fingerprints on file.

But among those Iraqi residents are 150 newcomers a week, fleeing the sectarian violence in Baghdad to a known "Sunni safe haven," in the words of one officer. Others say hundreds of highly trained insurgents, Iraqis from outside Fallujah, have also recently moved in to step up attacks.

"Fallujah has an iconic value to the Marine Corps," says Colonel Nicholson, commander of the Regimental Combat Team 5, which covers Fallujah and a populated swath of Anbar Province, in an interview. "Fallujah falling [to insurgents] would be like Iwo Jima falling to the Japanese again after World War II - it would be intolerable."

Preventing that from happening is a top priority for the Bravo and Charlie companies of the 1/24 that are now in Fallujah. But local Iraqis know the territory better than US forces ever will.

DOJ_NMG_0097492

"The insurgents are creative and have advantages," says Maj. Jeffrey O'Neill, the Bravo Company commander from Novi, Mich. "If the Chinese invaded your [American] neighborhood, you would know where to hide, which dumpster behind the 7-11 to stash things. If we don't catch them red-handed, they will probably be on the street again."

Many prisoners were released by the Iraqi government in August amnesties, notes Major O'Neill, and the rules are changing: Even if someone is found with a sack full of washing machine timers that could be used to trigger bombs, unless explosives and a black mask are found too, it may not be enough for an arrest.

The insurgents are also proving agile. On Monday, for example, elements of two US battalions - the 1/24 and 2/6 - staged "Operation Talon," which swept a series of garages and rural areas a few miles north of Fallujah. As many as seven cells were thought to work from the area, using it as a staging post for attacks on the city.

A round-up of everybody in the area-776 men - netted just 13 detainees after full processing, and none were considered high-value targets. But two Shiite hostages were found and released; they had been told by their Sunni captors they would be executed later that same day. Some small weapons caches were also found, and several thousand ball bearings, along with steel plate apparently used to test their armor penetration in home-made mines.

"I don't think [insurgents] have succeeded as much as they would like, but they gave it all they had before the US election to influence people," says Maj. Christopher Kolomjec from Grosse Pointe, Mich. "It is hard for us to know the real support [of the US] of the Fallujah people, because if they are seen to support us, they will have their head cut off tomorrow."

"Each precinct in Chicago or Detroit, makes 100 to 150 arrests per night per 300,000 people," says Major Kolomjec, a lawyer who notes that Fallujah's population is similar. "Here you take 12 to 40 people per day, and people are up in arms. You can't expect stability, when you are not even doing the same level of policing as Detroit."

Another source of frustration: Pursuit in mosques is forbidden without the presence of Iraqi Army units. Marines say some of Fallujah's 76 mosques are used to hide weaponry. Some broadcast messages such as, "God help us defeat the Americans."

"Many would ask: What other war would we allow the enemy to broadcast calls for our defeat, for the sake of cultural sensitivity?" says O'Neill.

But even as insurgents step up the violence, marines make themselves harder-to-hit targets.

"No, it's not worth it," says 1st Sgt Andrew Tomelleri, of Kansas City, when news came of the death and injuries from another roadside bomb. The three-time Iraq veteran had been at the exact location a day earlier. Such patrols are seen as "magnets" for IEDs.

"But it would be [worth it], if we could fight them muzzle to muzzle, man to man," says Sergeant Tomelleri. "They know they can't beat us that way."

Some Fighters In Iraq Adopt New Tactics To Battle U.S. (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

FORWARD OPERATING BASE CALDWELL, Iraq, Nov. 23 — Sunni Arab militant groups suspected of having ties to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia have established training camps east of Baghdad that are turning out well-disciplined units willing to fight American forces in set-piece battles, American military commanders said Thursday.

American soldiers fought such units in a pitched battle last week in Turki, a village 25 miles south of this Iraqi Army base in volatile Diyala Province, bordering Iran. At least 72 insurgents and two American officers were killed in more than 40 hours of fighting. American commanders said they called in 12 hours of airstrikes while soldiers shot their way through a reed-strewn network of canals in extremely close combat.

Officers said that in that battle, unlike the vast majority of engagements in Diyala, insurgents stood and fought, even deploying a platoon-size unit that showed remarkable discipline. One captain said the unit was in “perfect military formation.”

Insurgents throughout Iraq usually avoid direct confrontation with American troops, preferring to use hit-and-run tactics and melting away at the sight of American armored vehicles.

Lt. Col. Andrew Poppas, commander of the Fifth Squadron, 73rd Cavalry, a unit of the 82nd Airborne Division, said in an interview that the fighters at Turki “were disciplined and well trained, with well-aimed shots.”

DOJ_NMG_0097493

“We hadn’t seen anything like this in years,” he said.

The insurgents had built a labyrinthine network of trenches in the farmland, with sleeping areas and weapons caches. Two antiaircraft guns had been hidden away.

Insurgents were apparently able to establish a training camp after American forces moved out of the area in the fall of 2005, Colonel Poppas said. Sunni Arab militants there belong to the fundamentalist Wahhabi strain of Islam and are believed to be led, at least in part, by a man known as Abu Abdul Rahman, an Iraqi-Canadian who moved from Canada to Iraq in 1995 after marrying a woman from Turki, he said.

Abu Abdul Rahman was mentioned on some jihadist Web sites as a possible contender for the leadership of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia after the group’s founder, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, was killed in an American airstrike in Diyala Province in June, said Capt. Mike Few, commander of A Troop, Fifth Squadron.

Senior commanders training Iraqi Army units here say other rural areas of eastern and central Diyala where American forces have had little oversight have been transformed into camps similar to the one at Turki. The “graduates,” many of whom belong to an umbrella group called the Sunni Council, then spread to urban areas like Baquba, the provincial capital, said Maj. Tim Sheridan, an intelligence officer. Sectarian violence is rampant in Diyala, where Sunni and Shiite militants are vying for control.

The battle at Turki began after Colonel Poppas and other soldiers flew over the area on a reconnaissance mission on Nov. 12. From the helicopters, they spotted a white car covered by shrubbery and a hole in the ground that appeared to be a hiding place. The colonel dropped off an eight-man team and later sent other soldiers to sweep the area.

Gunfire erupted on Nov. 15 when one unit ran into an ambush. The fighting eventually became so intense that the Americans called in airstrikes. An American captain and a lieutenant, both West Point graduates, were killed by insurgents in separate firefights.

Searing Memories Of A Brush With Death In Iraq (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 24, 2006

A Marine recalls being hit by a bullet during an ambush. Such attacks are rising as insurgents shift from bombings.

CAMP PENDLETON — When he closes his eyes, Marine Cpl. Christopher Shelhamer can feel the bullet that tore through his body when he was ambushed while on routine foot patrol outside Fallouja, Iraq.

"I can feel the red-hot metal ripping me," he said. "It was like being hit from behind by a baseball bat."

Shelhamer fell hard to the ground and his fellow Marines sprayed bullets in a short but furious firefight with the unseen gunman 100 yards or more away.

Ambush attempts of the type that felled Shelhamer are becoming more common, Marines say, as insurgents shift tactics away from face-to-face battles or total reliance on hidden roadside bombs. Some of the attacks, like the one on Shelhamer and his platoon, are "spray and pray" assaults, from concealed positions, with insurgents firing AK-47s or Soviet bloc machine guns.

Other cases are classic sniper assaults — one shot, one kill — from hundreds of yards away, accomplished with high-power scopes and Chinese- or Russian-made sniper rifles.

In both instances, the insurgents' apparent primary aim is not to win battles but to inflict casualties, in hopes of undercutting the morale of troops in the field and the American public.

Much of the insurgent propaganda, including film snippets on the Internet, involves ambush attacks on American troops, U.S. military officials say.

One such snippet showing an insurgent sniper killing an American soldier aired on CNN, angering some politicians who believe it only served to further the insurgents' propaganda.

"He cannot openly oppose us or let his identity be known to his own people," Maj. Sean Riordan said, discussing insurgents in an interview from Fallouja. "He is purely violent for violence's sake and because it plays well on blogs, websites and the new media that are available to him."

DOJ_NMG_0097494

Riordan is executive officer of the 2nd Battalion, 8th Regiment, which has had Marines killed and wounded by sniper attacks. In response, the battalion has stepped up counter-sniper tactics, including raiding sniper nests and killing or capturing snipers and capturing their weapons.

While there is no sure-fire way to neutralize attacks from ambush, Marines are far from defenseless, Riordan said. "First and foremost, we make ourselves hard to kill," he said.

At the Marine base in Twentynine Palms, all Iraq-bound battalions go through a training course called Mojave Viper, which puts an emphasis on the threat posed by insurgent snipers and others who attack from ambush.

"We train very heavily toward this," said Brig. Gen. Douglas M. Stone, commander of the Marine Air-Ground Task Force Training Command, who added that specific tactics and techniques that have been perfected during the Iraq war are classified and cannot be discussed.

Stone believes the insurgents are switching to snipers and other ambush attacks because of the declining success of roadside bombs. "It's a growing threat, but it's one we anticipated," he said. "We're not worrying about it. We're just adapting."

After multiple surgeries and months of arduous rehabilitation, Chris Shelhamer is also adapting. He walked a mile the other day, but he probably never again will be able to carry hundreds of pounds over rough terrain for hours on end.

"I'm pretty much useless to the infantry now," said Shelhamer, 24, who was on his third tour in Iraq with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment.

A personnel board is evaluating Shelhamer's case and will probably recommend that he be given a medical retirement.

He's thinking of returning to school, possibly Williams Baptist College in Arkansas, which he attended for two years before enlisting.

For now, Shelhamer and his wife, Amanda, live in a tidy duplex on the western edge of sprawling Camp Pendleton. Amanda, 23, is pregnant with the couple's first child and works at a local tanning salon.

Chris does four to six hours of therapy a week, stretching and exercising muscles that have been damaged or atrophied. The bullet that ripped through the lower left side of his back narrowly missed his spine. Otherwise he might be paralyzed.

Shot Jan. 20 as his platoon patrolled a rural area outside Fallouja, he was rushed to an emergency aid station and then to a bigger medical facility at one of the larger bases.

As he was being taken to surgery, medical personnel called his wife at her parents' home in rural Arkansas and handed him the cellphone. "I just told her, 'Babe, I've been hit. I got all my limbs. It hurts too much to talk. Goodbye,' " he said. "That's all I remember."

By Jan. 26, Shelhamer had been airlifted to the Naval Medical Center next to San Diego's Balboa Park, where he was reunited with Marines from his battalion who had been wounded in earlier fights. The Marine Corps flew his wife and mother to San Diego the same day.

His recovery is steady but slow. "He can't walk too far before the swelling and pain gets him and he has to stop and sit down," his wife said. "That's hard for any man to accept, especially a Marine."

On Shelhamer's back is a tattoo with the names of five of his buddies killed in Iraq.

He said he would be willing to return to Iraq for a fourth tour.

"I wouldn't mind going back to teach young Marines how to come back alive."

White House Denies News Reports That Cheney Is Visiting Iraq (USAT/AP)

USA Today/AP, November 24, 2006

BAGDHAD (AP) — The White House denied Iraqi television reports that U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney made an unannounced visit to Baghdad on Thursday.

David Almacy, a White House spokesman in Washington, said Cheney was not in Iraq and that his only currently planned travel to the region is the previously announced trip he will make to Saudi Arabia on Friday to meeting the next day with King Abdullah to discuss developments in the Middle East, including Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0097495

State-run Iraqiya TV and the private Al-Arabiya TV station reported that Cheney had arrived in the Iraqi capital on Thursday morning, apparently to visit American troops for the Thanksgiving holiday.

But U.S. Embassy and U.S. military officials in Baghdad couldn't confirm that, and it became clear later that the reports were erroneous.

For security reasons, previous visits to Iraq by U.S. President George W. Bush, Cheney and other high administration officials have not been made public in advance, but have been disclosed immediately upon their arrival — regardless of whether they were accompanied by reporters or traveling without a press contingent.

For example, U.S. Attorney General Albert Gonzales traveled unannounced and without reporters to Iraq in August, but his visit was disclosed to the media in Baghdad and Washington immediately upon his arrival.

Justice Takes In Record $3.1 Billion In False Claims Cases (FEDTIMES)

By Elise Castelli

Federal Times, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department collected a record amount of money from false claims lawsuits in fiscal 2006.

Case settlements and judgments brought the government $3.1 billion from companies accused of fraud against the government. The previous record was $2.2 billion, set in 2003.

"These record recoveries send a clear message that the Justice Department will not tolerate fraud against the government," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement.

Whistleblower lawsuits accounted for $1.3 billion of the recoveries, with the whistleblowers themselves collecting a total of $190 million for their efforts.

Health care fraud made up 72 percent of recoveries. Included in the $2.2 billion recovered from abuses of Medicare, Medicaid and the federal employees' benefits programs, is a $920 million settlement with Tenet Healthcare Corp., the second largest hospital chain in the country. Tenet was accused of inflating the costs of patient treatment and paying kickbacks to physicians for patient referrals.

The second largest settlement in 2006 was a defense procurement fraud settlement with the aviation giant Boeing Co. for $565 million.

Boeing's settlements stemmed from two cases. The first was the Darleen Druyun case, where the company allegedly offered Druyun a job after her retirement from the Air Force while she was handling the company's procurements, a violation of procurement law. The second case involved allegations Boeing illegally obtained competitor Lockheed Martin's proprietary and competition-sensitive information in order to win defense contracts.

Lost Opportunity (WT)

The Washington Times, November 24, 2006

Regarding the confirmation process of circuit-court nominations, Republicans were rightly aghast over actions of the Democratic-controlled Senate during the 107th Congress (2001-2002). The Senate confirmed only 17 of President Bush's 32 nominations to the circuit courts of appeal. As the 109th Congress approaches adjournment, conservatives should once again be aghast over the confirmation record of circuit-court judges. This time, however, much of the blame must be shared by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist and the White House.

According to data compiled by the Justice Department's Office of Legal Policy, if no more circuit-court nominees are confirmed, the Republican-controlled Senate will adjourn leaving 16 circuit-court vacancies unfilled. Thus, the vacancies of the Frist Senate will exceed by one the number that were returned by the 107th Congress under the control of then-Majority Leader Tom Daschle and then-Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy. So far, moreover, the Democratic-controlled 107th confirmed more circuit-court nominees (17) than the Republican-controlled 109th (15). And Mr. Frist considers himself presidential timber?

Yes, Democrats continued to play an obstructionist role in the 109th. But they were in no position to bottle up appellate-court nominees by refusing to hold hearings for some of them or by declining to cast a committee vote after a hearing or by failing to schedule a nomination for debate on the Senate floor after a favorable committee vote was cast. When Democrats regained majority status after Sen. James Jeffords defected from the Republican Party in May 2001, they exploited variations of all three tactics during the 107th Congress. Throughout the 108th Congress (2003-04), after Republicans regained a slight majority (51-49) in the 2002 elections, Democrats resorted to an unprecedented campaign of filibustering to block circuit-court nominees. A major logjam was broken in the late spring of 2005 when the so-called Gang of 14 (seven Democrats and seven Republicans) responded to threats by the Republican leadership to invoke the "nuclear option," which would have used parliamentary tactics to end judicial filibusters. The deal brokered by the Gang of 14 opened the door to the confirmation of five of the 10 nominees filibustered by the Democrats. The Senate confirmed 10 others.

The White House has not even bothered to submit nominations for six of the 16 circuit-court vacancies, including the seat on the 3rd Circuit formerly occupied by Samuel Alito, who was confirmed to the Supreme Court in January. The Senate hasn't bothered to hold hearings for five of the other 10 vacancies. In January, Mr. Leahy will reclaim the gavel at Judiciary, and Harry Reid will be in charge of scheduling floor votes. On the crucial issue of circuit-court nominations, the 109th Congress was a lost opportunity.

Understaffing Impedes Justice Program Classifying Documents (FEDTIMES)

By M.Z. Hemingway

Federal Times, November 22, 2006

The Justice Department doesn't have enough staff to run a program that classifies documents, a shortage that puts sensitive information at risk and limits important information-sharing among agencies, according to congressional auditors.

Justice, the third largest classifier of information in the federal government, has 13 full-time positions devoted to information security, according to a Government Accountability Office report. By comparison, the fifth-largest classifier — the Energy Department — has 23 full-time positions. At Justice, one employee oversees classification training programs across the department while three employees oversee compliance at 3,500 department locations.

In 2004 and 2005, the National Archives' Information Security Oversight Office, which oversees all agencies' classification management programs, recommended 10 changes to correct information-sharing problems at Justice and 12 changes at the FBI. FBI has taken action on 11 of 12 recommendations while Justice has taken action on five of 10.

"DOJ, however, has taken no action on the most important recommendation: addressing its staff shortages, which continue to place its program at risk given that it sets policy, provides training and oversees classification practices departmentwide," the report said.

Justice needs a complete work-force strategy for managing classified information because it hasn't determined how much staff it needs or a plan for where to put additional employees first, the report said. For instance, if Justice were to receive more funds for employees in the classification management division, it doesn't know whether to address training, oversight or other program gaps first.

The department's Security and Emergency Planning Office expects to add nine staff members — five full-time employees and four contract employees — to the 13 it has, pending approval of funds. Justice is also waiting for the results of an interagency working group that sets governmentwide standards for sensitive but unclassified information before considering any changes to its practices. Results are due from the group by the end of the calendar year.

Attorney General Speaks To U.S. Air Force Academy Cadets (AFLINK)

By Butch Wehry

Air Force Link, November 22, 2006

11/22/2006 - U.S. AIR FORCE ACADEMY, Colo. (AFPN) -- U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told cadets here Nov. 18, that terrorists will not rise to the example of the United States. The judge addressed civil liberties and war on terrorism issues during his lecture to 700 cadets.

"The United States has rightfully positioned itself in this conflict and other conflicts throughout history as a mature and moral leader -- an example to follow," the attorney general said.

"Yet we know that the fair and humane treatment of the detainees at Guantanamo will have absolutely no effect on how their confederates treat our soldiers and civilians," he said.

Al qaeda seeks to employ weapons of mass destruction as a means of achieving political goals against both the civilian and military capacity of the United States, Europe and American allies throughout the world, Attorney General Gonzales said.

"Its members continue to fight our Armed Forces on battlefields around the world, and they will continue to do so until we stop them," said Judge Gonzales, who attended the U.S. Air Force Academy for two years in the mid-1970s.

"Al qaeda has committed acts on a scale that transcends mere crime, as recognized by NATO immediately after the attacks of September 11th. Their crimes are therefore nothing less than war crimes. Given the magnitude of the atrocities al qaeda has committed, there can be no comparison between the crimes of its members and that of common civilian criminals."

The terrorist members do not and will not obey international law, the law of war or the moral laws of humanity, he said.

"In treating terrorist detainees humanely, we accept that there will be no reciprocity on these issues," he said. "But we do it because of our values as a nation, and because the United States has always stood, and continues to stand, for the rule of law in the world."

Today's war is also fought at home by the law enforcement community that he is now a part of, Judge Gonzales told the cadets.

"From the prosecutors and investigators at the Department of Justice and the FBI to state and local police -- for all of us, just as it is for all of you, every day is Sept. 12," he said.

America's surveillance program is not damaging the civil rights of its citizens, Attorney General Gonzales told cadets.

The speaker told the cadets majoring in law and political science that the country's surveillance does not invade Americans' privacy.

"It protects citizens from terrorist attacks," he said. "Critics who say otherwise are perpetuating myths."

Since his time at the academy there have been many important changes, including the admittance of women, he noted.

"But some things have not changed and should not change ... such as the continued value of academy graduates in insuring the safety of our country from enemies across the world," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Corruption Probes Threaten Germany's Image (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, November 24, 2006

Siemens, DaimlerChrysler Get Caught Up in Inquiries; A Backlog of Court Cases

FRANKFURT -- Germany Inc. is churning with charges of corruption and deceit, threatening to undermine perceptions that the world's third-largest economy is one of the cleanest places on earth to do business.

Front and center is Siemens AG, the engineering conglomerate enmeshed in a widening cross-border probe into alleged fraud and possible bribery. German prosecutors Wednesday said that they had unearthed €200 million ($257 million) in suspicious transactions after more than 200 police officers searched about 30 offices and homes of Siemens employees last week and seized 36,000 documents. Prosecutors say six suspects are being held in jail. Siemens says it is cooperating in the investigation.

The probe comes as several other German industrial titans have been buffeted by corruption probes. Prosecutors yesterday charged a former manager of auto maker DaimlerChrysler AG for allegedly cheating the company out of €40 million. The company itself is under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department amid allegations it maintained secret bank accounts around the world to bribe foreign government officials. The company has acknowledged making "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe, and has dismissed or suspended several employees.

Wednesday, the European Commission accused German utility E.On AG of tampering with evidence related to an antitrust investigation -- an accusation E.On says is unjustified.

In September, a Munich court sentenced a former purchasing manager at BMW AG to three years in prison after he admitted accepting bribes from suppliers seeking to do business. A BMW spokesman described the case as an "isolated" matter that didn't represent any trend or reach top management.

The recent wave of scandals comes nearly a decade after Germany beefed up its laws and increased sentencing guidelines to crack down on corporate corruption -- moves that included the elimination of legislation that had allowed companies to write off international bribes as expenses. More than 90% of Germany's publicly listed companies have agreed to follow tougher corporate-governance rules introduced in 2003.

But there are signs white-collar crime in Germany is getting worse. German authorities documented 89,224 corporate crimes in 2005, up 10% from the year before. And German companies surveyed this year by KPMG LLP estimated that about 80% of white-collar crimes go unreported. Wolfgang Schaupensteiner, senior corruption prosecutor in the country's financial capital, Frankfurt, thinks even that number is too conservative and pegs it at closer to 95%.

Mr. Schaupensteiner says his four-person team of special prosecutors has more than 500 suspects in the pipeline. German courts also have a backlog of cases -- including one involving charges that two Siemens officials paid €6 million in bribes to secure business in Italy. "We don't have enough hands," Mr. Schaupensteiner says.

Some industry analysts note that competitive pressures in the auto industry, where Germany is home to several big players, create potential for rising corruption. Auto makers working to keep prices low are increasingly buying more parts from outside suppliers in Eastern Europe and Asia.

"When you owned your own system, who were you going to bribe?" says Lars Holmqvist, chief executive of the European Association of Automotive Suppliers in Brussels. He said roughly 75% of the value of a typical new car today comes from materials or items furnished by suppliers, up from about 20% 50 years ago.

Germany enjoys the 16th-best rating on Transparency International's Corruption Perception Index of 163 countries, putting it behind nations such as Finland and New Zealand but slightly ahead of Japan and the U.S. To date, it hasn't been hit by a scandal on the scale of an Enron Corp., the U.S. energy firm that collapsed amid accounting fraud. But Germany is also the world's leading exporter, and some cases have focused on whether bribes were paid in less-developed countries.

Transparency International recently suspended Siemens's membership in the nongovernmental watchdog group following a string of allegations linking the conglomerate to bribery. "We have to find out if they're really doing their homework," says Caspar von Hauenschild, a Transparency International board member in Germany.

German prosecutors, working in conjunction with Italian and Swiss authorities, said Wednesday that six people were under arrest as part of a suspected criminal ring inside Siemens that carried out repeated fraud through secret bank accounts set up in other countries. Investigators last week said they suspected money was being diverted to pay bribes for business contracts.

Authorities searched the offices of Klaus Kleinfeld, the chief executive, and other members of Siemens's management board last week as part of the probe. Mr. Kleinfeld is being treated as a witness, not a suspect, according to German prosecutors. But prosecutors also have confirmed that one of the employees jailed is Michael Kutschenreuter, the head of Siemens's real-estate division and the former chief financial officer of its telecommunications unit. Mr. Kutschenreuter couldn't be reached for comment.

Siemens yesterday said that it was setting up a task force to improve internal controls, and it plans to strengthen its existing business-conduct code. Last week, it announced it would hire an ombudsman.

Other German companies also are taking additional steps. Car maker Volkswagen AG, fighting fallout from a 17-month investigation into alleged bribery of top union officials, appointed two ombudsmen earlier this year to collect tips on potential wrongdoing from company whistle-blowers. DaimlerChrysler has established a "corporate compliance operations" department to ensure anticorruption laws aren't broken.

Eon Faces EU Fine Over Break-in Allegation (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0097499

By George Parker, Ralph Atkins

Financial Times, November 23, 2006

Eon, Germany's biggest energy group, was on Wednesday facing a possible fine of hundreds of millions of euros after a sealed room was allegedly entered overnight during a two-day raid by European Union cartel busters.

The case is viewed by officials in Brussels as "a serious violation" of rules designed to prevent a company tampering with evidence, in this case relating to an inquiry into anti-competitive abuses in the energy sector.

The case comes at a highly sensitive time for Eon, whose powerful position in the German energy market is under scrutiny in Brussels, which is preparing legislation to loosen the grip of incumbent energy suppliers on national networks.

Neelie Kroes, EU competition commissioner, has written to the company saying she believes it "intentionally or at least negligently" broke an official seal fixed on an office door.

Her officials carried out raids on the offices of several German energy groups, including Eon Energie, in May.

Officials scouring Eon offices in Munich for evidence were unable to complete their work in a single day and sealed an office overnight with a "tamper-proof" security label to secure the documents inside.

When they returned in the morning the seal had allegedly been broken, a violation that could cost the company a fine of up to 1 per cent of its annual turnover. Eon last year had total sales of €56.4bn (£37.5bn, $72bn).

Eon said on Wednesday night: "We sent to the European Commission some time ago a comprehensive written comment, according to which the accusation of seal-breaking was unfounded.

"This was supported by an expert opinion. Clarification talks with the EU Commission are envisaged in early December."

A spokesman for Ms Kroes said this was the first case of a company allegedly breaking a Brussels seal, making it impossible to gauge the level at which the European Commission might set any fine, but the matter was deemed serious.

The company has requested an oral hearing to present its case and a final decision will be taken by the 25 members of the European Commission.

Eon could then challenge that decision through the courts.

EU Charges E.ON With Impeding Antitrust Investigation (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, November 22, 2006

Nov. 22 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators charged E.ON AG, Europe's largest energy utility, with impeding an antitrust investigation into the German electricity market, threatening to fine the company as much as hundreds of millions of euros.

The European Commission, the EU's Brussels-based antitrust regulator, said in a statement that it is pursing a case against E.ON because the company ``intentionally or at least negligently'' broke a seal placed on an office by regulators ``to secure documents found in the course of an unannounced inspection.''

The EU sent the company a statement detailing the allegations on Oct. 2, commission spokesman Jonathan Todd said today. It's the first time the EU has charged a company with tampering with seals after a commission inspection.

EU officials carried out surprise visits at German utilities on May 29 and May 30, searching for evidence of possible market-sharing, price-fixing and unfair business practices. Under EU rules, companies can be fined as much as 1 percent of total sales for the preceding year for breaking seals placed during raids. In 2005, E.ON's total sales were 56.4 billion ($73 billion), meaning the company could face a maximum 564 million-euro penalty.

E.ON spokesman Josef Nelles at the company's headquarters in Dusseldorf didn't immediately reply to voice and e-mail messages from Bloomberg News seeking comment. Gerhard Wiedemann, a lawyer at Freshfields Bruckhaus Deringer in Dusseldorf for E.ON, also didn't immediately reply to a phone message.

Shares of E.ON fell 48 cents, or 0.5 percent, to 96.62 euros as of 4:21 p.m. in Frankfurt.

Legal Action

DOJ_NMG_0097500

EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes on Feb. 16 threatened legal action against utilities that bar rivals from using power grids and pipelines. As part of a bid to lower energy costs, Kroes said she will fine or impose restraints on utilities that abuse their dominance in the power and natural-gas markets. No company has been charged following the May inspections.

In the February report, the commission said electricity markets remain concentrated among monopolies, preventing competitors from offering services. The study found that companies ``can influence prices on certain wholesale markets."

National obstacles risk undermining EU legislation that gave businesses the right to choose power and gas suppliers beginning in July 2004 and will extend that option to households in July next year.

The commission will issue a report on the energy market on Jan. 10.

Ex - DaimlerChrysler Manager Charged (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

STUTTGART, Germany (AP) -- Prosecutors said Thursday they had charged a former DaimlerChrysler AG manager with breach of trust and falsifying documents for allegedly cheating the carmaker out of 40 million euros ($52 million).

The 41-year-old, who has been in investigative custody for a year, is accused of filing fake invoices between 2000 and 2005 for computer services that were never delivered, state prosecutors in Stuttgart said.

Three other people are accused as accessories for submitting the false invoices on the instructions of the former manager, who worked at the German-U.S. car maker's finance department.

Prosecutor Bettina Fetter said investigators had seized 20 million euros ($26 million) from the manager.

It was unclear when the manager, whose name was not released, will go on trial.

The case is one of several exposing murky dealings by DaimlerChrysler employees.

On Nov. 13, the company announced that the head of its bus unit, Wolfgang Diez, had resigned after an internal investigation discovered "irregularities" at the division. Several executives have also been suspended.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and Department of Justice are investigating whether the firm violated U.S. anti-bribery laws.

DaimlerChrysler has said it found evidence of "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. Several employees have been dismissed or suspended in consequence of those investigations.

DaimlerChrysler shares were down 0.6 percent at 46.61 euros ($60.03) on the Frankfurt exchange.

Monster Fires Counsel Amid Options Probe (AP)

By Vinnee Tong, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 22, 2006

Monster Worldwide Inc., the parent of job search site Monster.com, said Wednesday it terminated Myron Olesnyckyj, the company's lead lawyer, as part of its investigation into past stock-option grant practices.

Olesnyckyj, the company's general counsel, is the second high-ranking executive to leave the company over backdated stock options. Andrew J. McKelvey resigned his posts as chairman and chief executive on Oct. 9 but at the time retained his seat on the board as chairman emeritus. He resigned fully on Oct. 30, citing an unwillingness to sit for further questions over the company's backdating practices in the past.

Monster spokesman Robert Jones said Wednesday that no other employees have been suspended.

The U.S. attorney's office in the Southern District of New York has issued a subpoena to the company over options backdating, and a special committee of company directors has said it wants to complete its own investigation by the end of the year.

Olesnyckyj was suspended on Sept. 19. He had held the titles of senior vice president, general counsel and secretary.

The company said on Oct. 25 that it found pricing problems in a "substantial number" of its past option grants, and as a result it expected to restate its results from 1997 through 2005. Monster said it does not expect the restatements to affect its results for this year.

DOJ_NMG_0097501

The company has delayed filing its earnings results for the second and third quarters. Jones said the company would file its second quarter results on Dec. 13. Third-quarter numbers would be issued "as soon as practicable," according to a Nov. 7 statement from the company.

Backdating an option means retroactively setting the option's strike price to a day when the stock traded cheaply. An option with a lower strike price is more valuable because it's less expensive to exercise. The practice is not necessarily illegal, but must be disclosed to shareholders.

In a statement, the company said Olesnyckyj was terminated "for cause."

Monster is one of more than 180 companies conducting internal investigations or subject to probes by the Securities and Exchange Commission or the Department of Justice concerning potential backdating of stock options.

Several top executives at other companies have resigned over options investigations. They include: UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chief Executive William McGuire, KLA-Tencor Corp. Chairman Kenneth Levy, CNet Networks Inc. Chief Executive Shelby Bonnie and McAfee Inc. CEO George Samenuk. McGuire quit as chairman earlier this month and will resign as CEO by Dec. 1.

Shares of Monster rose 8 cents to close at $45.02 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

CRIMINAL LAW:

18 Cities, Areas Picked For Crime Study (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, November 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The government selected 18 cities and sprawling suburban regions Wednesday to study for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally.

The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity _ including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault _ rising by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase in violent crimes since 2001.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study at a Boston meeting last month with police chiefs and other law enforcement officials. It will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for any trends, and identifying federal programs that can help.

It was not clear whether more federal funding will be available for cities, but Justice Department officials said that "new initiatives" could be created, if necessary.

The cities and regions are: Atlanta; Boston; metropolitan Charlotte, N.C.; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Columbus, Ohio; Hartford, Conn.; Houston; Jersey City, N.J.; metropolitan Kansas City, Mo.; Miami; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Nashville, Tenn.; Oklahoma City; Omaha, Neb.; Portland, Ore.; San Bernardino County, Calif.; San Diego; and the cities constituting the Tidewater, Va., area.

Houston Violent Crime To Be Studied (AP)

Houston is among 18 cities and suburban regions selected Wednesday by the federal government to be studied for clues on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally.

The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity — including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault — up by 2.2 percent from last year.

That marked the first increase in violent crimes since 2001.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the study at a meeting last month in Boston with police chiefs and other law enforcement officials.

It will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for trends and identifying federal programs that can help.

DOJ_NMG_0097502

Houston has recorded 345 homicides so far this year, already surpassing last year's total of 336 slayings. Earlier this year, the city was on pace to record nearly 400 for the year — which would be the highest number of killings Houston has seen in a year in more than a decade.

In June, the FBI released a preliminary report that showed Houston's violent-crime rate rose 2.4 percent in 2005. Nonviolent crime decreased by 1.7 percent in the city.

Houston Police Department spokesman Gabe Ortiz said the department has been in contact with local congressional leaders but that it is unclear what the federal government will require for its study.

"We don't see that happening until next year," Ortiz said.

The other cities and regions are: Atlanta; Boston; metropolitan Charlotte, N.C.; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Columbus, Ohio; Hartford, Conn.; Jersey City, N.J.; metropolitan Kansas City, Mo.; Miami; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Nashville, Tenn.; Oklahoma City; Omaha, Neb.; Portland, Ore.; San Bernardino County, Calif.; San Diego; and the cities constituting the Tidewater, Va., area.

Violence Merits Closer Look (HARTC)

Hartford's Rising Crime Rate Leads To City's Inclusion In Federal Study

The rise in Hartford's violent crime has caught the attention of the federal government, which plans to study why violence is increasing here and in 17 other municipalities across the country, the U.S. Justice Department said.

By studying crime patterns in Hartford and elsewhere, U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said, the government hopes to shed light on why violent crime has increased in some cities and metropolitan areas and not in others.

Other areas selected for the Initiative for Safer Communities study are: Atlanta; Boston; Charlotte, N.C.; Colorado Springs, Colo.; Columbus, Ohio; Houston; Jersey City, N.J.; Kansas City, Mo.; Miami; Minneapolis; Nashville; Oklahoma City, Okla.; Omaha, Neb.; Portland, Ore.; San Bernardino County, Calif.; San Diego; and the Tidewater area of Virginia. The cities and metropolitan areas were picked because they represent a cross-section of the country in terms of size, geographic location and rate of violent crime, federal officials say.

Nationally, violent crimes - such as murder, rapes, robberies and aggravated assaults - rose by 2.2 percent last year, the first such increase in five years, according to the Justice Department.

"Although the 2005 rate was significantly lower than it was in 2002, 2001 and 2000 ... even a small uptick in violent crime cannot be ignored," Gonzales said. "The Department of Justice is committed to making sure that every American city and town can share in the success of low violent crime rates," Gonzales told leaders in law enforcement last month in Boston.

"The Initiative for Safer Communities will help us find and use the tools that work most effectively to fight crime and keep our communities safe," Gonzales said.

The study is also intended to find out what other cities are doing to reduce crime and to implement programs that work.

Police officials in Hartford were unavailable Thursday to comment on the study.

Hartford's crime rate has climbed steadily over the past two years. In recent weeks, three teenagers were shot, including one fatally on Garden Street; a mother was accused of stabbing her three young children on Ashley Street; and a woman walking in Bushnell Park in the afternoon was raped.

In 2005, Hartford police reported a 56.2 percent increase in murders, for a total of 25 homicides, while aggravated assaults increased by 22.6 percent. If not for the assaults and murders, violent crimes in the city would have declined by 4.8 percent, according to statistics provided by the Hartford Police Department.

As of Sunday, the number of Hartford homicides stood at 21, about the same number as this time last year, city records show. The city is seeing a decrease in reported rapes. As of Nov. 4, the most recent available statistics reported, there were 44 rapes, a 22.8 percent decrease over the same period last year. There were 628 aggravated assaults, up 11.7 percent from the same period last year. The city also reported 174 shooting victims as of Nov. 4, a 19.2 percent increase over the same period last year.

An Associated Press report is included in this story.

Charlotte Chosen For Crime Study (CO)

By Kytja Weir

The Charlotte Observer, November 23, 2006

Charlotte was one of 18 areas around the country chosen Wednesday to be part of a government study on why homicides and other violent crimes are on the rise nationally.

Charlotte-Mecklenburg police welcome being part of the inquiry, said spokeswoman Julie Hill. She noted the department is always looking clues on what is driving crime increases.

The Justice Department study comes after FBI data in September showed violent criminal activity -- including rape, murder, robbery and aggravated assault -- rising by 2.2 percent from last year. That marked the first increase in violent crimes since 2001.

In Charlotte, crime jumped significantly last year. The number of violent crimes rose 9 percent. Charlotte-Mecklenburg also set a 10-year record for homicides, with 85 killings.

That helped the Queen City earn the dubious title last month of the eighth-most-dangerous big city in the country in the annual Morgan Quitno Press rankings. Charlotte ranked 43rd most dangerous among all 371 cities in the report from the Lawrence, Kan.-based private research firm. The police department and other experts dismiss the rankings as unfair comparisons that don't take into account differences among cities.

The situation may be improving slightly. Robberies are down 11 percent, Hill said. But October was a deadly month. As of Wednesday, police had investigated 74 homicides this year, close to the 76 that police had investigated by the same time last year.

No one has been able to pinpoint why Charlotte and other cities have seen such spikes in crime.

The Associated Press reported that new study will be rolled out in three phases: looking at crime increases in cities, analyzing those results for trends and identifying federal programs that can help. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the new study at a Boston meeting last month that Charlotte-Mecklenburg police Chief Darrel Stephens and other law enforcement officials attended.

Stephens has been pushing for increased federal funding to promote "hometown" security, not just the "homeland" security efforts that have been the focus of federal agencies, Hill said.

It was not clear whether more federal funding will be available for cities as part of the new study, but Justice Department officials said that "new initiatives" could be created.

Judge Finds Grand Jury Secrecy Breach In China Spy Case (NYSUN)

By Josh Gerstein

New York Sun, November 24, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Officials involved in investigating a California family's alleged espionage for China apparently violated grand jury secrecy rules by telling a reporter details of plans to seek a new indictment in the case, a federal judge ruled this week.

Judge Cormac Carney concluded that defense lawyers were justified in their objection to a May 16 Washington Times story by William Gertz that said prosecutors were preparing to bring more serious charges against three related individuals, Chi Mak, Rebecca Chiu, and Tai Mak, who were charged initially with failing to register as agents of China.

"The information contained in Mr. Gertz's article clearly raises a prima facie violation," Judge Carney, who sits in Santa Ana, Calif., wrote in an order released Wednesday. The judge said the information in the Times account was attributed to "senior Justice Department officials who have approved the new charges."

On October 25, Chi Mak and his wife, Ms. Chiu, as well as Tai Mak and his wife and son, Fuk Li and Billy Yui Mak, were indicted for conspiracy to export defense technology to China. According to court records, the technology in question involved designs for systems to quiet sounds emitted from American warships. Several other new charges were filed, all essentially as predicted by Mr. Gertz's May 16 report.

By the time that article was published, a prosecutor on the case, Gregory Staples, had already said in open court that he expected a new indictment in the case, but the details of the additional charges were not widely known.

In his ruling, Judge Carney indicated that the Justice Department has begun an investigation into the apparent leak. He ordered the government to report by January 5 on the status of the leak probe and to describe the prosecution's efforts "to insure that no improper communications take place with Mr. Gertz, or any other member of the public."

The New York Sun reported last month that Judge Carney rejected a defense request to subpoena Mr. Gertz to testify at a pre-trial hearing.

Tai Mak and his wife, Ms. Li, were arrested at Los Angeles International Airport in October 2005 as they prepared to board a flight to Hong Kong. Authorities said the couple had in their luggage a CD-ROM containing details about the Navy propulsion systems. Prosecutors said the data came from Tai Mak's brother, Chi Mak, who worked at a defense contractor, Power Paragon.

All the defendants have pleaded not guilty.

Elderly Woman's Family Seeks Federal Probe Of Shooting (CNN)

CNN.com, November 23, 2006

ATLANTA, Georgia (CNN) -- As family members spent Thanksgiving Day boarding up the home of a 92-year-old woman who was shot to death during a police drug raid, their spokesman said they will request a federal investigation.

"Given recent statements by Atlanta's Assistant Police Chief Alan Dreher and Fulton County District Attorney Paul Howard, the family and I have serious and, we believe, founded doubt that absent intense federal oversight, a comprehensive investigation will ever ensue," said the Rev. Markel Hutchins, who has been advising the family of Kathryn Johnston.

Hutchins said he planned to travel to Washington next week to hand-deliver a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office requesting a federal investigation of the incident. (Watch niece's outrage over shooting. -- 2:55)

Meanwhile Thursday, the Atlanta Police Department asserted that the narcotics team who raided the home Tuesday and fatally shot Johnston after she shot and wounded three officers is sure it had the right house.

Police spokesman Joe Cobb said the three officers on that team had made an undercover drug buy earlier in day from a man inside Johnston's home west of downtown Atlanta.

Police said they obtained a "no-knock" search warrant within hours of making the buy and went back to the house to serve it. But Dreher said the officers did announce themselves right before they broke the burglar bars and wood door to get inside.

Johnston, who relatives said lived alone, fired at officers with a revolver as they entered her home, wounding three, Dreher said. At least one of the officers fired back, killing the woman, he said.

The injured officers are expected to fully recover, Dreher said, and are on administrative leave with pay while the investigation is under way.

No-knock warrants allow police to enter a home or building without announcing their presence or identity. They are commonly used in narcotics cases when it is feared that the suspects may try to dispose of drugs or evidence in the time it takes authorities to gain access to the home.

But Dreher said Wednesday that officers had a marked patrol vehicle in the street in front of the home, a uniformed officer in the yard, and the narcotics teams wore vests with "POLICE" marked clearly on the front and back.

Two of Johnston's neighbors, Nina Robinson and Sallie Strickland, said the elderly woman was fearful and never let anyone into her home. Strickland said Johnston wouldn't even let her come in when she brought groceries for her, instead telling Strickland to leave them on the porch.

Police have not released the search warrant or the affidavit supporting it. Cobb said Georgia's open records law allows police to withhold evidence -- including 911 tapes and search warrants -- during an open investigation.

After the shooting, the search was conducted and officers did find suspected narcotics that are being tested at a laboratory, Dreher said.

A warrant has been issued for the arrest of the man who allegedly sold the undercover officers drugs earlier that day in the home, which is in a neighborhood known for drug activity, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0097505

Howard previously has said his office was investigating the shooting, and said he had requested that the Georgia Bureau of Investigation ensure all forensic evidence is collected. Dreher has also promised a "complete, thorough and fair investigation."

Hutchins said he has spoken with Reps. John Lewis and Cynthia McKinney of Georgia regarding the shooting.

"As this horrific incident has all of the signs of an egregious violation of Ms. Johnston's civil and human rights at worst, and police officers using poor judgment and unnecessary force at best, I appealed for both of their support and assistance in our efforts to get an immediate audience with the United States Department of Justice," he said.

Local Woman Accused Of Katrina Relief Fraud (HC)

By Cindy George

Houston Chronicle, November 24, 2006

A Houston woman arrested this month joins 30 others in the Houston area who face federal charges for trying to collect money intended for victims of hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

An October indictment against Yolanda Yvette Thomas, 27, accused her of filing a false claim for Hurricane Katrina disaster aid, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas reported. She was arrested Nov. 6 and is free on $10,000 bail.

Thomas is accused of submitting a claim to the Federal Emergency Management Agency that falsely said her primary address was on Cameron Boulevard in New Orleans.

The indictment also accuses Thomas of falsely stating that she lost work as a result of Katrina and had an essential need for food, clothing and shelter because of the storm. If convicted, she faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Katrina and its aftermath devastated the New Orleans area in August 2005. Rita brought its wrath to parts of Southeast Texas the next month.

Shortly after the storms, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales created the Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force to investigate and prosecute the illegal use of hurricane disaster aid.

A Government Accountability Office report released this summer found that FEMA aid paid for football tickets, a Caribbean vacation and a sex change operation.

Those charged in Houston have been accused in various schemes.

In May, a federal grand jury returned a 22-count indictment alleging that Michael James Green, 25, of Houston, received $2,000 in expedited disaster assistance for each of 18 fraudulent applications that said the storms caused him to lose work.

He is accused of filing claims under 18 Social Security numbers and for 18 different addresses in Texas and Louisiana. If convicted, he could go to prison for two decades.

A nine-count indictment handed down in September charged two Houston men with setting up a phony Salvation Army look-alike Web site to raise about $48,000 for their own accounts.

If convicted, Steven Anyanwu Stephens and Bartholomew Stephens face maximum prison terms of 20 years and fines of $250,000.

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Judge Rules Out National Vioxx Class Action (AP)

By Janet McConnaughey

AP, November 27, 2006

Thousands of federal lawsuits claiming the drug Vioxx caused heart attacks and other conditions that killed or injured people cannot be pooled into one national class action, a New Orleans federal judge has ruled.

U.S. District Court Judge Eldon Fallon, who was appointed to deal with pretrial matters for all federal suits involving Merck & Co.'s withdrawn painkiller, did not rule on the possibility of separate class action suits for each state and the District of Columbia.

DOJ_NMG_0097506

"We are pleased with the decision," said Kent Jarrell, a spokesman for Merck, which wants to try every suit individually. He said the company is putting together a more detailed response.

Russ Herman, chairman of a committee of plaintiffs lawyers, said he had expected the decision. "Federal jurisprudence currently tracks an industry theory that thousands of injured people should litigate individually in order to give a single wrongful manufacturer due process," he said.

Fallon's 25-page ruling rejected the plaintiffs' proposal to try all of the cases under New Jersey laws. They argued that the company should reasonably expect to follow the laws of the state where it is headquartered.

"While this is true, it is just as true that Merck, an international corporation providing its drugs to every state in the nation, should expect to abide by every jurisdiction's laws," Fallon wrote.

Since plaintiffs in other states couldn't reasonably expect their personal injury claims to be governed by New Jersey law, it makes more sense to apply the law of each plaintiff's home state to that plaintiff's claims, Fallon ruled.

"Each plaintiff's home jurisdiction has a stronger interest in deterring foreign corporations from personally injuring its citizens and ensuring that its citizens are compensated than New Jersey does in deterring its corporate citizens' wrongdoing," he wrote.

Herman said the plaintiffs' committee will ask Fallon to have one class action suit on the single question of whether Vioxx, which was sold from late 1999 until September 2004, changed the cardiovascular system in ways that caused heart attacks.

Fallon wrote he was "confident that common questions exist" in the 7,000-plus federal lawsuits -- something required for class actions.

But, he said, allegations that Merck failed to warn doctors adequately about the drug's alleged health risk "necessarily turn on numerous individualized issues."

He wrote these issues include "the alleged injury; what Merck knew about the risks of the alleged injury when the patient was prescribed Vioxx; what Merck told physicians and consumers about those risks in the Vioxx label and other media, what the plaintiffs' physicians knew about the risks from other sources, and whether the plaintiffs' physicians would still have prescribed Vioxx had stronger warnings been given."

Merck has vowed to fight each Vioxx case individually. Its shares rose 30 cents to $44.52 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Merck has won six cases, three each in federal and various state district courts. A fourth state court victory was overturned and a retrial ordered. The company has lost one federal case and three in state courts.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds' Plan In Osceola Criticized As 'absurd' (ORS)

By Mark Pino

The Orlando Sentinel, November 23, 2006

All five Osceola County Commission seats would be up for grabs in a special election next year if a federal judge agrees with a proposal submitted Wednesday by the U.S. Department of Justice.

The department sued the county last year, alleging that the current at-large system of electing commissioners dilutes the Hispanic vote.

The judge last month ordered that proposed remedies be filed by Wednesday after declaring Osceola's system of countywide elections has penalized Hispanics in a "racially polarized" county in violation of the U.S. Voting Rights Act.

Commissioners, who approved a proposal with five single-member and two at-large districts on Nov. 13, were stunned by the government's proposal.

"That's absolutely absurd," commission Chairman Paul Owen said. "It surprises me they had the audacity to do that. All five at one time -- that's a deal-breaker for me. I would definitely appeal if it were up to me, but I'm only one vote."

DOJ_NMG_0097507

Four of five commissioners reached Wednesday said a decision to appeal couldn't be made until U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell issues a final ruling. It is not known when that might happen. Presnell could implement a plan submitted by either side or come up with his own.

The Justice Department asked for a hearing, and it is possible Presnell will want to hear from both parties. A county official said Osceola is not opposed to such a hearing.

In addition to seeking elections for all five commission seats, the Justice Department's 21-page memo outlines two different single-member plans centered on a Hispanic-majority district that includes the Buenaventura Lakes community and the adjacent Kissimmee neighborhood of Lakeside.

Among the department's objections to the county's plan:

It doesn't cure Hispanic "vote dilution."

The districts were created with "fatally flawed" population estimates.

The court lacks the authority to expand the commission from five to seven members.

"[T]he United States believes that all five county BCC [Board of County Commission] seats should be held open for election in the 2007 special BCC elections under the new plan," according to court documents. "Each current incumbent was elected under an ethnically dilutive voting scheme, and thus the equities here militate strongly in favor of holding elections for all BCC seats at the first opportunity."

Hispanics make up about a third of the county population, but only one has ever been elected to the commission, under single-member voting a decade ago. Single-member district proponent and commission candidate Armando Ramirez was pleased with the federal proposal.

"Let all of them run. It will be fair and equitable. This is a new page, a new beginning," he said. "I sincerely believe the U.S. Justice Department's new proposal is an excellent remedy to cure our current electoral process."

The county held a public hearing last week where about two dozen of 125 people attending gave their thoughts on the county's proposal. Sentiment at the meeting ran about 2-to-1 in favor of the combination districts, prompting the county to write that its proposal "was tested in the court of public opinion."

But the Justice Department wrote that "a five single-member district plan with a district in which Hispanic voters can elect a candidate of choice remedies the violation. Adding two at-large districts is incidental to that remedy and adds back in the at-large feature that the court found violated Section 2" of the Voting Rights Act.

Both Justice Department plans leave open for an upcoming election a district where 57 percent of the registered voters are Hispanic. But in one plan, commissioners Ken Shipley and Ken Smith would find themselves in the same district, with a second open seat also before voters. The second plan puts the two incumbents in different districts.

The Justice Department noted that the court might not want all five commissioners to be up for re-election in 2007 and offered staggered elections as an alternative.

"The federal attorneys have turned in their list of unrealistic demands whereas the BCC have provided an honorable legislative solution," Shipley said. He added that the Justice Department's plan, based on 2000 census figures, unfairly means that about 59,000 residents who have moved here since then were not considered in the department's districts.

Osceola has spent nearly $2 million in fees for attorneys and experts defending itself.

State Rep. John Quinones, R-Kissimmee, said there is still time for compromise.

"We have a situation where the Department of Justice is taking a very different position, but I think there's still room to work out a compromise. We haven't given that a chance," said Quinones, who has supported a 5-2 commission setup even before the county proposed it.

Microsoft Makes Deadline On Windows Info (AP-YBIZ)

By Aoife White, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 23, 2006

EU Says Microsoft Has Handed in Information on Windows Workings by Deadline

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- European Union regulators said Microsoft Corp. handed in on time to meet a Thursday deadline information about its Windows operating software that should help other software companies.

The data will now be tested to confirm that the company has finally complied with a 2004 antitrust ruling.

The European Commission, which fined Microsoft 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July for not providing the "complete and accurate" data to allow server software to interface with Windows, said the technical manual can now be reviewed by "potential licensees" -- companies who compete with Microsoft in making software for workgroup servers, such as Sun Microsystems Inc., Novell Inc., International Business Machines Corp. among others.

"In parallel the monitoring trustee will test the documentation in order to verify its accuracy," it said.

"The commission will decide in due course whether or not Microsoft is in compliance with the obligation to provide complete and accurate technical documentation taking into account comments from the potential licensees and advice from the trustee."

EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said this would likely take "months rather than weeks."

Regulators threatened new fines of 3 million euros ($3.87 million) a day last week if Microsoft did not patch up "the remaining omissions and deficiencies." They said the company should have handed over a good set of documents explaining how server protocols work by an original July 2004 deadline.

The software maker was ordered to provide the information after the EU found it guilty of abusing its monopoly by deliberately withholding technical data from rivals, who alleged that Microsoft ended cooperation when it started making its own server software.

Microsoft challenged the immediate sanctions but a judge ordered it to comply in December 2004. It also said the commission's request was unclear and it only received a useful set of guidelines when independent monitor Neil Barrett set out a work program earlier this year.

The company said Thursday's decision was an important milestone.

"The trustee and Microsoft have now completed the technical review and edits to the more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages, that we submitted in July of this year, in accordance with the deadline established by the commission," it said in a statement.

"We will continue to work closely with the commission and the trustee to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the commission's decision."

The EU fined Microsoft a record 497 million euros ($613 million) in March 2004 and told it both to share interoperability information with rivals and put on sale a copy of Windows without Media Player software.

These conditions will apply to all future versions of Windows -- including the upcoming Vista operating system.

Regulators also highlighted other possible antitrust problems with Vista's wide range of functions, fueled by comments from other information technology companies, warning that Microsoft must take care not to abuse its dominant position by muscling into other markets.

Microsoft Moves To Appease Brussels (FT)

By George Parker In Brussels

Financial Times, November 24, 2006

Microsoft yesterday claimed to have met a new Brussels deadline to hand over documents to its rivals, in a move designed to head off the threat of further anti-trust fines of up to €3m ($3.9m) a day.

The company said it had completed technical work on more than 100 documents, totalling 8,500 pages, in line with the Thanksgiving Day deadline set by Neelie Kroes, European Union competition commissioner, earlier this month.

Ms Kroes's department said the documents would be carefully studied to ensure they provided the required information to rivals.

"We will decide in due course whether or not Microsoft is in compliance with the obligation to provide complete and accurate technical documentation," it said.

DOJ_NMG_0097509

Microsoft was fined €497m by the European Commission in March 2004 forabusing its monopoly position and €280m in July for failing to hand over complete documents to rivals.

The case relates to Microsoft's Windows operating system, which the Commission ruled did not offer enough interoperability for other software.

Ms Kroes has become increasingly agitated by the company's failure to comply fully with the 2004 ruling and will want to ensure the interface documentation meets her requirements.

They will be assessed by a trustee, Professor Neil Barrett, a computer expert suggested by Microsoft and appointed by Ms Kroes to advise the Commission on the company's compliance with the ruling.

She has said she could fine Microsoft up to €3m a dayif the relevant documents are not handed over, backdated to the last deadline of July 31.

Potential rivals to Microsoft can now review the documentation made available by the company to see whether it contains the necessary information to develop interoperable work group server operating system products.

Microsoft said yesterday there had been an unprecedented effort by more than 300 engineers and technical writers to review the technical documents to meet the Brussels deadline.

"We look forward to receiving feedback from the industry," the company said in a statement.

EU Says Microsoft Meets Key Deadline In Antitrust Showdown (AFP)

AFP, November 23, 2006

The European Commission said that Microsoft has met a key deadline in its antitrust standoff with the US software giant, staving off the threat of further fines.

Last week the European Union's executive arm gave Microsoft until November 23 -- Thanksgiving in the United States -- to reveal the secret software protocol for its Windows operating system so that competitors can make rival products.

If it missed the deadline, Microsoft faced the threat of daily fines of up to three million euros, which could have amounted to as much as 350 million euros (448 million dollars) and bring its total penalty to over one billion euros.

"The European Commission can confirm that Microsoft has submitted a revised version of the technical documentation with a view to meeting the requirements of the Commission's March 2004 Decision," the EU executive said in a statement.

Microsoft, which has fought tooth and nail against Brussels regulators in the case, struck a conciliatory note, saying in a statement that it aimed to "work closely" with the Commission.

"We are pleased that the Commission has recognized our efforts to comply with our documentation obligations, and we will continue to work closely with the Commission... to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the Commission's decision," it said.

The US company has long clashed with the Commission over the crushing market power of its Windows operating system and was fined a record 497 million euros in a landmark March 2004 antitrust ruling.

In addition to fining Microsoft, the EU ordered the company to sell a version of its Windows operating system without Media Player software and to divulge the software protocols underpinning Windows for makers of rival products.

Microsoft challenged the 2004 ruling in the EU's second-highest court in April, but the judges are not expected to hand down a decision before the end of the year at the earliest.

Frustrated with Microsoft's defiance at some of its demands, the Commission in July slapped daily fines adding up to 280.5 million euros over the six-month period of the penalty for failing to fully respect the 2004 antitrust ruling. Microsoft is appealing against the charges.

EU Says Expects Decision On Microsoft Compliance In 'months Rather Than Weeks' (AFX)

AFX, November 23, 2006

BRUSSELS (AFX) - The European Commission said it will decide on whether interface information submitted by Microsoft Corp achieves full antitrust compliance in 'months rather than weeks'.

A spokesman for EU competition commissioner Neelie Kroes commented on the timing of the decision when questioned by reporters.

The US software company is seeking to comply with the EU's antitrust decision of 2004 and thus avoid a daily fine of as much as 3 mln eur.

The commission ordered the group to, among other things, disclose and license interface documentation which would allow non-Microsoft work group servers to achieve full interoperability with Windows PCs and servers.

EU Says Microsoft Has Submitted Requested Data (DOW)

Dow Jones Newswire, November 23, 2006

BRUSSELS (Dow Jones)--Microsoft Corp. (MSFT) has met a deadline to hand over data to European antitrust regulators, the European Commission said Thursday.

The commission will review the information to decide if the U.S. software giant has complied with its order to provide complete and accurate technical specifications to help rivals produce server software that will work smoothly with its Windows operating system.

Microsoft faced the threat of new fines if it hadn't provided the data.

This represents the latest chapter in one of the most high profile, long-lasting antitrust battles. While the U.S. authorities have settled their grievances against the company, European regulators have continued to battle with the software company.

In March 2004, the commission fined Microsoft a record EUR497 million, or more than $600 million, and ordered it to change some of its business practices. The company appealed that ruling at an E.U. court. The court's decision is expected next year. The commission fined Microsoft an additional EUR280.5 million in July for defying its antitrust orders.

Microsoft welcomed the commission's declaration that they had met the deadline. The company said more than 300 engineers and technical writers had worked since July to produce the required data. The data is displayed in more than 100 documents, totaling 8,500 pages.

"This is an important milestone," Microsoft said in a statement. "We are pleased that the Commission has recognized our efforts to comply with our documentation obligations, and we will continue to work closely with the Commission and the Trustee (an appointee who oversees Microsoft's compliance) to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the Commission's decision."

In its 2004 decision, the commission required Microsoft to hand over the technical data within four months. The Luxembourg-based European Court of First Instance rejected Microsoft's demand to suspend the decision.

Microsoft "missed" a number of deadlines for delivering complete and accurate specifications, the commission said in its statement Thursday. The commission then imposed a daily fine for Microsoft's refusal to comply and last week threatened to increase the fine by EUR1 million a day, bringing the daily fine to EUR3 million.

"Potential licensees can now review the technical documentation," said the commission, before adding that at the same time, the commission's trustee will test the documentation to verify its accuracy.

Regulators will then decide whether or not Microsoft has complied, the commission said.

Microsoft Meets Data Deadline In EU Antitrust Case (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman And Francine Lacqua

Bloomberg, November 23, 2006

Nov. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Microsoft Corp., seeking to avoid a daily fine of as much as 3 million euros ($3.9 million), met a European Union deadline today to provide data on how its Windows operating system communicates over a network.

The European Commission, the EU's antitrust regulator in Brussels, must now decide whether Microsoft has complied with a March 2004 antitrust order. Under that ruling, Microsoft must disclose so-called protocol information to rivals that make software for network servers.

Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes said in an interview in Istanbul today that she hopes companies such as International Business Machines Corp. and Oracle Corp. will help determine if Microsoft's information is ``solving the problem of interoperability."

The commission accuses the company of abusing its 95 percent share of the personal computer software sales to crush competition in related markets. The EU levied a record 497 million-euro fine in March 2004. Microsoft is appealing the ruling and a judgment by the European Court of First Instance is expected next year.

In July, the EU fined Redmond, Washington-based Microsoft 280.5 million euros for flouting the EU's 2004 ruling. The July penalty was the first by the commission for failure to comply with an antitrust ruling. Microsoft has also appealed the additional fine.

`Important Milestone'

The commission gave Microsoft a Nov. 23 deadline to submit the data so that competitors can review the documentation by the end of the month. The EU's monitoring trustee, Neil Barrett, will test the information ``to verify its accuracy," the commission said in a statement.

Microsoft said the data submission is an ``important milestone" in the antitrust case.

``We will continue to work closely with the commission and the trustee to ensure that we are in full compliance with every aspect of the commission's decision," Microsoft said in a statement.

When asked when the commission is expected to make a decision, Kroes said, ``It will of course be done in a proper way and as soon as possible we will come up with our decision.

Her spokesman, Jonathan Todd, told reporters today ``I think we're talking months rather than weeks."

NFL Fans' Kicks Are Blocked (LAT)

By Larry Stewart And Lance Pugmire, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 23, 2006

Many won't see tonight's game because of a cable dispute.

Cindy and Eugene Pacheco are die-hard Denver Broncos fans, like many people who live in Colorado. Eugene, a former Mile High Stadium vendor, proudly sports a Broncos tattoo.

This Thanksgiving, their plans were set. Family members would be coming to their Colorado Springs house for the holiday, and they would all settle in tonight to watch the Broncos take on the host Kansas City Chiefs, the first in an exclusive eight-game package on the NFL Network.

One problem. The Pachecos now can't get the game.

They said their cable company, which is now under the Comcast umbrella, did offer a "silver package" that included the NFL Network on a digital tier but was charging for a digital box.

"I don't want to pay $70 a month for a box just to watch the one game," Cindy said.

"Now we're scrambling. We're trying to find a place to watch it, or we'll just go to a bar. The family will have to leave. Our teenager will have to stay home and watch our little boy. It's unfair. It's some kind of ploy to make money."

It's worse for customers of Time Warner Cable, which has nearly 2 million subscribers in the L.A. market and also covers much of the Kansas City area. They currently can't get NFL Network even if they are willing to pay for a premium tier.

Time Warner is one of three major cable providers mired in a stalemate over carriage issues with the 3-year-old league-owned network.

The months-long impasse over higher fees and cable tiers comes down to this: 50 million cable television households nationwide won't be able to get tonight's game. With no ongoing talks, an 11th-hour deal seems unlikely.

The Pachecos, like other disgruntled cable subscribers, could have switched to satellite — both Dish Network and DirecTV carry the NFL Network — but it's too late for tonight's game.

And though the NFL's exclusivity arrangement allows local broadcasts in the teams' cities, that didn't help the Pachecos. They live in part of a large section of Colorado beyond the reach of Denver's Channel 31.

The dispute has led to a nasty marketing war and even caught the attention of Congress.

Time Warner, Charter — which has 374,000 customers in the L.A. market — and New York-based Cablevision are among the companies that want to put the NFL Network on a digital sports tier, which costs about $5 a month more per subscriber. NBA TV, College Sports Television (CSTV) and the Tennis Channel are among the channels already on such a premium tier.

DOJ_NMG_0097512

The NFL Network is demanding that it be part of the basic cable package, thus reaching more viewers.

Another sticking point is the rights fee the NFL Network is asking from cable companies, now estimated to be about $8.25 per subscriber a year, or about 69 cents a month. Before the NFL Network acquired the eight-game package from its parent company, the rate was around $3.

Time Warner spokesman Mark Harrad said the company simply does not want to pass the cost of carrying the NFL Network to all its customers, since "75% to 80% are not sports fans."

NFL Network officials dispute that number, saying 135 million people watch NFL football each weekend and that last season, 200 million watched the regular season at some point. Yet Comcast, the nation's largest cable company, has carried the NFL Network for two years and still offers it, including in the Denver area, but only as part of a premium digital package.

Cox Communications, which has 243,000 subscribers in the L.A. market, mostly in coastal areas, worked out an arrangement similar to Comcast's to carry the NFL Network on a digital tier.

Steve Bornstein, president of the NFL Network, was asked about the distribution problem during an interview at the network's studios in Culver City.

"I don't see it as a distribution problem," he said. "I look at it as the glass half full. I think the growth we've had — 40 million homes — has been remarkable. I don't think any other network has grown this fast.

"I'm hopeful by the end of the day we'll be broadly distributed."

And when will that be?

"I have a long horizon line," he said.

NFL fans don't.

Although tonight's game will be televised by Fox affiliates in Denver and Kansas City, those teams have fan bases that stretch over multi-state areas beyond the reach of those stations. The outrage is expected to be intense.

The NFL Network is, in fact, counting on that.

Pat Bowlen, owner of the Broncos and chairman of the NFL's Broadcast Committee, was asked by Sports Illustrated recently what he would do.

"Get a dish," he said.

In Los Angeles, where there is no NFL team and thus no local broadcast of any of the eight games, fans expressed anger and dismay months ago.

The fight began when Time Warner Inc. joined with Comcast Corp. to buy the assets of Adelphia Communications Corp. That changed everything.

The fight in Los Angeles began Aug. 1 when Time Warner, which at the time served 400,000 homes in the market, took control of Adelphia's 1.1 million households and Comcast's 500,000 and immediately dropped the NFL Network.

Satellite carriers DirecTV and Dish Network went after those cable customers.

In the last month, millions have been spent on radio, TV and newspaper ads from the warring factions. In one, the NFL Network also publicized its website, iwantnflnetwork.com, that allows users to e-mail the cable company to complain or to click on a link to order satellite.

Dish and DirecTV also have been advertising quick installation, but DirecTV spokesman Robert Mercer concedes that tonight's game is a lost cause.

The satellite company has set its sights on the next game, when the Cincinnati Bengals play host to the Baltimore Ravens on Nov. 30, knowing that the Dec. 7 game between the Cleveland Browns and the Pittsburgh Steelers could create even more demand.

This marketing war got the attention of Congress last week. The Senate Judiciary Committee held a hearing to look into the carriage dispute.

"We're intrigued, to put it mildly, with what the NFL has in mind," said Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who asked how cable and satellite rates would be affected and whether the NFL Network's limited distribution violates the antitrust exemption Congress granted the league in 1961.

DOJ_NMG_0097513

Jeffrey Pash, NFL executive vice president and general counsel, told the panel that pro football's popularity was justification for the rate hike. He also argued that the game package does not run afoul of antitrust laws because the games expand choices for consumers. Besides, he said, the league's current television contracts make any significant changes impossible until 2011.

Yet, Time Warner Chief Operating Officer Landel Hobbs also testified, calling the NFL Network's rates "out of whack" when compared with viewership ratings.

That was 10 days ago. And neither side has budged.

"You have to weigh upsetting all of your customers against not having eight games over six weeks," Time Warner's Harrad said, adding that most of its NFL fans probably have already switched to DirecTV because of its exclusive Sunday Ticket pay package that offers out-of-market NFL games.

The number of cable customers who have defected to satellite isn't yet clear, but NFL Network's Bornstein knows he is facing a tough battle.

"It is difficult to characterize the NFL as an underdog," he said, "but we are an independent programmer. In today's day and age, that's a very rare breed.

"We just have to wait and see what happens."

It Was Better With Bonzo (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, November 24, 2006

Today isn't just the official start of the holiday shopping season. It's also the start of the holiday movie season, when studios try to capitalize on the seasonal urge to get out of the house and take in a flick.

So here's a puzzle: Why will movie theaters charge the same $9.50 to see "Casino Royale" this Saturday night that they charged to see the disappointing remake of "All the King's Men" on a Wednesday night in the middle of September?

Wouldn't they sell more tickets and popcorn, and make more profit, if they increased the price when demand is high, and lowered it when demand is low?

After all, hotels and airlines have long varied pricing by day and season. And you'd think it odd if Macy's charged the same for a cashmere sweater as one made from a polyester blend. Yet the movie industry, facing flat or declining revenues, clings to a uniform pricing model that makes no sense.

It wasn't always so. Back in the golden years of Hollywood, before PG and XXX, there were "A" movies, "B" movies and "C" movies, distinguished not by their sexual content, but by the box-office appeal of their stars. Not only did it cost more to see Clark Gable in "Gone With the Wind" than Ronald Reagan in "Bedtime for Bonzo," but the ticket price also varied depending on whether you saw them in a first-run movie house downtown or a second-run theater in the suburbs, and whether you took in a matinee or an evening showing. And "ladies' nights" were a real bargain.

All of this began to fade with the arrival of television, which triggered a long, slow decline in moviegoing, a steady increase in ticket prices, and a switch to uniform pricing. Not long afterward, the movie studios were forced to give up their theater chains in a landmark antitrust settlement with the Justice Department. The arrival of the multiplex and the advent of VCRs, DVDs and movies on demand have also altered the economics of the movie business.

But none of these can fully explain why the industry remains wedded to uniform pricing.

Two academics who have noodled this puzzle are Barak Orbach, who teaches at the University of Arizona law school, and Liran Einav, an economist at Stanford University. Over the past few years, they have studied the literature and talked with dozens of industry executives. Now they have prepared a fascinating paper, which will be published next year by the International Review of Law and Economics.

Among the factors cited most often by theater owners are the cost and hassle involved in charging different prices for different movies on different days. There's the complexity at the box office and the need for some mechanism to make sure that patrons who buy cheap tickets for one theater at the multiplex don't wind up at expensive movies. On the other hand, it's hard to believe there isn't some simple technology that could solve most of these problems.

A more plausible explanation is that consumers might consider variable pricing as somehow unfair. But the experience in other industries suggests that such objections can be overcome, particularly if theater owners would phase in the new prices by introducing discounts for slack periods before raising prices for hit movies on busy weekends.

Obviously, it's not possible to know, in advance, which movies will be hits and which will be flops in order to price them accordingly. But theater owners have a good grasp of how ticket sales vary by season, or day of the week, or how long a movie has been playing. This is precisely the kind of information that could be used to set flexible prices.

What makes the persistence of uniform pricing all the more curious is that theaters actually pay widely varying fees for the licensing rights to the movies they show. The bigger the expected gross, the higher the percentage of ticket revenue that normally goes to the studio and its distributor. And the formula also includes a per-ticket fee that declines each week of the movie run.

My hunch is that these pricing arrangements between the studios and the theater chains, which have always been shrouded in secrecy, are the answer to our puzzle. It is the studios that want to maintain uniform pricing because it is the theater owners who would get the most benefit from variable pricing. And according to Orbach and Einav, when a few chains have tried to experiment with variable pricing, they often found that they lost access to the best movies or faced demands from distributors for higher per-head charges that discouraged them from offering discounts.

If you have any doubt that the studios have the power to dictate uniform retail prices, consider what happened with the introduction of "The Godfather" in 1972. Up to that point, the tradition was that theaters could charge a premium for tickets to the handful of "event" movies that came out every year -- in the modern context, the "Harry Potter" and "Spider-Man" movies. But when "The Godfather" was released in 1972, suddenly every movie theater in the country eliminated its event-movie pricing. That's the kind of "coincidence" Don Vito Corleone would have been proud of.

Under the antitrust settlement with the Justice Department in the 1950s, this kind of "vertical price maintenance" was supposed to be prohibited. But in their paper, Orbach and Einav suggest it may still be going strong. And for good reason. With movie studios making more and more of their profit from after-market sales, they have little interest in ticket discounting by theater owners who make most of their profit, in any case, from popcorn and Milk Duds. As the studios see it, every extra ticket sold because of a discount is one less potential movie rental or sale of a DVD.

It remains an open question whether variable pricing would, on balance, be good or bad for consumers -- discounts for some could well be offset by higher prices for weekend tickets to hit movies. But we'll never find out as long as movie studios use their power to discourage theater owners from giving it a try.

Microsoft's Vista Gets Upbeat Report From US Regulators (DOW)

By Mark Boslet, Carmen Fleetwood

DOJ_NMG_0097515

Dow Jones Newswire, November 22, 2006

PALO ALTO, Calif. (Dow Jones)--Microsoft Corp.'s (MSFT) new Windows Vista operating system for personal computers appears to be in compliance with the company's antitrust judgment with the Department of Justice and state attorneys general, according to a report filed with a District Court judge.

Issues with European regulators remain outstanding.

In a legal status report file Tuesday, U.S. regulators said Microsoft addressed all outstanding issues regarding Vista's ability to work alongside middleware from other companies.

The software, scheduled for release to business customers on Nov. 30, has been the subject of scrutiny from U.S. and European antitrust regulators.

"Windows Vista was developed under the requirements of the 2001 Consent Decree, and compliance was a priority throughout development," said Guy Esnouf, a Microsoft spokesman. "We worked diligently, both independently and with the Technical Committee, to identify and resolve all known issues before release."

ABA Seeks Immunity Guarantee In New EU Whistleblower Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 24, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Proposed new European Union rules for corporate whistleblowers would deal an unintended blow to international cartel-busting efforts because they don't guarantee immunity from fines, according to the American Bar Association.

The procedures, intended to create a "one-stop shop" in the 25-nation EU for companies that want to expose illegal price-fixing schemes, could also expose companies to legal jeopardy in the U.S., according to an analysis by the ABA's antitrust and international law section.

Although well-intentioned, the proposed change "deviates substantially from the recent trend in leniency policies around the world by reintroducing a substantial level of unpredictability, discretion, and lack of clarity into the program," the ABA analysis said.

Slated for adoption next month, the EU guidelines would for the first time give out "markers" to companies that are the first to secretly blow the whistle on fellow cartel conspirators. Such markers are offered in the U.S. to assure companies they will be first in line for immunity and not be leapfrogged by other conspirators who approach regulators at a later date.

Joseph Angland, chairman of the ABA section of antitrust law and a partner in New York with the Heller Ehrman LLP law firm, says the EU's proposed wording -- that it "may" give out such markers -- would create uncertainty and encourage companies to remain silent.

"A company that comes forward wants to know that it will be granted immunity. Otherwise, it will go back into the weeds and hope no one discovers" the illegal conduct, Mr. Angland said.

The EU worries that an automatic guarantee of immunity could encourage companies to race to get the marker for immunity but not necessarily to provide regulators with evidence.

"It is important that we retain...discretion in awarding a marker and to grant it on a case-by-case basis," said Jonathan Todd, a spokesman for the EU's antitrust directorate.

Asked if the criticisms might cause regulators to alter the rules before adopting them next month, Mr. Todd said: "Wait and see."

The ABA group says other proposed rule changes in Europe could also expose multinational companies to increased legal jeopardy in the U.S. For example, the EU -- without guaranteeing that a company will be granted immunity -- still wants a detailed corporate statement identifying the cartel's aim, scope, market volumes affected and the dates and locations of cartel meetings. Such statements could provide fodder for U.S. plaintiff's lawyers, who often sue cartel members for damages, U.S. lawyers say.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Groups Upset By Claim In Clean Air Suit (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0097516

The Associated Press

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

Filed at 3:33 a.m. ET

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Environmental groups are still angry over an assertion made before the Supreme Court a month ago during arguments in a far-reaching clean air lawsuit.

The claim by prominent Washington lawyer Carter Phillips that the federal government had changed course in regulating emissions from coal-fired power plants is simply not true and a paper trail of the industry's own documents proves it, the groups say.

The case, Environmental Defense v. Duke Energy Corp., could determine the fate of an Environmental Protection Agency initiative targeting some of the biggest utilities in the nation. Phillips, representing Duke, is managing partner at the Washington office of the law firm Sidley Austin and has argued more than 50 cases at the Supreme Court.

"These companies are bent on getting away with 20 years of illegal pollution by trying to deceive the Supreme Court," said Natural Resources Defense Council clean air director John Walke, who is a former EPA attorney.

Utility industry attorney Scott Segal jumped to Phillips' defense, saying that "for these environmental groups to go after one of the best lawyers in the country is a travesty. Phillips leads a legal dream team with a spotless record." Segal was responding to a list of questions a reporter sent to Phillips' office.

The government enforcement action against Duke is one of more than a dozen brought by the Clinton administration in 1999 and 2000.

It is aimed at forcing power companies to install the latest pollution-control equipment on aging coal-fired plants which were renovated so they could be operated longer hours.

On Nov. 1, Phillips told the justices: "Our basic argument is that all along" EPA interpreted the regulatory requirements ''in a certain way. And then 19 years later, they reversed course" and suddenly sued the companies.

The environmental groups say internal industry documents clearly show that Duke understood long ago that EPA was interpreting the requirements in the same way it did in 1999 when the government went to court. Some of the documents are part of the record before the Supreme Court and all were brought to light in lawsuits against Duke and other utilities.

Among the documents, according to a Justice Department court filing, are 10 memos from an industry trade association spelling out the EPA's position for Duke starting in the late 1980s. It was the same regulatory approach EPA took a decade later when it sued the company. The Justice Department document was filed publicly in 2003, but at Duke's request it was put under seal, barred from public view.

The day after the Supreme Court argument, the Natural Resources Defense Council provided journalists with copies of industry documents the environmental groups say contradict the tack taken by Duke's lawyer before the high court.

One of them is a Duke company training guide on environmental compliance from 1991 that appears to characterize the EPA's approach in the same way the federal agency did nine years later when it sued Duke.

George Washington University law professor Jonathan Turley reviewed some of the industry files and said, "I find the statements Phillips made hard to square with these documents."

Turley said the complexity of the case makes it easy to suggest uncertainty or confusion, and that "Phillips' comments in court are more likely to be treated as attorneys gilding the lily for their client" rather than attempting to mislead.

The dispute between the utilities and the environmental groups and Justice Department lawyers is whether emissions increases should be measured on an annual basis or under a two-part test.

The industry says EPA regulations always have required an hourly rate increase in emissions before measuring for annual increases. Such an approach would enable the companies to run their revamped coal-fired plants without having to install additional pollution controls, as long as the hourly emissions rate doesn't rise. In his arguments to the justices, Phillips pointed to two EPA officials who in the early 1980s appeared to interpret the rules in the way industry favors.

The EPA and environmental groups say the regulations call for calculating emissions increases annually, which would force the installation of costly pollution controls on plants because of their longer hours of operation. Environmentalists point to a 1988 memo by an attorney representing Duke in the Supreme Court case. The document specifies an annual test "instead of" an hourly test.

But Segal, representing the industry, says focusing on that language in the 42-page document "mischaracterizes the memo." The company documents "all assume that you've already cleared the first hurdle of an hourly rate increase, so it's not surprising that the documents sometimes refer to an annual test."

"That's ridiculous," responded Keri Powell, a staff attorney with the not-for-profit environmental law firm Earthjustice.

It was "depressing to listen to Duke's attorney present a sob story to the Supreme Court about how the power companies had no idea that EPA would interpret its rules the way it did in 1999, when the power companies' own documents from years before so clearly show otherwise."

Duke spokesman Thomas Williams said the environmentalists' criticism is "an after-the-fact, made-for-litigation theory that was correctly rejected by the lower courts."

Laborers Warned About Meth Trade Dangers (AP)

By Garance Burke, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 23, 2006

Fotonovelas — pocket-sized picture books popular in Mexico — have gotten a California makeover that authorities hope persuades immigrant laborers to resist the easy-money temptation of the methamphetamine trade.

Thousands in the meth-plagued Central Valley have read the bilingual graphic-novel story of Jose, a farmworker who creates tragedy for his family by working for a drug ring. "No Vale La Pena," or "It's Not Worth It," has inspired a Spanish-language docudrama, and police from Tennessee to Colorado have requested copies of both projects.

In Mexico, fotonovelas often illustrate life's struggles through recurring characters, like the trucker with a heart of gold, or the secretary trying to get ahead. Community leaders in and around Merced, about 130 miles southeast of San Francisco, saw them as an effective way to reach immigrant workers.

"We were trying to get that message across to a population that has a very low literacy level and that's really isolated," said public relations executive Virginia Madueno, who created the booklet. "So we thought, 'Aha! A fotonovela.'"

The Central Valley, a broad agricultural swath that runs up the middle of the state, remains a primary distribution point for meth, according to a U.S. Department of Justice report released last month.

Mexican drug cartels have begun to dominate the trade in the area: Merced County Sheriff Mark Pazin said they accounted for more than 80 percent of meth-production arrests in 2003. The federal report suggested the cartels are looking to expand into other areas with large populations of illegal immigrants.

Immigrant laborers can see setting up a meth lab as a lucrative alternative to backbreaking work in the fields, but end up exposing their families to the dangerous work. It's so common for meth cooks to be arrested at home in front of spouses and children that Madera County has assigned a social worker to accompany police on drug busts, Pazin said.

"No Vale La Pena" ends even more tragically. Jose, recruited by a drug lord to cook meth, hides his backyard lab from his pregnant wife, Maria, only to expose their young daughter, Raquel, to a fatal dose of chemicals.

"I've known people related to family members who thought cooking meth was an opportunity to get ahead and get a piece of the American dream," Madueno said. "I've seen what it has done."

The first run of 15,000 copies of "No Vale La Pena" was soon exhausted, said Ben Duran, president of Merced College, who helped create the storybook using private-sector donations. More were printed, and it's now available at Hispanic supermarkets across California.

DOJ_NMG_0097518

"Then we thought, 'What if we make the book come alive?'" Duran said.

Last year, Duran started working on a film based on the same story, styled to look like a telenovela, or Mexican soap opera. He played the drug kingpin in the project, made with help from the sheriff and $100,000 in federal funding.

The film has been shown in classrooms, nurses' conventions and at commercial theaters in several states.

When it premiered in the cafeteria of Merced's Margaret Sheehy Elementary School last month, the children sat entranced. As the narrator delivered somber anti-drug declarations in Spanish, a few third-graders wiped away tears.

"Kids, I'm here to tell you we don't make any of this up," Pazin said. "It is happening here in the Central Valley, in California and the U.S. People are getting sick and passing away."

"If it's not ready for prime time, why the hell are we using it?"

Once again, Cool Miner, the wiretapping software, had broken down.

Barb hadn't expected miracles, she told the DEA techie down in Washington, but now that they had arranged for a Hotmail clone account to wiretap e-mail, lugging two PCs up from northern Virginia, she wanted it to work.

DEA had used the program a few times for smaller cases, in other cities - catching bad guys in midsize towns - but never in Philadelphia. With a case this complex, the techie protested, Cool Miner had become overloaded by too many e-mails, too many attachments, too much volume.

The Help Desk was working on it.

Barb seethed. DEA had a new mandate from on high to go after online pharmacies! With a computer program so lame, how did the agency expect to catch such sophisticated criminals, a global network moving 50,000 pills a day? Three years after 9/11 and DEA was still struggling to tap e-mail!

Fix it, she said.

When the wiretap did work, it was fabulous. Authorities could track the suspected kingpins in real time, reading each e-mail to and from Temple University graduate student Akhil Bansal and his father, Brij, a doctor in India. E-mail attachments included spreadsheets of detailed pill orders. Amazingly, the Bansals didn't encrypt most e-mail.

From: Brij Bansal

To: Sanjeev Srivastav

cc: Akhil Bansal

Please send the following order with next-day service:

30,000 tabs - Zolpidem 10 mg.

10,000 tabs - Cialis 20 mg.

10,000 tabs - Viagra 100 mg.

One recently intercepted e-mail put the Bansal network's stock in Queens, N.Y., at four million pills. This e-mail wiretap was going to provide a bounty of evidence - when it worked.

For Barb, a computer-savvy workaholic with an obsession for detail and no patience for incompetence, the wiretap trouble added to growing tension.

DOJ_NMG_0097519

As the stakes rose - suspects on four continents, tens of thousands of U.S. customers, a pressing public-health threat - DEA and FBI agents had begun to fight over control of the case like boys in a sandbox. DEA was wary, fearing FBI's reputation for stealing cases. FBI felt frustrated because agencies such as DEA often asked for help, then resented sharing control.

Barb and fellow prosecutor Wendy Kelly felt the tension, too. Again and again, DEA agents ignored requests to print copies of Web pharmacy home pages - not a minor task, because the printouts would be the only evidence if a Web site disappeared.

The prosecutors began to sense that some agents and supervisors couldn't take orders from women. Barb found this incredible. She had been prosecuting cases since before these guys were born. And Kelly? For God's sake, the woman served as a full colonel in the Army Reserve.

The way the prosecutors saw it, the boys needed to grow up.

NEW DELHI

The Narcotics Control Bureau agent, a thin 30-year-old with a rust-colored goatee, walked down an alley, past the cats and flies, the servants scrubbing dishes, the line of white, government Ambassador sedans.

The wire man ducked into a weathered three-story building and entered a restricted area on the third floor, an air-conditioned, high-tech enclosure with tinted windows. This was the Source Room, where NCB agents listened to wiretaps.

The wire man worked alone, anonymously. Only two others knew who he was taping and why. Everyone understood that a leak could spoil everything. That's why the wiretap paperwork was hand-carried to the home secretary for approval.

Not only was the case NCB's first major international pharmaceutical investigation, but it was also its biggest case with DEA. The Indians were eager to prove they were serious about policing pill-smuggling. It wasn't just about law enforcement, it was about economics and politics, too. Pill-smuggling tainted and imperiled the nation's legitimate manufacturing and export industries. Such a crime also threatened U.S.-Indian diplomatic relations, which had warmed since 9/11.

The wire man sat down and opened his laptop.

He had been listening for two months, ever since DEA asked for help. He knew that Brij and Akhil Bansal often spoke several times a day. Because of the time difference and Akhil's class schedule, they routinely talked when it was morning in India, night in Philadelphia.

The agent picked up his headset and downloaded a new call.

Akhil's voice came on the line.

"Papaji," he said in Hindi. "It's me."

ROXBOROUGH

Sitting on his Value City mattress, Akhil began most mornings with chocolate, a Coke, and a call to his father.

As the enterprise grew, and as Akhil became schooled in the ways of American business, the tenor of the calls changed. Now the son took charge.

"Papaji," he said in one call. "You must slow down. All your hard work will be gone."

Akhil, cocksure and 26, began to realize that his father was a terrible businessman. Brij trusted people too much, overpaid staff. He let the online pharmacies they supplied go weeks without paying.

This drove Akhil nuts. By January, clients owed the Bansals more than $800,000.

Akhil, an MBA student at a prestigious American university, urged his dad to cut off the deadbeats. Brij hesitated. He had trouble saying no.

While he let Akhil control the finances - $4 million stashed in a dozen U.S. and offshore accounts - he questioned some of his son's moves. In one call, Brij erupted in fury after learning that Akhil was selling customer data to spammers. They were using the information to make follow-up calls to pill customers - some of them addicts - pushing them to buy more.

To Brij, this seemed dishonorable. Akhil insisted it was OK.

"It's America, Papaji. Everything is for sale."

NEWNAN, GA.

DEA agent Shawn Ellerman studied the e-mail that had brought him from New York to this rural ranch home not far from the Alabama border:

To: Interphar

DOJ_NMG_0097520

From: Diane Graybeal

Please do not send or charge my credit card for this purchase. My daughter ordered this without my permission and she passed away on the 27th of November from over-medication.

Thank you.

Graybeal's daughter, Sarah, had bought 25 10-milligram tabs of generic Valium for $198. DEA had discovered the order and the mother's message in a stack of e-mails seized from Interphar, the Costa Rican online pharmacy, which the Bansals supplied.

If Ellerman could prove that Bansal pills were killing people, DEA might nail the Indians for murder, not just drug dealing.

In October, Ellerman had flown to Colorado, where another Bansal customer had died. Prosecutors were reviewing Ellerman's report, but that woman's death looked like a suicide.

In Newnan, he met with the first cop on the scene, the paramedics, the coroner, and Mrs. Graybeal. By day's end, Ellerman concluded the death was probably a suicide, too.

Ellerman felt sorry for the mother, so he sat with her at the kitchen table looking at family photographs. Mrs. Graybeal, thrilled that someone cared about her daughter, asked why DEA had sent Ellerman all the way from New York.

Ellerman couldn't discuss the case, but he told her, "Watch the news. You're going to see something big soon."

CENTER CITY

Federal grand juries convene in a restricted area on the sixth floor of the Nix Federal Building, a Moderne structure on Market Street. The secret sessions are often formal affairs, with dry testimony about paperwork and financial minutiae.

But as light snow fell outside on this January morning, jurors inside Room No. 2 seemed anything but bored. From a mahogany witness box, DEA agent Eric Russ explained the scope of the Bansal network. Grand jurors were outraged.

"How can they be so brazen about this?" one asked. "I mean, there's no doctor involved."

Said another: "I used to get spam, I'm pretty sure, and I just ignored it because I don't have a prescription. How do they get people to go for it?"

Russ had already testified twice to these grand jurors, laying out preliminaries - how the trail led to Australia and back, and how the case was growing in complexity and scope. Frankly, Russ would have been satisfied to make the arrests by now. But prosecutors wanted more evidence, more bad guys, an airtight case. They always did.

At this appearance, Russ gave grand jurors the big picture, including some of the seedier clients: Rx-mart.com, pillbasket.com, ourprescriptionsforless.com, bigcitymeds.com, myemeds.com, getsomemeds.com, ezfreescripts.com.

"The majority... look like a professional Web site where you would go and order anything," Russ told the grand jurors. "They will have a list of medications they may classify by painkillers, sleep aids, diet aids, things like that... . No requirement to fill out... description of symptoms... . No place to fax or bring your prescription."

When pills arrive, "there is no doctor's note telling you how to take it or anything like that. It's just the Valium in a box."

One customer merited special notice, Russ said: a guy using the e-mail name "Millerlight." He stood apart for two reasons.

One, Millerlight didn't order pills. He ordered ketamine powder, a sedative abused as a club drug, by the kilo.

Two, while the Web site operators paid Akhil by wiring money into his bank accounts, Millerlight paid cash. He bundled big bills like bricks and shipped them by UPS directly to Akhil.

Just like a street dealer.

ROXBOROUGH

As the total owed to the Bansals by online pharmacies climbed toward $1 million, Akhil began to lose his patience. From the computer in his spartan bedroom, he e-mailed a terse note to longtime customers:

In this business we take all the risk right from buying of medicine from India, sending it to USA, storage in USA and then shipping it to your customer's doors. On the other hand you guys sit in an unknown country, with web servers in a different country and merchant account in yet another different country. You have no risk in this business aside from losing future money.

I wrote the above paragraph to convey that we take all the risk for MONEY. If we are not paid on time or not paid in full, we have no incentive to take all the risks and work with a client.

DOJ_NMG_0097521

After all this I have reached a conclusion that you are a very risky client... . We are in a situation in which we would rather NOT work with you, than be begging for OUR money.

It was a pleasure having done business with you. Wish you luck for your future. Dr. Akhil Bansal.

CENTER CITY

Akhil wasn't the only one struggling with finances.

On a frosty morning, James Pavlock, a money-laundering expert up from Washington, settled into a temporary office on Chestnut Street, half a block from Independence Hall. He knew the city well, having once served as a Philadelphia assistant district attorney, and he kept a home here.

Among his first visitors was Aaron Carp, the eager, 25-year-old IRS agent. Carp opened a thin file - spreadsheets of Akhil's bank records.

The numbers, grouped by account, showed tens of thousands of dollars moving every few days. It was good work, Pavlock told Carp, but just a beginning. There was no pattern. Or apparent motive, or hard evidence of a crime.

Carp was stumped. What should he do?

Pavlock lived for such moments - an agent who wanted to talk spreadsheets. They spoke for two hours.

"OK, now what?" Carp said.

They would subpoena U.S. banks and begin using diplomatic channels to seek foreign bank records. This meant getting cooperation from as many 10 countries. That might take months.

Pavlock didn't have months. Given the public-health threat - addictive pills sold willy-nilly to anyone with a credit card - prosecutors wanted a speedy indictment, maybe by late March.

Finding the money was vital: First, bank records would help prove that the Bansals were drug dealers on a wide scale. Second, the records could prove money-laundering, a charge that would increase any prison sentence. Third, money found could be seized, stripping the Bansals of all profits. Fourth, and not least, agencies seizing the money - millions - would get to keep it.

ROXBOROUGH

Akhil scanned his latest e-mail and fumed.

It came from his best client, Corrina Meherer in Costa Rica.

"There is a leak within your organization," she warned.

She was getting spam, she explained, from a new Web site, one that shipped pills from a familiar address in Queens, N.Y. - 5028 Utopia Parkway.

David Armstrong's house!

Armstrong was a thief! Akhil's shipper was stealing his pills, selling them through his own Web site.

Akhil resisted the urge to confront Armstrong. He needed more than suspicion. He needed irrefutable proof.

There was only one way to get that.

QUEENS

Akhil waited a week, until Armstrong traveled to India.

Akhil used his key to enter the pill depot - the one he paid Armstrong to supervise. It was night. The place was empty.

Akhil walked past the packaging tables, the empty boxes and the pill shelves. He stopped to pour himself a Coke, then entered Armstrong's office and flipped on the computer.

When the Windows password screen appeared, he moved the cursor over a green icon. After a second, the computer displayed a password hint.

"Sequence," it said.

Akhil stared at the screen, sipping his Coke. Sequence? He tried a series of dates, birthdays, numbers he could associate with Armstrong. Nothing. After a while, he figured, what the hell, and typed "12345."

It worked.

Inside, Armstrong had password-protected his e-mail, but Akhil was ready.

DOJ_NMG_0097522

He took a thumb drive he had brought from Philadelpia and plugged it into the back of the computer. The thumb drive automatically began a program called Password Recovery 123.

Within seconds - almost magically - the asterisks hiding the Armstrongs' password fell away. Akhil was in.

He copied the files, then took a quarter-size device called a Key Catcher and connected it between the computer and the cord running to the keyboard. This tiny spy machine would record every stroke Armstrong typed.

It was as good as a wiretap.

What had taken federal agents weeks - and money and court orders and software headaches - to accomplish, Akhil pulled off in an hour.

Pardon More Than The Turkey (SFC)

By Debra J. Saunders

San Francisco Chronicle, November 23, 2006

AFTER the GOP took that thumpin' in the November elections, President Bush wants the voters to give his party and his leadership a second chance. That makes this a good time for Bush to use his presidential pardon power to give others a second chance. This holiday season, Dubya should not limit his presidential pardon power to one lucky turkey.

Thanks to draconian federal drug sentences, the number of federal prisoners reached a record 193,989 on Nov. 9 -- that's a steep increase from 150,000 in 2003. The prison population is not growing because the feds are locking up drug kingpins. As the U.S. Sentencing Commission noted in a 2002 report, while the 1986 federal drug law promised to go after "serious" and "major" traffickers, the majority of federal cocaine offenders performed low-level functions. The percentage of biggies behind bars is shrinking, while the low-life chump class grows.

In 2000, the commission reported, the proportion of importers/high-level suppliers shrank to 1.4 percent of the cocaine offenders, down from 8.8 percent in 1995; the proportion of organizers/leaders fell from 12.7 percent in 1995 to 5.3 percent. It is another sign of too-big government, when taxpayers have to bankroll long sentences for the least culpable criminals.

Clarence Aaron was a college student in 1992 when he introduced two dealers to each other. They paid him $1,500. Nine kilograms of cocaine were traded. A second deal didn't happen. Yet when the feds arrested the group, they charged Aaron with dealing 24 kilograms of crack cocaine, because one dealer was going to turn the cocaine into crack and the second deal had been set up. Aaron failed to cut a deal by pleading guilty and testifying against others.

Aaron's sentence? Life without parole. That's right, Aaron wasn't in charge, he wasn't a professional dealer, he had been charged with a first-time nonviolent drug offense and he's serving the same sentence as the treasonous FBI-agent-turned-spy Robert Hanssen.

You might expect that sort of over-the-top sentence in the Middle Ages or some hellhole dictatorship that does not value human life. An enlightened nation, however, has no business locking up a kid and throwing away the key for life -- because he did something both criminal and stupid when he was, as Bush once described his early years, "young and irresponsible."

I can't help but believe that if a white college kid had screwed up like this, unlike the African-American Aaron, he would have received a more fitting sentence.

Bush should commute Aaron's sentence this year, because it is the right thing to do. He also should work with the U.S. pardon attorney to release other prisoners serving sentences that far exceed their crimes. While in office, Bush has issued 97 pardons and two commutations. Two commutations are too few.

Julie Stewart, the president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums, hears that the Bushies don't want to commute sentences that comply with guidelines, no matter how barbaric they are. "Why have a pardon attorney's office?" she asked rhetorically. "The Founding Fathers gave (the pardon) to the president for the very purpose of exercising it when the punishment doesn't fit the crime."

Politically, Bush could use pardons to show that he cares about people who live outside the GOP circle. Let Bush show America the president who boasted in his 2004 State of the Union speech that America is "the land of the second chance" that he walks the walk.

Commutations also would appeal to libertarian-leaning Republicans who recoil at drug-war excesses. These are voters who harken to the words of the late economist Milton Friedman, who wrote in an open letter to then-drug czar Bill Bennett in 1989, "Drugs are a tragedy for addicts. But criminalizing their use converts that tragedy into a disaster for society, for users and non-users alike."

As for law-and-order types, who don't mind throwing other people's children behind bars for life, Bush can use mercy to appeal to those voters as well.

Last month, a federal judge in Texas sentenced Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos to 11 and 12 years in prison for shooting a fleeing drug smuggler in the buttocks, not filing the necessary reports and depriving the smuggler of his Fourth Amendment right to be free from illegal seizure. That's an insane sentence for two men who worked in service to this country and made a split-second mistake. Bush should commute their sentences before either man has to report to prison.

Let me be clear: I support long-sentences for violent criminals and repeat offenders, as well as the ultimate sentence -- lethal injection -- for repeat killers such as Clarence Ray Allen and Stanley Tookie Williams, who rightfully were executed in San Quentin Prison.

But I cannot countenance meting out the harshest sentences to people who can be redeemed and have something to contribute to society. Clarence Aaron has served enough time behind bars. Bush should set him free.

Medical Marijuana User Found Guilty Of Violating Federal Drug Laws (AP)

AP, November 23, 2006

FRESNO, Calif. - A medical marijuana user could face more than two decades in prison after a jury convicted him of violating federal drug laws and other charges.

Dustin Costa, 60, a former Marine turned medical marijuana activist, was found guilty Wednesday in Fresno federal court of growing marijuana, possession of marijuana for distribution, and possession of a firearm.

"The conviction of another medical cannabis patient is a senseless tragedy for all involved," said Steph Sherer, executive director of the medical cannabis advocacy group Americans for Safe Access.

A previous U.S. Supreme Court decision prevented Costa from using the phrase "medical marijuana" or relying on a medical defense in court.

His sentencing date has not been scheduled. Costa said he plans to appeal the decision.

76 Nabbed In International Drug Sweep (AP)

By Joshua Goodman, The Associated Press

AP, November 22, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia -- Authorities in Italy, Spain, the United States and several South American countries arrested 76 people Wednesday as part of a major drug crackdown in which a restaurant linked to one of Colombia's most feared warlords was seized, officials said.

Salvatore Mancuso, an architect of a peace deal between right-wing paramilitaries and the government, was accused by federal prosecutors of investing in an upscale Italian eatery in the Caribbean resort town of Cartagena used by the drug ring to launder profits from cocaine shipments to Europe.

Authorities said the L'enoteca Restaurant and other assets seized Wednesday, including a nationwide chain of 58 men's clothing stores, were owned by the leaders of the criminal ring: an Italian father and son from Rome _ Giorgio and Christian Sale _ who lived in Colombia.

In total, police seized assets worth upward of $35 million during raids in eight Colombian cities Wednesday. Also confiscated as part of the multi-country police investigation were 220 pounds of cocaine, arms and a villa in Ardea, 25 miles south of Rome, which was being used as a drug refinery, Italian police said in a statement.

The prosecutor's office described L'enoteca's rapid expansion as "exaggerated" _ it has affiliates in Bogota and the Caribbean port town of Barranquilla _ and possible only with proceeds from the drug trade.

DOJ_NMG_0097524

Evidence compiled as part of a three-year investigation involving some 300 police wiretaps in Italy and abroad also indicated that Mancuso was trying to buy two undeveloped properties in Spain from the Sale family, the chief federal prosecutor said.

Mancuso is wanted by a U.S. federal court on charges of being among Colombia's biggest drug traffickers. But President Alvaro Uribe has suspended his extradition order as part of a peace deal that Mancuso helped broker and which has led to the demobilization of more than 30,000 right-wing fighters.

Colombian and Italian authorities wouldn't reveal the identities of those captured, saying only that 45 were Italian and 25 were drug traffickers in the United States, Argentina, Venezuela, Bolivia and Spain. The remaining six were arrested in Columbia, police said.

IMMIGRATION:

Man's Deportation To Somalia Sets Off A Wave Of Concern Over Safety (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, November 22, 2006

On the evening of Nov. 2, a young corporate lawyer in New Jersey received a frantic call from a charity client, a 46-year-old Harlem grocery clerk with a history of petty crime. He was in custody on an airplane in Newark on his way to Mogadishu, the capital of his native Somalia, a country so dangerous that to the lawyer's knowledge, no one had been deported there in years.

The courts were closed, and a federal judge who heard an emergency motion the next day ruled that the clerk, Mohamad Rasheed Jama, was already outside United States jurisdiction.

So, after a stop in Nairobi, where he was handed over to Kenyans, Mr. Jama stepped off an airplane in Mogadishu — and into the hands of Islamist militants, who soon accused him of being an American spy and began demanding money.

"They were extremely angry," said his lawyer, Emily B. Goldberg, relating the last frightened call she got from Mr. Jama, who had spent four years in immigration detention in New Jersey awaiting deportation to the land he left at 18. "He asked me if there was anything I could do. I told him in the American system, there was nothing more I could do."

Mr. Jama, whose deportation was based on a 1989 conviction for owning an unlicensed gun, is among the first Somalis to be repatriated against his will since the United States Supreme Court ruled 5 to 4 last year that the lack of a functioning central government in Somalia did not bar such deportations. About 4,000 Somalis nationwide are eligible for immediate deportation under the ruling, which turned on the syntax of a Congressional statute.

The case of Mr. Jama, who has a 9-year-old American daughter in Harlem, highlights issues the nation has wrestled with for decades, such as what to do with deportable immigrants who can neither be detained indefinitely nor safely repatriated, and what should limit the government's discretion to decide their fate.

Conditions in Somalia have worsened in recent months, moving to the brink of an all-out regional war. In June, Mogadishu was seized by Islamic militias suspected of harboring leaders of Al Qaeda. The militias, after routing warlords backed by the United States, began imposing a Taliban-like regime of strict religious courts.

A week before his abrupt departure, Mr. Jama's volunteer lawyers filed a habeas petition on his behalf, arguing that his continued detention in the Middlesex County Jail in New Jersey was unlawful because "it is simply beyond dispute that effecting his removal to Somalia would be impossible."

Michael W. Gilhooly, a spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, confirmed Mr. Jama's deportation, declining to say whether more were under way. But at a federal appeals hearing in Seattle last month, a Justice Department lawyer said that three people had been deported to Somalia since the Supreme Court ruling, after volunteering.

Because an injunction halting most such deportations was lifted in April, the government lawyer, Greg D. Mack, added, the others would be deported at the discretion of the Department of Homeland Security.

The 28 years Mr. Jama spent in New York hardly prepared him for survival under Islamic fanatics. His job history, detailed in an affidavit, includes three summers as a "jack of all trades" at Jewish youth camps in Orange County, long hours as a counter man in corner stores on upper Lexington Avenue, as well as garment work in Midtown Manhattan and a stint as a junkyard dealer on 125th Street.

His lengthy rap sheet reflects a drinking problem, he said in the affidavit, and his having adapted too well to Harlem's "street culture." Besides a misdemeanor assault and the gun possession, for which he served three years in prison, his offenses include possession of marijuana, selling beer without a license and riding a bus without paying the fare.

But in his old Harlem neighborhood around West 115th Street, he is mainly remembered as a hard worker and good father brought down by alcohol.

"He was very cool, a good dude," said Lester Robinson, 26, whose sister, Waldrina Robinson, is the mother of Mr. Jama's daughter, Ashante.

Ms. Robinson, a home attendant, said she ended a five-year relationship with Mr. Jama in 2000, but she spoke warmly of the years after Ashante's birth in 1997, when Mr. Jama changed the baby's diapers, often cared for the girl at the grocery store where he worked, and "gave me every dime" he earned.

"He was a good father — when he was there," she said.

From the government's perspective, Mr. Jama should have been gone years earlier. In 1978, when Somalia still had a central government, Mr. Jama entered the United States on a one-year visa to work with his father as a security guard at Somalia's Diplomatic Mission to the United Nations.

Left behind at 19, when his father joined his mother in London, Mr. Jama learned English, earned a high school equivalency diploma and became a permanent legal resident under the immigration amnesty enacted by Congress in 1986. But he bought an illegal handgun for protection after a cousin was killed in a robbery, he said, and was arrested for having it after an alcohol-fueled dispute with other relatives drew the police.

Mr. Jama was ordered deported in 1993. But with no foreseeable chance of deporting him to Somalia, where civil war was raging, the authorities released him under supervision. As was typical at the time, no action was taken when he stopped reporting, even when later infractions led to brief jail time.

After 9/11, attitudes changed. Mr. Jama was picked up in October 2002, as were many other Somalis. But unlike those with comparable records who were provisionally released again when deportations stopped, Mr. Jama had no lawyer until this year. Then the American Civil Liberties Union of New Jersey took the case and enlisted help from the law firm Gibbons, Del Deo, Dolan, Griffinger & Vecchione.

"I want nothing more from life than to be near Ashante and to be involved in her life on a daily basis once again," Mr. Jama wrote in his affidavit, seeking supervised release to a cousin in Queens who had found him a job in a grocery store. "Although my greatest fear is remaining in immigration detention for the rest of my life and never regaining my freedom, I am also frightened about what could happen if the United States tried to remove me to Somalia."

As a member of the Warsengeli clan, Mr. Jama faces special danger in areas dominated by other clans, including Mogadishu, a Somalia expert wrote in an affidavit. Other affidavits cited the failed deportation of Keyse G. Jama (no relation), the Somali man who had lost the Supreme Court case, only to be rejected at gunpoint at a Somalia airport and sent back to Minneapolis in the spring of 2005. A federal judge outraged at that botched operation ordered the government to "slow down its rush to act" and release him.

Keyse Jama is now in Canada, where he fled in January and applied for political asylum, which is granted to the vast majority of Somali applicants, said David Yerzy, his Toronto lawyer. "The Canadian government recognizes that their lives are in danger," he said.

In the United States, lawyers for Somalis are asking whether Mr. Jama's deportation signals the start of a mass deportation or a warning to those facing indefinite detention that "if you use habeas, you'll be on the next flight," said Jeffrey Keyes, the Minneapolis lawyer who argued the Supreme Court case.

In Mogadishu, as far as is known, Mr. Jama is just trying to survive.

"The government demonstrated a complete disregard for my client's safety," Ms. Goldberg said. "I strongly believe that Mr. Jama is simply the first of many that will be placed in a similarly dangerous situation."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Democrats Revive Demand For Classified Data (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, November 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 23 — Seeking information about detention of terrorism suspects, abuse of detainees and government secrecy, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee are reviving dozens of demands for classified documents that until now have been rebuffed or ignored by the Justice Department and other agencies.

"I expect real answers, or we'll have testimony under oath until we get them," Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, who will head the committee beginning in January, said in an interview this week. "We're entitled to know these answers, and in many instances we don't get them because people are hiding their mistakes. And that's no excuse."

Mr. Leahy, who has said little about his plans for the committee, expressed hope for greater cooperation from the Bush administration, which he described as having been "obsessively secretive." His aides have identified more than 65 requests he has made to the Justice Department or other agencies in recent years that have been rejected or permitted to languish without reply.

Now that they are about to control Congress, what he and other Democrats regard as a record of unresponsiveness has energized their renewal of longstanding requests for information about some of the administration's most hidden and fiercely debated operations. In addition, other such requests by committee members deal with subjects like voter fraud, immigration and background inquiries on Supreme Court nominees.

With little more than two weeks gone since the elections that gave his party a majority in both houses, Mr. Leahy has already begun pressing the Justice Department for greater openness. In a letter last Friday, he asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to release two documents whose existence the Central Intelligence Agency, in response to a suit by the American Civil Liberties Union, recently acknowledged for the first time. Although their details are not known, the documents appear to have provided a legal basis for the agency's detention and harsh interrogation of high-level terrorism suspects.

One document is a directive, signed by President Bush shortly after the September 2001 attacks, that granted the C.I.A. authority to set up detention centers outside the United States and outlined allowable interrogation procedures.

The second is a memorandum, written by the Office of Legal Counsel at the Justice Department in 2002, that is thought to have given the C.I.A. specific legal advice about interrogation methods that would not violate a federal statute on torture.

With Democrats in control, it will be harder for executive branch agencies to sidestep requests for documents. Behind each request will be the possibility of Democrats' voting to issue subpoenas that would compel documents or testimony, although Senate aides said they hoped to avoid conflict.

So far, few signs have emerged that the administration is preparing to be more responsive, even in the absence of a Republican majority's protection. Mr. Bush has promised to work with Democrats, but there appears to be little change in the reluctance of the Justice Department's officials to start opening its files to Mr. Leahy's committee.

"The department will continue to work closely with the Congress as they exercise their oversight functions, and we will appropriately respond to all requests in the spirit of that longstanding relationship," said a department spokesman, Brian Roehrkasse. "When making those decisions, it is vital to protect national security information, particularly when they relate to sensitive intelligence programs that are the subject of oversight by the Intelligence Committees. We also must give appropriate weight to the confidentiality of internal executive branch deliberations."

C.I.A. lawyers have sought in the past to avoid any discussion of whether the agency has documents related to its detention and interrogation of leading members of Al Qaeda in secret prisons overseas. The lawyers have said national security would be endangered if the agency was forced to tell in any way of its involvement in such operations.

But in September, the president said 14 high-level terrorism suspects had been transferred from secret locations abroad to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. That effectively confirmed the existence of the prisons, as long reported.

DOJ_NMG_0097527

The two documents requested by Mr. Leahy in his letter of last Friday are among what Congressional aides maintain are perhaps hundreds, crucial to shaping the government's counterterrorism policies, that have never been released or publicly acknowledged.

Justice Department officials have long said they will resist efforts to require disclosure of classified documents that provide legal advice to other agencies. But in the interview this week, Mr. Leahy signaled that he expected the department to provide a fuller documentary history on issues like detention.

The senator's letter to Mr. Gonzales requested "all directives, memoranda, and/or orders including any and all attachments to such documents, regarding C.I.A. interrogation methods or policies for the treatment of detainees." It also sought an index of all documents related to Justice Department inquiries into detainee abuse by "U.S. military or civilian personnel in Guantánamo Bay, Abu Ghraib prison or elsewhere."

It is not known whether the material sought would clarify the origin and evolution of policies on issues like national security wiretaps, detention and interrogation. But there are wide gaps in what is publicly known about these policies, who authorized them and what exactly has been authorized by administration directives and legal advisories.

"The American people," Mr. Leahy's letter said, "deserve to have detailed and accurate information about the role of the Bush administration in developing the interrogation policies and practices that have engendered such deep criticism around the world."

Senator Set To Attack On Iraq Data (NYSUN)

By Eli Lake

New York Sun, November 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — The first shot in the coming subpoena wars between congressional Democrats and the Bush administration likely will be fired in January by Senator Levin, a Democrat of Michigan.

The Senate Armed Services Committee's Democratic staff, soon to be in the majority, is already preparing to ask the Pentagon for documents related to analysis in the lead-up to the Iraq war from the offices reporting to a former undersecretary of defense for policy, Douglas Feith.

At issue so far are some 58 documents Mr. Levin requested as early as 2004 that relate to how the Defense Department's Office of Special Plans may have deviated from the CIA in its view of links between Al Qaeda and Iraq, and whether such deviation constituted pressure on intelligence analysts.

What Mr. Levin intends to do with those documents, should the Pentagon release them, is significant for the president, the ongoing war, and the Democrats.

The initial document request will test an unstated Bush administration policy to presuppose that presidential privilege would shield advice and other internal deliberations in the executive branch, and not just the White House, from congressional subpoena. It is likely, for example, that the privilege defense will be used to attempt to block congressional requests for Justice Department memos that outline interrogation policies for detainees.

While the policy is not mentioned in letters between the Pentagon and Mr. Levin, Defense Department lawyers have conveyed verbally that the 58 documents the senator seeks presumptively fall under presidential privilege.

Should Mr. Levin decide to reopen his inquiry into pre-war intelligence, however, there is a risk that Democrats will be seen as backward-looking. In an interview earlier this month, the head of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council, Al From, said he would caution his party against "relitigating 2003."

Mr. Levin has been pursuing Mr. Feith and the Office of Special Plans almost since the Iraq war began. According to correspondence between the Pentagon and Mr. Levin obtained by The New York Sun, the senator has sought every e-mail, staff review, internal legal opinion, and policy draft related to Iraq and Al Qaeda. The former prosecutor ends a June 30, 2004, letter by asking Mr. Feith to provide "all documents and communications from all persons within your Policy organization from September 2001 through April 2003, related to the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda."

The requests, according to the correspondence, took Pentagon staffers thousands of hours to fulfill. The sub rosa bureaucratic spat became so testy that Defense Secretary Rumsfeld wrote on October 1, 2004, "Your minority inquiry seems to be getting broader and more open-ended in scope." In the letter, the now outgoing Pentagon chief urges Mr. Levin to reconsider his wide-ranging request for documents and to give his inquiry "constructive focus."

At the root of Mr. Levin's probe is his contention that an alternative analysis conducted after the attacks of September 11, 2001, by the Policy Counterterrorism Evaluation Group — and subsequent analysis from the Office of Special Plans, which was created in 2002 to prepare for the Iraq war — distorted and manipulated intelligence provided to policy-makers and Congress in the run-up to the invasion of Iraq.

The Senate select committee on intelligence's bipartisan report on pre-war intelligence, along with the president's own commission that examined the issue, said the intelligence reports were not influenced by the Pentagon team's analysts or the Office of Special Plans.

Despite signing off on the Senate intelligence panel's report, Mr. Levin has pressed on. Three months after the release of the report and two weeks before the 2004 presidential elections, Mr. Levin released his "Inquiry into the Alternative Analysis of the Issue of an Iraq-al Qaeda Relationship." The appendix for the inquiry lists six categories of information requests the Pentagon denied the senator, including documents relating to detainee briefings for Mr. Feith's analysts; contacts between those analysts and a pre-war opposition group, the Iraqi National Congress, and communication between the analysts and other intelligence agencies about assessments on Iraq's ties to Al Qaeda.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Levin said this week the senator had not yet made a decision on whether to subpoena the documents.

In the report, Mr. Levin concluded that Mr. Feith failed to make key changes requested by the CIA in a report he submitted on October 27, 2003, to the Senate intelligence committee regarding that relationship. That memo was the basis of a Weekly Standard cover story by Steven Hayes touting the operational links between Saddam Hussein's Iraq and Al Qaeda.

At the request of Mr. Feith, the CIA's director of congressional affairs at the time, Stanley Moskowitz, checked the 2003 memo against the recommendations from his agency and concluded "after a careful comparison between that submission and what we had requested as our condition for clearance of CIA material, I believe that you made all of the changes we requested," according to a November 1, 2004, letter obtained by the Sun.

Nonetheless, Mr. Levin in a September 22, 2005, letter to the Pentagon's acting inspector general, Tom Gimble requested that the Defense Department watchdog investigate whether Mr. Feith sent CIA material to the Senate intelligence committee without the agency's approval. In that letter, Mr. Levin requested that the inspector general look into 10 specific questions about alternative analysis into Iraq and Al Qaeda. It followed a more modest request from Senator Roberts, the Republican chairman of the Senate intelligence panel, to Mr. Gimble to investigate outstanding questions regarding the Office of Special Plans.

Mr. Levin earlier this month told reporters and Web loggers that he expected the inspector general report would be finished in the coming weeks and that Congress would proceed depending on what that report said.

U.S. Poised To Shift Latin America Policies (HC)

Houston Chronicle, November 22, 2006

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — For the past six years, Democrats have accused President Bush and the Republican-controlled Congress of pursuing counter-productive policies in Latin America or of ignoring the region altogether.

Now, following their victories in midterm elections giving them control of the House and Senate, many Democratic lawmakers are promising subtle policy changes on immigration, trade and U.S. military aid.

"We will be in a position to try to raise the profile of these issues," said Tim Rieser, an aide to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., poised to take the chairmanship of the Appropriations Committee's foreign operations panel. "Congress doesn't drive the ship, but it has a big role in how far it goes and in which direction."

The first sign of a changed U.S. relationship may appear today when, after years of bare-knuckle negotiations, U.S. and Colombian officials gather in Washington to sign a trade agreement.

But congressional passage of the agreement, as well as a similar deal with Peru, now seems in doubt because Democrats are generally more skeptical of trade pacts.

DOJ_NMG_0097529

The most recent trade deal, the Central American Free Trade Agreement, passed by just one vote last year in the Republican-controlled House. In the Nov. 7 election, 34 House and Senate seats switched hands from supporters of the current model of international trade deals to critics, according to a study by Washington-based Global Trade Watch.

Revisions possible

Some Democrats want to rewrite both the Colombia and Peru agreements to include, among other things, more environmental regulations and stronger guarantees for union organizers.

For now, it's unclear whether these issues can be resolved through side agreements or whether the trade deals will have to be renegotiated, which could take years.

"This doesn't mean they're dead on arrival. But they certainly will be delayed," said Chris Sabatini, with the Council of the Americas, a New York-based business organization.

As for Mexico, many Democrats reject the hard-line position of some Republicans on immigration.

"Building a wall is not the symbol that the U.S. should have in its relations with Mexico, and there will certainly be a different tone with the Democrats," said John Walsh of the Washington Office on Latin America think tank.

But John Bailey, a Mexico expert at Georgetown University, said the congressional power shift "will do little in the next biennium to rescue the U.S.-Mexico relationship from the inertia of the past five years."

Bailey said the elections sent a mixed message on immigration, with several conservative Democrats elected in key races.

Farther south, Colombia stands as the largest recipient of U.S. aid outside of Israel and Egypt, but many Democrats are pushing for changes in how the money is spent.

Reaching out to leftists

Under the administration's "Plan Colombia" policy, the U.S. has provided nearly $5 billion in mostly military aid since 2000 to fight the country's narcotics traffickers and Marxist guerrillas. Although security has improved in many areas, the rebels remain a threat while tons of Colombian cocaine and heroin continue to reach the U.S.

"Six years and $4.7 billion later, the drug-control results are meager at best," Rep. Jan Schakowsky, D-Ill., told a congressional hearing last June.

Many Democrats want to reduce military spending and use the money to boost programs to fight poverty, relocate people displaced by Colombia's 42-year civil war and encourage farmers to plant legal crops.

"Democrats don't plan to walk away from Colombia. We just want to make sure that our investment is smart," said Rep. James McGovern, D-Mass., a member of the House Rules Committee.

Elsewhere in the region, analysts say the Democrats will likely urge the Bush administration to foster cordial relations with leftist leaders who have recently been elected, including Evo Morales in Bolivia and Daniel Ortega in Nicaragua.

The goal, they say, is to prevent these governments from getting too cozy with President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela, who stands as Washington's fiercest opponent in the region. Democrats have been almost as critical of Chavez as the Republicans.

Latin Americans Wonder If Democrats Are Traders (WP)

By Sibylla Brodzinsky And Peter S. Goodman, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, November 23, 2006

Anxiety High Over Stance of Incoming Congress

MEDELLIN, Colombia -- At the CI Jeans factory, where 3,900 people make their livings turning bolts of denim into trousers bound for the United States, the American market -- land of the customer -- appears to be slipping away.

In September, with a proposed trade deal between Colombia and the United States uncertain and orders flagging, the factory fired 320 workers. Now, the pact appears to be in peril. Democrats are set to take control of the U.S. Congress, speaking for a segment of the American public that is worried about globalization. The incoming leaders have pledged to redraft the terms of global trade.

Yesterday, the Bush administration signed the proposed deal, but leading Democrats promptly attacked it, underscoring growing doubts in Washington that Congress will approve the pact. Here in Colombia and next door in Peru, which awaits congressional approval for its own trade treaty, anxiety runs high.

DOJ_NMG_0097530

"We watch the news and we're nervous about what might happen with what we send to the United States," said Janeth Palacio Ramirez, 35, who supports her 15-year-old daughter and her elderly parents by punching zipper stops onto 7,000 pairs of jeans a day, earning about $200 a month. "Everything we make here goes there, so if there are problems with exports, we'll all lose our jobs."

As Democrats prepare to reshape U.S. trade policy, the impact is being felt far from the Carolina mill towns and rust-belt factories that are a perennial focus of domestic concern.

Addressing fears that too many jobs are being sacrificed at home, the new Democratic leadership wants to slow the worldwide effort, which the United States has led since 1947, to lower import tariffs that hinder trade.

The fortunes of Colombia and Peru -- home to more than 72 million people -- may hang in the balance. So, too, might the nature of American engagement with Latin America, regional experts say. The rejection of trade pacts with these countries would humiliate their leaders at a time when they stand as bulwarks against the anti-American populism pressed by Venezuela's president, Hugo Chavez.

Latin America was already recoiling at the prospect of the United States fencing its southern border against illegal immigration. Now, some see the nation walling off its huge marketplace, rescinding the promise of trade, long proffered by the Bush and Clinton administrations as a means of furthering development.

"If you really look at the U.S. agenda in Latin America, trade is the only positive," said Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Inter-American Dialogue in Washington. "The rest is immigration, anti-narcotics. It's all negatives." Latin Americans, he said, may well start to question "how serious Americans are about having a constructive relationship."

President Alvaro Uribe of Colombia has championed the free-trade agreement and cultivated a friendship with President Bush. The death of the deal would undermine his standing and deprive Colombia of a crucial source of livelihood -- export dollars -- as it confronts American pressure to eradicate cocaine production.

"This would be a disaster," said Sergio Clavijo, a former Colombian deputy finance minister, who noted that exports to its neighbor Venezuela are already threatened by continued tensions with Chavez. Without export growth, "narco-trafficking will be the only way out."

In Peru, the trade pact has been embraced by a new president, Alan Garcia, who put aside years of skepticism. Garcia served as Peru's president before, in the late 1980s. Then, he attacked trade deals and derided the United States as an imperial power. Now, Garcia is listening to Hernando de Soto, an economist who preaches liberalized trade as a means of attacking poverty.

De Soto was in Washington last week, lobbying lawmakers to pass the trade pact before Democrats take over. He argued that Latin America's future is on the line: Will the region embrace integration with the global market along with respect for property rights and the rule of law, or will it slide back to the days of capitalism squaring off against Marxist prescriptions?

If the trade deal "does not go through, it will strengthen the hand of the Chavez-type sympathizers we have in Latin America, the very old arguments that we can't rely on you Americans and free trade doesn't really work," De Soto said in an interview.

But to many American workers, that talk sounds far off, as the country grapples with the loss of more than 3 million manufacturing jobs since 2000 and declining average wages in many sectors. The movement of jobs overseas has spread insecurity from the factory floor to the office cubicle.

"The message of this election says to me that all of these trade agreements need to be renegotiated," said Rep. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio), who gained a Senate seat in large part by promising job protection. "When a plant of 300 people closes in a town of 20,000, it hurts families and destroys communities."

The new atmosphere in Washington was underscored in the House last week with the unexpected rejection of a measure to establish normal trade relations with Vietnam. This week, 16 Democratic members of Congress, including Charles B. Rangel of New York, who is to chair the House Ways and Means Committee, sent a letter to the U.S. trade representative demanding that enforceable labor protections be written into the Peru and Colombia treaties.

After yesterday's signing of the Colombia pact, Rangel issued a statement assailing what he termed "a very counterproductive step by the Bush administration," adding that "by forging ahead despite Democrats' long-standing concerns . . .

the administration misses a key opportunity to consult and work with the new congressional majority and rebuild a bipartisan foundation for international trade."

Republicans came to the administration's defense, but as of January, Democrats will control the committees overseeing trade policy. "The new mood might simply kill the deals by convincing the administration not to bring them for a vote," said Grant D. Aldonas, a former Bush administration undersecretary of commerce.

In Colombia and Peru, some take solace that Congress is expected to approve an extension of certain trade preferences for the two countries, Ecuador and Bolivia. The preferences -- duty-free access to the American market for a range of goods, including textiles -- have since 1991 been given as a form of aid in the drug eradication campaign. The preferences expire at the end of this year. In Colombia alone, these preferences have nurtured some 600,000 jobs, according to the government.

But many say the preferences, which are generally extended for only a few years at a time, are no substitute for a permanent trade pact. Without duty-free access, garment-makers would be liable for tariffs reaching 19 percent on items shipped to the United States. Colombian leaders say it's hard for companies to secure capital for investment without greater certainty.

"Investors don't risk making investments knowing that market access is not guaranteed," Uribe, the Colombian president, said Saturday at a town hall meeting on agriculture.

Over the past four months, this uncertainty has cost Colombia 7,000 jobs, the government says. "If we lose another six months or one year, we're going to suffer big damage to our exports," said Marta Lucia Ramirez, a former Colombian trade minister.

To be sure, some in Colombia and Peru are pleased the trade deals are in trouble. Small grain and poultry farmers are worried about competing against subsidized American agribusiness, with cheap imports from the United States expected to depress prices. Labor unions have fought the pacts on ideological grounds and as a threat to certain types of jobs.

"The results of the elections have changed everything," said Carlos Rodriguez, president of Colombia's largest union, the Unified Confederation of Workers, who used the term "economic annexation" to describe the proposed Colombian deal. "The treaty is paralyzed." His union planned to send representatives to Washington this week to strategize with the AFL-CIO on how to push for a renegotiation favoring labor interests.

Some farmers, however -- particularly those on the coasts who grow artichokes, asparagus and other vegetables during the North American winter -- see the trade pacts as a prime opportunity. In Peru, between 55 and 70 percent of the population supports a trade deal, recent polls say.

On a dusty plain south of Lima, Textil Del Valle, one of Peru's largest garment-makers, churns out high-end clothing for the American market. The factory has quadrupled its workforce to 2,700 in the past four years.

But as the general manager, Fernando Garibaldi, contemplates the future, he wonders how many will be working in his factory. It all hinges on the trade pact with the United States, he says. Without it, he can't compete with China, where wages are a fraction of Peru's. And he can't compete with Mexico and Central America, which enjoy duty-free access to the American market under their own trade deals.

"We have been investing with the view that the free-trade agreement would be approved," Garibaldi said. "What will happen if hundreds of thousands of people lose their jobs?"

Goodman reported from New York. Special correspondent Lucien Chauvin in Lima, Peru, contributed to this report.

Breckinridge L. Willcox, 62; Prosecutor Won 2 Major Soviet Spy Cases (LAT)

From Times Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, November 24, 2006

Breckinridge L. Willcox, 62, who as Maryland's top federal prosecutor from 1986 to 1991 had two major espionage convictions, died Nov. 16 of cancer in Santa Paula, in Ventura County.

In 1986, President Reagan nominated Willcox, a former chief of the Justice Department's government fraud branch, to be U.S. attorney for Maryland.

DOJ_NMG_0097532

Soon after taking office, he had two major Soviet espionage convictions: that of Ronald Pelton, a former National Security Agency communications expert, and a Navy spy ring led by John Walker. Both men received life sentences.

In the late 1980s, Willcox's investigations led to the conviction of then-Maryland state Sen. Clarence M. Mitchell III and his brother, state Sen. Michael B. Mitchell, as part of the Wedtech defense contracting scandal.

Born in La Jolla, Willcox was raised in Chevy Chase, Md. After graduating from Yale University and Duke University Law School, he spent three years in the Marine Corps as a judge advocate general.

He joined the U.S. Justice Department in 1975 and prosecuted fraud cases stemming from defense contracts.

From 1984 to 1986, he was a partner in the Washington, D.C., law firm of McKenna, Conner & Cuneo and established its white-collar defense practice.

Juvenile Centers Still Not Up To Standard, Monitor Says (AP)

AP, November 22, 2006

Mississippi's two juvenile training schools have failed to meet the conditions required to bring the facilities up to standards under an agreement that ended a Justice Department lawsuit, a court monitor says.

Mississippi in May 2005 entered a four-year decree to end the lawsuits over conditions at Oakley and Columbia training schools.

The report from court monitor Joyce Burrell, filed today, says some progress has been made, but the schools are not yet in compliance. It was the fourth report filed since the agreement and covered the period May 1 through Aug. 31.

Burrell noted improvements in student-to-staff ratios, and found that the facilities were cleaner.

"In the short term, staff are to be commended for pitching in many extra hours to do a thorough cleaning and some painting of the buildings," she wrote.

However, she said, there have been setbacks in education and staffing issues, including difficulty in retaining new hires long enough to get problems under control.

She said officials must address the problem so that the training schools can reach and maintain optimum staffing levels.

Department of Health Services Executive Director Don Taylor was not available for comment Tuesday. He has said in the past that improvements are being made, despite the slow pace.

Burrell's latest report found continued problems in students reporting abuse, noting that the actual student complaints are coming through attorneys from the Department of Justice or the Southern Poverty Law Center.

"The fact that students/cadets are not comfortable reporting issues to staff of the Division of Youth Services is troubling and suggests that they are still either afraid ... or they do not have the skills to effectively use the tools that are available to make reports," she found.

She also found too many allegations of youth-on-youth and staff-on-youth abuse at Oakley, saying a communication problem is to blame for complaints that don't make their way up the chain of command.

Burrell said staffers still don't understand what constitutes abuse at Oakley and recommended that an ombudman join the staff.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Guantanamo Detainee Refuses Heart Operation (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer
The Los Angeles Times, November 23, 2006

Businessman wants to have the procedure away from the prison, but the military says its doctors are able to perform the surgery.

GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA — A businessman being held for allegedly providing support to Al Qaeda has refused to have a heart operation at the U.S. military detention center hospital here and instead is seeking a court order for civilian treatment in the U.S. or his native Pakistan.

The dispute over who should operate and where has spotlighted questions of medical ethics in the handling of some of the 430 terrorism suspects detained at Guantanamo.

Saifullah Paracha, a 59-year-old real estate and media mogul who lived in the United States for 16 years, was to have undergone a cardiac catheterization this week to explore the cause of recurring chest pains and two previous heart attacks.

Guantanamo officials say that their 150-person medical team is capable of performing the routine operation and that nearly $400,000 was spent flying in a 24-member team of cardiac specialists and equipment to be on hand in case of complications.

But Paracha's lawyers told a U.S. district judge in Washington last week that Guantanamo doctors had left him shackled during previous examinations and treatments. Paracha's request for a court order to halt the operation at the prison was denied Monday, when Judge Paul L. Friedman said he was not convinced Paracha faced a risk of "irreparable injury" at Guantanamo.

Friedman said that government doctors operate on prisoners throughout the U.S. correctional system, but that he was troubled by the reports that Paracha was treated with his arms and legs restrained by metal shackles.

Cardiac catheterization is a diagnostic procedure that involves inserting a thin plastic tube into a vein or artery and threading it to the heart to locate any blockages and measure blood pressure, said Capt. Ronald Sollock, commander of the U.S. Naval Hospital here.

"We have absolutely all the expertise and equipment here to do the procedure, be it the catheterization or stent replacement or open-heart surgery," Sollock said in an interview, reiterating the assertions he submitted to Friedman through the Justice Department last week. "We would never have suggested doing it here if we didn't have every capability available."

Sollock and Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., who commands the prison and interrogation network, said Paracha's refusal to allow the surgery would be respected for now.

But, Harris said, he has a responsibility to keep the terrorism suspects in his custody alive to face war-crimes trials or testify against other prisoners. He and his predecessors in the command have previously authorized medical intervention to prevent suicides and halt hunger strikes.

The admiral said in an interview that he sees a clear ethical distinction between preventing self-inflicted harm and forcing a prisoner to have a surgical procedure he doesn't want, even if it could prove to be lifesaving.

"Can we make a detainee or a patient undergo it?" Harris said. "Today the answer to that is no if the patient doesn't want it."

Physicians for Human Rights said that any operation forced on a detainee would be an ethical violation as recognized by the military medical community as well as the American Medical Assn.

DOJ_NMG_0097535

"Medicine in the military is set up to ensure that a doctor does not have to take an order that goes against basic medical ethics," said Nathaniel Raymond, a spokesman for the group.

And, Raymond said, military medical professionals at Guantanamo had "clearly violated" rules against force-feeding hunger strikers who are still conscious and capable of deciding for themselves whether to eat.

Paracha and his son are said to be key figures in the case against Majid Khan, one of 14 "high-value" detainees relocated here from secret CIA prisons in September.

Khan, according to U.S. authorities, allegedly researched poisoning U.S. reservoirs and was considered for an Al Qaeda plan to kill Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf. He was captured in 2003.

Paracha has said that he lived in the United States full time from 1971 to 1987, after which he visited frequently to oversee his businesses in New York, Chicago, Washington and San Francisco.

His son, Uzair Paracha, was arrested in the United States in May 2003 and charged with aiding an Al Qaeda operative who intended to bomb U.S. targets. He was sentenced to 30 years in prison earlier this year.

In a January 2005 hearing before a U.S. military panel in Guantanamo Bay, Saifullah Paracha recounted how he was arrested at the Bangkok airport in July 2003 while on a business trip and sent to Afghanistan — where he was held until his transfer here 15 months later.

Paracha told the Combatant Status Review Tribunal that he had met Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden twice but described the encounters as news-gathering for Universal Broadcast Ltd., one of seven companies he owns.

He was informed at the tribunal that he is suspected of laundering money for Al Qaeda, plotting to smuggle explosives into the United States and recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

Pakistan's chief coordinator for human rights issues, Khawaja Khalid, told journalists in Islamabad last week that Paracha and Khan were in poor health and could die in detention if they didn't receive treatment soon.

Paracha's attorney, Gaillard T. Hunt, spoke with his client by telephone Tuesday and said that "he still thinks it is unsafe to go ahead [with the operation] at Guantanamo."

Hunt said he was preparing to appeal Friedman's ruling.

Janet Reno Speaks Out Against Detentions (UPI)

United Press International, November 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 22 (UPI) -- Former U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other senior Justice Department officials have criticized the Bush administration's terror detention policy.

The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case of Qatar native Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri, a suspected al-Qaida sympathizer arrested in Illinois.

In the brief, the officials suggested indefinite detention of U.S. terrorism suspects could become commonplace unless the courts intervene, the Washington Post reported.

Reno has kept a low profile since leaving the top job of the Justice Department in 2001, and law professor Carl Tobias of the University of Richmond said her addition to the pool was significant, as other signatories include two U.S. attorneys from the Reagan years along with prosecutors from the Clinton and Carter administrations and Philip Lacovara, a counsel to the Watergate special prosecutor.

"It carries more weight because these are high-ranking officials in several administrations from both parties," Tobias told the Post.

Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials have filed court papers arguing that the Bush administration is setting a dangerous precedent by trying a suspected terrorist outside the court system.

It was the first time that Reno, attorney general in the Clinton administration, has spoken out against the administration's policies on terrorism detainees, underscoring how contentious the court fight over the nation's new military commissions law has become. Former attorneys general rarely file court papers challenging administration policy. The former prosecutors on Monday challenged the department's right to bring the suspect before a military panel.

Staff member cleared over leaked documents

A Democratic staff member of the House Intelligence Committee has been cleared of wrongdoing by a Republican-led leak investigation and reinstated in his position, according to committee officials.

The staff member, Larry Hanauer, was suspended last month from access to classified materials by the committee's chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, a Republican from Michigan.

Hoekstra said at the time that he thought Hanauer might have been a source for an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Hanauer had obtained a copy of the classified study at the request of a Democratic panel member, Representative John Tierney of Massachusetts, shortly before it was described in the article.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Whistle-blowers Tell Of Cost Of Conscience (USAT)

By Catherine Rampell, Usa Today

USA Today, November 24, 2006

He knew there were problems. He didn't think he was one of them.

In 2002, decorated FBI Special Agent Mike German was investigating meetings between terrorism suspects. When he discovered other officers had jeopardized the investigation by violating wiretapping regulations, he reported what he found to his supervisors, in accordance with FBI policy.

At the time, Coleen Rowley, the FBI agent who had raised concerns about how the pre-9/11 arrest of al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui was handled, was being hailed as a national hero. German says he had also just received a mass e-mail from FBI Director Robert Mueller, urging other whistle-blowers to come forward.

"I was assuming he'd protect me," German says.

Instead, German says his accusations were ignored, his reputation ruined and his career obliterated. Although the Justice Department's inspector general confirmed German's allegations that the FBI had "mishandled and mismanaged" the terrorism investigation, he says he was barred from further undercover work and eventually compelled to resign. FBI spokesman Bill Carter declined to comment.

The experience is familiar to other government employees who have blown the whistle on matters of national security since 9/11.

Whistle-blower filings

Since the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the average number of employees filing whistle-blower disclosures with the government has risen 43%, from an average of 376 annually in the four years before the attacks to 537 annually after. The statistics are kept by the Office of the Special Counsel, an independent federal investigative agency that handles whistle-blower cases if employees prefer not to directly confront their bosses about suspicions of wrongdoing.

An increasing number of whistle-blowers allege that rather than being embraced, they're being retaliated against for coming forward.

In the four years before the terrorist attacks, whistle-blowers filed an average of 690 reprisal complaints with the OSC annually. Since the attacks, an average of 835 complaints have been filed each year, a 21% increase.

The number of whistle-blower reprisal complaints is higher than the number of whistle-blower disclosure complaints because employees can file reprisal complaints with the OSC even if they had not previously filed their disclosure with the OSC.

"The sad reality is that rather than learning lessons from 9/11, the government appears to have become more thin-skinned and sensitive," says Tom Devine, legal director of the Government Accountability Project, a non-profit group that offers legal aid to whistle-blowers.

Even advocates have begun to dissuade some government employees from coming forward.

"When I get calls from people thinking of blowing the whistle, I tell them 'Don't do it,' " says William Weaver, a professor at the University of Texas at El Paso and a senior adviser to the National Security whistle-blowers Coalition. "Most of the time they go ahead and do it anyway and end up with their lives destroyed."

Those who come forward often face harassment, investigation, character assassination and firing — not to mention the toll their whistle-blowing takes on their families, Weaver and Devine say.

Lack of protection

DOJ_NMG_0097537

For those who are fired or have their security clearances revoked — tantamount to firing in the intelligence agencies — there is little recourse.

Most national security whistle-blowers are not protected from retaliation by law. That's because the intelligence-gathering agencies are exempted from the 1989 whistle-blower Protection Act, which guarantees investigations into disclosures made by federal employees and protects whistle-blowers from retaliation.

Whistle-blowers employed by these agencies must seek recourse within the same agency they are blowing the whistle on. And even if the investigators within their own agency confirm reprisal allegations, the investigators have no power to remedy the situation.

Devine says the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit has ruled against whistle-blowers in 125 of 127 of the reprisal cases seen by the court since 1994. "They've gutted the law," Devine says, "and it's degenerated into a rubber stamp for retaliation."

Lawmakers recently considered two sets of legislation that would affect whistle-blowers. One attempted to extend the whistle-blower Protection Act to cover intelligence agency employees through amendments to the 2007 Defense Authorization Bill.

In October, a conference committee removed the whistle-blower amendments from the final version of the bill.

The other bill that might affect whistle-blowers stiffens penalties for knowingly leaking classified information to those not authorized to receive it. That bill was introduced by Sen. Kit Bond, R-Mo., in response to recent leaks to the media about national security programs, says Bond's press secretary, Rob Ostrander.

"When classified information is printed in the newspapers, it's not just Americans who read it," Ostrander says. "It's also America's enemies."

Bond's legislation would make prosecuting leakers easier by eliminating the need to prove the disclosure damaged national security. The measure would subject those who leak classified information to a fine and up to three years in prison. It would apply to those who signed a non-disclosure agreement, regardless of their job at the time of the leak.

The bill uses language identical to that in a 2000 bill — dubbed the "Official Secrets Act," after a similar British law — that was vetoed by President Clinton. It has been endorsed by the Association of Intelligence Officers, a 31-year-old group of 4,500 current and former intelligence officers.

Bond's legislation has been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. If it does not make it to a floor vote by the end of this session, he will have to resubmit it when the next session begins in January.

The National Security whistle-blowers Coalition, the Government Accountability Project and various media organizations have criticized the legislation and claimed it would deter whistle-blowers from coming forward.

Ostrander says, "There are adequate opportunities for whistle-blowers to contact superiors and the federal inspector general's office or their own representatives" without leaking classified information to outside sources.

National security whistle-blowers who have come forward since 9/11 aren't so sure.

Many had been star employees at the top of the pay scale and had spent decades in civil service before blowing the whistle. The median number of years of government service for National Security whistle-blowers Coalition members is 22 years, says Sibel Edmonds, an FBI whistle-blower who founded the coalition. Edmonds and others worry that fear of committing career suicide may dissuade others from coming forward.

"I'm one of the last people who survived," says Rowley, the former FBI whistle-blower and Time magazine "Person of the Year" who recently lost her bid for a U.S. congressional seat in Minnesota. She says widespread, favorable media coverage saved her FBI career

"But is that the important story here — that one person in the country has been fired or is not being used to their fullest potential?" she asks. "It's the country that's going to suffer from a lack of whistle-blower protections."

'State Secrets Privilege' Blocks Fired Translator From Suing FBI (USAT)

By Catherine Rampell, Usa Today

USA Today, November 24, 2006

Sibel Edmonds, who formed the 100-plus member National Security whistle-blowers Coalition in 2002, began working as a linguist for the FBI the week after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack.

Several months into her contract, she discovered "shoddy" translations relevant to 9/11 created by translators who had "failed the proficiency exams," she says.

A report by the Justice Department's inspector general subsequently confirmed that at least one translator had failed the FBI's language proficiency exams. Edmonds says the translator was sent to Guantanamo Bay to translate "the most sensitive terrorist-related information" from interviews of detainees.

Edmonds also notified her superiors that a co-worker was responsible for translating wiretaps of a company the latter used to work for. The co-worker "was blocking the intelligence coming from her family members and friends," Edmonds says.

Edmonds took a polygraph test and was investigated for typing her allegations — which contained classified information — on her home computer, even though her supervisor had given permission for her to do so, the inspector general's report said.

The Middle Eastern language specialist was fired in March 2002. When Edmonds asked why, she received a letter saying her contract had been "terminated completely for the government's convenience," according to legal briefings her lawyers filed in the lawsuit contesting her firing.

In its final report, the inspector general concluded that "we believe that many of (Edmonds') allegations were supported, that the FBI did not take them seriously enough, and that her allegations were, in fact, the most significant factor in the FBI's decision to terminate her services."

The same month the report was released, Edmonds' lawsuit to contest her firing was dismissed. Legal briefs show the government had invoked the so-called state secrets privilege, arguing that the lawsuit would jeopardize national security.

The state secrets privilege — a series of U.S. legal precedents — has been cited by the federal government at least 18 times since 9/11 and at least 81 times since the privilege was first recognized in 1953, according to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

"Instead of protecting and standing up for whistle-blowers, this is just giving the complete green light to retaliate," says Edmonds, who lost her appeal.

FBI spokesperson Bill Carter declined to comment, citing privacy concerns.

Missouri Group Denies Terrorist Connections (AP)

AP, November 23, 2006

WASHINGTON | A Missouri-based Islamic charity accused of being part of a terrorist organization tried to distance itself in court this week from a Sudanese group suspected of financing al-Qaida.

The Treasury Department considers the Islamic American Relief Agency of Columbia to be an arm of the Islamic African Relief Agency, a Sudanese group accused of providing financial support to Osama bin Laden, al-Qaida and Hamas.

The FBI raided the charity's office in Missouri and the homes of people affiliated with the group nationwide. Since then, the 20-year-old charity has been unable to raise money.

Attorney Shereef Hadi Akeel told a U.S. Court of Appeals on Monday that the charity was not part of the Sudanese group. The organizations have independent leaders and separate bank accounts, he said.

If the two groups were the same, Akeel said, when the Missouri group wanted to move money into Sudan it would have simply transferred it. Instead, he said, the charity sought U.S. permission.

A federal judge rejected the group's lawsuit in 2005. The three-judge appeals panel seemed hesitant to reject that finding Monday.

The Justice Department pointed to the Missouri charity's own tax and corporate documents, which list the charity as a chapter or affiliate of the Sudanese group.

Akeel said that in the world of aid organizations, charities in the United States frequently became partners with groups in impoverished areas.

The judges heard public and classified testimony Monday and did not rule on the case.

State Police Eyed As Hubs Of Terrorism Data Network (UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

UPI, November 24, 2006

A new plan from the U.S. intelligence czar will use intelligence centers run by state police as the hubs for a national network of officials from different agencies and levels of government sharing information about terrorism.

In a move likely to rattle privacy mavens, the three-year plan for implementing the congressionally mandated Information Sharing Environment (ISE) also lays out policies designed to ease sharing with foreign governments, and proposes to widen the definition of shareable terrorism information.

The plan "provides a road map for the successful implementation of the ISE, and responds to the recommendations of the September 11 commission," said Thomas McNamara, program manager for the ISE in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence.

Enacted as part of the 2004 intelligence reform law, ISE tried to create a seamless "network of networks" connecting officials -- and the terrorism-related information to which they have access -- by changing rules across the increasing number of federal, state and local agencies whose mission includes protecting the United States from terrorism.

Mr. McNamara said the aim was to create "a virtual interstate system," and that the law-enforcement "fusion" centers being set up in states and large municipalities would be the "nodes where information can be processed, condensed and evaluated."

But such information includes personal data about Americans held by government agencies. In the wake of revelations that a Pentagon terrorist threat database contained reports about lawful anti-war protests, questions continue to be raised about the civil liberties and privacy implications of the seamless sharing of information envisaged by the ISE.

John Rollins, an analyst with the Congressional Research Service who formerly worked on information-sharing issues at the Department of Homeland Security, said concerns have been raised about regulations affecting the fusion centers.

He said federal regulations already governed the centers' state and local databases, but it was not clear how much oversight the Justice Department planned to do.

Mr. McNamara argues that the new system will strengthen civil liberties and privacy "if it is done right."

"There is already information sharing going on," he said, adding that ISE systems could add oversight capabilities that would "track, audit and monitor the use of the system" to prevent abuse.

Two contentious areas on which his plan proposes to proceed are the sharing of information with foreign governments and private-sector firms.

The plan says that federal departments and agencies should begin to ensure that their so-called "systems of records" notices and routine disclosures required by the Privacy Act "provide for terrorism information sharing with foreign partners."

It also calls for information sharing with the private sector that is "likely to entail issues requiring executive level decisions or legislative changes."

Mr. Rollins called the plan "a good start" but said that more than five years after September 11, "all we have is a plan. ... The real hard work starts now."

Civil Liberties: New Law Needs Fix (SEAPI)

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, November 24, 2006

If congressional Democrats want to exercise the mandate voters gave them in the midterm elections, they'd do well to undo the injury done to civil liberties by the Military Commissions Act passed last month.

The law was a controversial response to the U.S. Supreme Court's rejection of the Bush administration using executive power to dictate treatment of so-called "foreign combatants" at Guantanamo Bay prison in Cuba.

The law, in essence, codified the Bush administration's evisceration of the Constitution.

Among other things, the law tossed out the time-honored right to challenge in court the legality of one's detention, known as habeas corpus.

Now the Bush administration is claiming in federal court that, under the new law, even immigrants arrested in the United States can be held indefinitely on suspicion of terrorism and may not challenge their detention in civil courts. Former Attorney General Janet Reno and seven other former Justice Department officials have challenged the administration's position in the case.

Navy Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, who was the defense counsel in the Supreme Court case that spurred the new law, said of the Bush administration's assertions of how detainees could be treated, "There went the Bill of Rights."

A Democratic Congress would do well to get it back.

WAR NEWS:

Attack On Baghdad Shiite Slum Kills 161 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst,

AP, November 24, 2006

Sunni Muslim insurgents blew up five car bombs and fired mortars into Baghdad's largest Shiite district Thursday, killing at least 161 people and wounding 257 in a dramatic attack that sent the U.S. ambassador racing to meet with Iraqi leaders in an effort to contain the growing sectarian war.

Shiite mortar teams quickly retaliated, firing 10 shells at Sunni Islam's most important shrine in Baghdad, badly damaging the Abu Hanifa mosque and killing one person. Eight more rounds slammed down near the offices of the Association of Muslim Scholars, the top Sunni Muslim organization in Iraq, setting nearby houses on fire.

Two other mortar barrages on Sunni neighborhoods in west Baghdad killed nine and wounded 21, police said late Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0097540

The bloodshed underlined the impotence of the Iraqi army and police to quell determined sectarian extremists at a time when the Bush administration appears to be considering a move to accelerate the hand-over of security responsibilities. President Bush plans to visit the region next week to discuss the security situation with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We condemn such acts of senseless violence that are clearly aimed at undermining the Iraqi people's hopes for a peaceful and stable Iraq," said Jeanie Mamo, a White House spokeswoman.

On Friday, about 300 mourners chanted as they beat their chests while walking through the Sadr City slum alongside slow-moving the cars and minivans carrying 16 wooden caskets tied to the rooftops.

Once the processions reached the edge of Sadr City in northeastern Baghdad, the cars and minivans left most of the mourners behind for the 100-mile drive south to Najaf, a treacherous journey that passes through many checkpoints and areas controlled by Sunni militants in Iraq's so-called "Triangle of Death."

Iraq's government imposed a curfew in the capital and also closed the international airport. The transport ministry then took the highly unusual step of closing the airport and docks in the southern city of Basra, the country's main outlet to the vital shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf.

Leaders from Iraq's Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish communities issued a televised appeal for calm after a hastily organized meeting with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad. The U.S. Embassy said it had nothing to report about the session.

Al-Maliki, a Shiite, also went on state TV and blamed Sunni radicals and followers of Saddam Hussein for the attacks on Sadr City — the deadliest on a sectarian enclave since the war began.

The coordinated car bombings — three by suicide drivers and two of parked cars — billowed black smoke up into clouds hanging low over blood-smeared streets jammed with twisted and charred cars and buses.

Hospital corridors and waiting rooms were awash in blood and mangled survivors of bombs that struck at 15-minute intervals in the sprawling Shiite slum, which is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia of radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a key al-Maliki backer.

The militia and associated death squads are believed responsible for the slayings of hundreds of Sunnis since suspected al-Qaida in Iraq militants bombed a revered Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra last February.

That attack set off a surge of retaliatory killings between Shiites and Sunnis that have raged all year.

Al-Sadr associates, speaking to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information, said the cleric feared that the Sadr City bombings would make it impossible for him to hold back his heavily armed fighters from a furious round of revenge attacks.

In a television statement read by an aide, al-Sadr urged unity among his followers to end the U.S. "occupation" that he said is causing Iraq's strife. Al-Sadr said the attacks coincided with the seventh anniversary of the assassination of his father, Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, a revered Shiite religious leader. The anniversary reckoning was by the Islamic calendar.

"Had the late al-Sadr been among you he would have said preserve your unity," the statement said. "Don't carry out any act before you ask the Hawza (Shiite seminary in Najaf). Be the ones who are unjustly treated and not the ones who treat others unjustly."

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the pre-eminent Shiite religious figure in Iraq, condemned the bombings and issued condolences to family members of those who were killed. He called for self-control among his followers.

Iraq is suffering through a period of unparalleled violence. The United Nations said Wednesday that 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October, the most in any month since the war began 44 months ago, and a figure certain to be eclipsed in November.

The Sadr City slaughter occurred just moments after U.S. helicopters and Iraqi armor had to intervene to stop an attack by 30 masked Sunni gunmen who tried to storm the Shiite-dominated Health Ministry, about a mile west of the Shiite slum. Seven ministry guards were wounded.

Residents also reported heavy mortar fire and gunbattles in Hurriyah, a now-largely Shiite neighborhood in northwest Baghdad. There were pitched battles between gunmen and the army on Haifa Street, a dangerous thoroughfare running north from the Green Zone, site of the American and British embassies as well as the Iraqi government and parliament.

Iraqis also reported heavy fighting around the Jadriyah Bridge near Baghdad University and AP personnel saw 12 pickup trucks loaded with men armed with rocket-propelled grenade launchers and heavy machine guns driving through the center of the city.

Counting those killed in Sadr City, at least 233 people died or were found dead across Iraq on Thursday.

Before dawn Thursday, U.S. and Iraqi forces searching for a kidnapped American soldier swept through an area of Sadr City, killing four Iraqis, wounding eight and detaining five, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0097541

The raid was the fourth time in six days that coalition forces raided the district looking for U.S. soldier Ahmed Qusai al-Taayie, a 41-year-old Ann Arbor, Mich., resident who was snatched from the street while he was visiting his Iraqi wife in Baghdad on Oct. 23.

The Mahdi Army is believed to have grabbed al-Taayie as well as dozens of people during a raid on a Ministry of Higher Education office in Baghdad on Nov. 14. The ministry is predominantly Sunni Arab.

During the 4:30 a.m. raid coalition forces searched houses and opened fire on a minivan carrying Iraqi workers in al-Fallah Street, killing four and wounding eight, said police Capt. Mohammed Ismail. He said coalition forces also detained five Iraqis.

In a statement, the U.S. military confirmed the raid and said it was part of the effort to find al-Taayie. It confirmed the detention of five Iraqis and said a vehicle was shot at by Iraqi troops after "displaying hostile intent." The statement did not report Iraqi casualties.

The military also reported that three Marines were killed during combat in Anbar province, where many Sunni-Arab insurgents are based. That raised the U.S. death toll so far this month to 52.

Baghdad Attack Death Toll Rises To 202 (AP)

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) - Sunni Muslim insurgents blew up five car bombs and fired mortars into Baghdad's largest Shiite district Thursday, killing at least 202 people and wounding 252 in a dramatic attack that sent the U.S. ambassador racing to meet with Iraqi leaders in an effort to contain the growing sectarian war.

The death toll, released by Rahim Qassim, a Health Ministry official in Sadr City, and police Col. Hassen Chaloub, was far higher than the one officials had given on Thursday night, when they had said that 161 Iraqis were killed and 257 wounded during the attack with mortar rounds and five car bombs that day.

Iraq's government imposed a curfew in the capital and also closed the international airport. The transport ministry then took the highly unusual step of closing the airport and docks in the southern city of Basra, the country's main outlet to the vital shipping lanes in the Persian Gulf.
